"Thus much alone we know—she died!" Thus much, indeed, would have been all that I should have known of "Mary," had I not one day encountered another visitor at the grave. I was sitting on a broad, flat stone, apparently a broken millstone, though how it should have found its way into the churchyard, was more than I could conjecture. It lay, almost overgrown with the long grass, near the tomb which had occupied my thoughts so much. I had been imagining all kinds of strange, poetical inscriptions that might have suited the tenant of that lowly spot. I had recalled to memory all that I knew of tender and lofty epitaphs, and had settled down upon the belief that none of them were half so touching as this simple tribute. Footsteps, light and reverent, broke my reveries. A nun, bowed with age, approached the tomb, and bent devoutly over it. Presently he noticed that the grass had been freshly watered, and looking round, he perceived the small green watering-pot which I had filled at the spring, and with which I had sprinkled the grave.

"Was it you who did this?" he asked.

I signified that it was, and he thanked me in a voice that trembled with emotion.

"How did you know?"

"I did not know," I answered; "but it has been one of the matters which I have most earnestly desired to know—the history of this tombstone—only, however, on account of the quaint simplicity of the inscription, which tells at once, so much and so little."

"She was my daughter," said the old man, with tears of genuine sorrow in his eyes.

I was shocked at the idea of intruding upon the sorrow of a stranger, and begged his pardon.

"It is not necessary," he said. "The act that you have performed here this morning tells me from what motives you ask of the beloved one who lies here."

He came and seated himself on the broken stone, and, after a few moments devoted to memories of the past, he told me of his daughter.

"She was lovely," he said; "not only a parent's heart thought so, but every one who knew her. I had another daughter, as lovely in face, but not in disposition, as Mary. Clara was proud and passionate, and ever jealous of her sister's superiority, and of the many friends who clustered around her. Clara loved her, too—but there was a rankling jealousy at her heart which spoiled all her better qualities.

"My wife and myself tried to treat the two children as nearly alike as possible—but undoubtedly we did often give the preference to Mary; and if we did, it was sure to cost Clara a flood of passionate tears, and she would reproach her sister with stealing from her our affections. At school, it was the same. The teachers all loved Mary, while they only endured Clara. I would often stifle down the praise which I would have bestowed upon Mary, lest I should rouse her sister's temper, and make us all sufferers. Meek, unassuming as an angel, Mary would never reproach or retort; and while Clara's heart was meditating wrong against her, she would, in all probability, be contriving some pleasant surprise—something for Clara's pleasure.

"Mary was passionately fond of flowers. The peaceful occupation of tending them, seemed especially suited to her gentle nature; and the first of her beautiful roses and carnations were always to be found on Clara's table. Of books, she had also her favorites—and these also formed a part of her willing sacrifices. O, how a father's memory recalls those things, and brings again before him the loved one and lost!

"I can give you no idea of the goodness and loveliness of this child. It seemed as if an angel had come down to earth. Always, some one was saying to us that she would not live to be grown up. But she did live, and in that life, my own and her mother's seemed to be wholly bound up. Her voice was melody itself. Often have I come home at night, and have seen a crowd gathered, still and almost breathless, around the door, to hear her sweet voice, while she, all unconscious that she was heard, would trill out such notes as seldom come from mortal lips.

"I was wealthy enough to purchase every needful advantage for my girls—and I spared no pains or expense to make them accomplished and well educated. They both well repaid me, by their devotion to their studies. In these Clara excelled. It was part of her character, to allow no one to distance her in any attainment. She was highly intellectual, and in all matters of mere acquirement, was the superior of her sister.

"Mary bowed to this superiority. She rejoiced in Clara's excellence, and her evident admiration of her talents, softened the heart of her proud sister. On those occasions, when Mary's heart went out in praise to some emanation of Clara's genius and talents, the latter would seem touched, for awhile, at her involuntary tribute, and return love for love. At such times, I would believe that years would bring more beauty to Clara's soul—that she would forsake the unkindly temper of her childhood, and become more like her sister. I tried to think if aught that I could do, would help this poor child to become better and happier. In her own soul alone, however, lay the remedy. Nothing could help her, unless she would help herself to bear and forbear without repining.

"When Clara was nearly twenty, and Mary was eighteen, Charles Howard came to visit us. He was the son of my dearest friend. I loved his father like a brother. Charles seemed like the impersonation of his father's youth—so noble, so full of generous sentiments, so quick in every lofty purpose. I never knew one except his father, whose character was so self-sustained. I loved the boy with such love, I thought, as I could have bestowed upon a son, had God seen fit to have given me a son. It was like sunlight in our dwelling, this visit of Charles Howard, and when he left us, it seemed as if the darkness had come upon us. He was such a bright, happy, cheerful spirit—he was so rich in "that jewel which no Indian mine can buy—content"—and carried about him such an effluence of happiness, that it was hard to miss his voice, so like music, or his silvery laughter.

"Well, he came again and again. I knew that one of my daughters was his attraction, and I prayed that it might be Clara. The sunshine of his temper might, perhaps, communicate to her, and both might be happy. But just as I thought my wish was about to be granted, I found, to my dismay, that it was Mary. I was not undervalued until he asked me for my daughter. Even then I mistook his purpose, and my assent was so cordial and earnest, that I think the young man was surprised into a feeling of something like distrust of my sincerity. He told me, indeed, afterwards, that he believed me jesting with his too evident anxiety, and that I was willing to turn his offer almost into ridicule.

"How different that offer looked to me, when all was explained, and I found that it was Mary whom he loved! Well as I liked Charles, I could not yet bring my mind to consent that he should bear away my precious child. It was too much; and I lingered and dallied over my answer, until patience would have been exhausted in any one less a lover than himself. Mary, sweet child, had unconsciously given him her heart long before—but she, too, thought that Clara was the one he sought, and she hid her love in her own soul. She would have died rather than to have stood in a sister's path to happiness.

"It was known, before long, that Charles had proposed for Mary. Never shall I forget poor Clara's look when it was announced! She, too, had been deceived by his friendly manner toward her; a manner which was but the result of the kindly feeling which every one connected with Mary, awakened in the young man's heart. I questioned Clara closely, almost hoping to find that he had committed himself to her by some word by which I could bind him to her for life; but even her sanguine disposition and her earnest hopes, could not construe it into anything more than mere passing attentions which might be interpreted either way. But Mary! it was worth a lifetime of anxiety, to see the beautiful happiness which came over that blessed face. Her eyes had the sweet, brooding softness of the dove, and her cheek deepened a little in its rosy tint; and life seemed hallowed and sanctified to her, by the love which was shed, like a radiance, over and around her.

"My poor Clara! now it was that she needed an added tenderness, if she would, but accept it. Alas! she was oldurate in her passionate jealousy, and her love, instead of softening and subduing, only made her harder and more perverse. Hour after hour, would she sit, moody and silent, while Mary, poor girl! would try to wile her from that mood, and impart some of her own gentle nature. Charles urged the marriage on, hoping—for he, too, was well aware of Clara's feelings—that, when that was really decided upon, she would be in peace. In peace! Ah, that restless spirit had no element of peace within its troubled depths!

"I do not know how—I never could divine how it was, but Clara did separate Charles from Mary. She did it with a tact that left her unsuspected, but I afterwards knew that she alone was to blame. Long after she herself was Charles Howard's wife. Long after Mary had gone down with her unsuspecting heart, to this beautiful resting-place, Clara owned to me that it was through her means that they were separated, but even then she would not own what means she took, nor what artifice she employed. Nor did I seek to know. The 'grave covers all unkindness.'

"Mary did not die because of Charles Howard's desertion,—another cause hid her low; yet Clara will never cease to reproach herself. O! she is so altered! Her pride is all subdued now, and she is meek and gentle as a little child. It was she who caused this stone to be raised, and the inscription is her own. She never comes here—for the association is too bitter to be often renewed; but it was by her direction that this beautiful sweet briar was planted. In vain we assure her that Mary died from illness with which the heart had nothing to do. She still believes that she alone caused her death."

There is a world where the sisters will meet again—where all differences will be explained, all wounds healed, all hearts set at rest. Time—the restorer—the healer of wounds—the drier of tears—Eternity—that vast ocean in which all meaner things will be overwhelmed,—will at last restore them to each other. Until then, thou poor, weeping father! wait and hope!

Be true to your own highest convictions. Intimations from our own souls, of something more perfect than others teach, if faithfully followed, give a consciousness of spiritual force and progress never experienced by the vulgar of high life or low life, who march along as they are drilled, to the step of their times.

PELEG W. CHANDLER, ESQ.

The accompanying likeness of Mr. Chandler was drawn for us by Mr. Hill, from an admirable photograph by Masury, Silsbee & Case. Peleg Whitman Chandler was born at New Gloucester, Maine, April 12, 1816. He received his preliminary classical training at Bangor Seminary, and then entered Bowdoin College, an institution which has sent forth many eminent men. He graduated with honor in 1834. He then entered Cambridge Law School, and continued his legal studies in the office of Theophilus Parsons, Esq., in this city. For a number of years Mr. Chandler furnished the Boston Daily Advertiser with reports of law cases in the higher courts, and these were remarkable for their accuracy and perspicuity. In 1837, he was admitted to the bar. After having served three years as a member of the city council, he was its president in 1844. From 1840 to 1846, he was a member of the House of Representatives, displaying in that position marked ability, sound sense, and great aptitude for business. In 1848, he was chosen city solicitor, and while he held that important office, performed its duties in the most acceptable manner. Mr. Chandler projected that admirable and valuable publication, the Law Reporter, and conducted it for ten years, winning an enviable reputation by the vigor and purity of his style and the extent and accuracy of his legal knowledge. Among the valuable and important papers he prepared for that journal, is an elaborate review of the famous D'Hauteville case, which will be found in the volume for 1841. Among his other works may be mentioned his "American Criminal Trials," re-published in London, and highly spoken of by the press. Mr. Chandler is also known by other publications of a legal character. His oration, delivered July 4, 1844, is a highly creditable performance of an original character. It is a calm, well-considered production, abounding in sound philosophical views, expressed with great vigor. Mr. Chandler is a close reasoner and an able writer. There is a great deal of epigrammatic terseness in his style. His reputation is established on a sound and enduring basis. Mr. Chandler, by his various law publications, has rendered a great service to the profession of which he is an ornament, and his labors have been highly appreciated. As an author, he never aims at what is called "fine writing," which is one of the most prominent literary sins of the day. We have few writers of purer English among us.

CAPE WAGON.

In No. 7 of the present volume, we presented, among other characteristic sketches of the Cape of Good Hope, a picture of a Cape Wagoner. We now add a spirited sketch of a Cape Wagon, with its almost interminable team of oxen and bullocks, winding their way along one of the vast plains of South Africa. The wagoners are furnished with whips of enormous length, the stocks being of cane-pole, so that they are enabled without moving, to reach with the lash a large number of animals. Though not particularly unkind to their animals, they are very fond of wielding this official badge and of cracking it most ostentatiously whenever a European appears in sight. The country over which these wagons travel is of a difficult character, and it frequently requires the utmost exertions of a team like that depicted in our engraving, to get the wagon through the miry places in which they occasionally settle.

"WASSAIL BOWLE, OR GRACE CUP."

Wassail, or was-heal, in Saxon, signifies your health, and is now used in a very limited sense, and only at the time of Christmas. It anciently signified mirth and festivity in general; and in this sense it occurs in Shakspeare, as follows:

"The king doth wake to-night, and take his rouse, Keeps wassail, and the swaggering upspring reels."

And Milton likewise says:

"I'm loth to meet the rudeness and swilled insolence
Of such late wassailers."

Wassailing was a great ceremony at Court on Twelfth Night, in the reign of Henry VII. "When the steward cometh in at the doore with the wassel, he must crie three times 'wassell, wassel, wassel,' and then the chaplain was to answer with a good song." In a very old house at Bexley, in Kent, is an oaken chimney-piece, on which is carved a wassel bowle, resting on the branches of an apple tree. On one side is the word wassheil, and on the other seinheile; it is at least as old as the fourteenth century. The custom of throwing toast, and pouring out libations to apple trees for proving a fruitful year, was called wassel; the term is still applied to the drinking songs sung in the cider counties on the eve of Epiphany, when the ceremony is performed. In Holderness, and other parts of Yorkshire, it is the custom to carry about with the wassel cup an image of our Saviour, together with a quantity of roasted apples, so that this custom has been restricted to the convivial season of Christmas, and the custom of roasting apples on Christmas Eve still continues in some districts. The origin of the term wassel is traced to the story of Vortigern and Rowena, the daughter of Hengist. On their first interview, she kneeled before him, and presenting a cup of wine, said, "Hlaford Kynning waes-heil!"—i. e., Lord King, health be to you! The king being unacquainted with the Saxon language, asked the meaning of the terms, and being told that they wished his health, and that he should answer by saying drink heil, he did so, and commanded her to drink; then taking the cup, he kissed the damsel, and pledged her. From this custom long remained in Britain, whoever drank to another at a feast said, watch heil, and he that received the cup, answered, drink heil. The wassel songs were sung during the festivities of Christmas, and in earlier times, by the itinerant minstrels, of whom, with the practice, some remains may be traced in our present wails and carols. One of these songs is preserved in the British Museum.—A wassail bowle, or cup, was anciently placed on the table of Princes as well as Abbots. In the 11th volume of Archaeologia, there is an engraving of one which formerly belonged to Glastonbury Abbey, and a dissertation upon it is by Dr. Milner. The inside (which holds two quarts) is furnished with eight pegs, at equal distances, one below the other, in conformity to Edgar's law to repress excess in drinking. This measurement allowed of half a pint to each person. There is one now to be seen at Mr. Greenall's, Great Common Street, Soho. In the preface to the history of "Tom Thumbe, the Little," published in the year 1621, is the following passage:—"Now you must imagine me to sit by a good fire, amongst a company of good fellows, over a well spiced wassel bowle of Christmas ale, telling of these merrie tales which hereafter followe."

WHAT WORKING MEN HAVE DONE.

But some may say, "Why give working people time to think? What good use can they make of it?" Let us see what they have done. Take general literature. Look at Daniel Defoe, the author of "Robinson Crusoe," one of the greatest writers of prose fiction that ever lived; he began life as a hosier, and was almost wholly self-taught. William Cobbett, the great master of racy Saxon English, was in early life a farmer's boy, and afterwards a common soldier. Isaac Walton, the pleasing biographer and "complete angler," was a huen draper. Then in science: Thomas Simpson, the distinguished mathematician, wrought, for the greater part of his life, as a weaver. Captain Cook, one of the most scientific of English sailors, and a very pleasing writer, was wholly self-taught. His father, a poor peasant, learned to read when he was turned of seventy, in order that he might be able to peruse his son's voyages. Arkwright, subsequently Sir Richard, the inventor of the cotton spinning machine, was a poor man, and commenced life as a barber. James Brindley, the author of canal navigation in England, the first who tunneled great hills, and brought ships across navigable rivers on bridges, was a millwright. Herschell, subsequently Sir William, originally a musician in a Hanoverian regiment, became a skilful optician and a great astronomer. To him Campbell refers in the well-known line:

"Gave to the lyre of heaven another string."

Then for the fine arts. Chantry was a milk and butter boy, and his first mouldings were in softer material than marble. Sir Thomas Lawrence was the son of an inn-keeper, and wholly self-taught. John Opie was found by Dr. Walcott working in a saw-pit. William Hogarth, the greatest master of character that ever developed his ideas by means of the pencil, served his apprenticeship to an engraving silversmith, and commenced his professional career by engraving coats of arms and shop bills. Then in poetry. Gifford, the first editor of the "Quarterly," began life as a poor sailor boy, and afterwards served an apprenticeship to a shoemaker. Bloomfield—pardon me for calling him the English Burns—wrote his best poem, the "Farmer's Boy," while he, too, worked in a garret as a shoemaker. "Ben Jonson," says Fuller, in his "English Worthies," "worked for some time as a bricklayer and mason. He helped to build the new structure of Lincoln's Inn, when, having a trowel in his hand, he had a book in his pocket." Shakspeare, your own Will Shakspeare, was a poor man's son; his father could not write his name, and his cross or mark still exists in the record of Stratford-on-Avon to attest the fact. The poet's own education seems to have been very limited, and tradition describes him as having lived for a time by very humble employments. Then turn we to theology, the highest range of all. The two Millers, Doctor Isaac, dean of Carlisle, and his brother Joseph, author of the well known "History of the Church," began life as weavers. Dr. Prideaux, author of the "Connection," and bishop of Worcester, got his education by entering Oxford as a kitchen-boy. John Bunyan, the greatest master of allegory and author of the second best book in all the world, was a self-taught tinker. These be some of England's best working men, who have thought, and thought to some purpose. These be some of your hosiers, and linen-drappers, and millwrights, and masons, and sawyers, and shoemakers, and weavers, and barbers, and tinkers. Is England proud of them? Well she may be. Does she want more of them? She needs them all. Then let England give her working men time to think; for the man's sake, for the master's sake, for England's sake—for God's sake.—London Lectures.

ALEXANDER OF RUSSIA.

The present emperor seems disposed to depart from the habits of his deceased father on one more point than has hitherto been noticed—he permits petitions to be presented to him when out walking or driving. The wife of an officer, who felt his just claims to promotion unfairly passed over, lately addressed the emperor when out walking early one morning, and made him acquainted with all the circumstances connected with the case by word of mouth. The emperor immediately proceeded with her to the war office, and had the papers she adverted to laid before him, and in the course of a few days, everything had been arranged to the satisfaction of the bold petitioner.—New York Courier and Enquirer.

A PHANTASY.

BY "GAY RUMHOLDT."

I dreamed it was night by the sleeping sea,
And the stars were sinking away to rest;
And I thought that proud kings were humbled to me,
That proud nations trembled at my behest.

In a moment a ship arose from the sea,
'Twas a fairy ship with a cloud of sail,
And it sped on and onward right gallantly,
As if borne on the wings of a tempest gale.

There were echoes of laughter and songs of love
That came to my ears—high sounds of gloe—
As like a bright cloud of evening she drove O'er the curling waves of the wakening sea.

Onward and on! and a hurricane swept Onward and on o'er the place where I stood,
Onward and on, till the fairy thing leapt
Like a wild thing of life from the maddening flood.

Onward and on, like a bird of the sea,
It topped the waves of the ether air,
A moment—then dashed down breathlessly,—
And vanished like rime in the sun's fierce glare.

THE CANADIAN FUGITIVE.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

It was a soft, warm day in early summer. The glorious beauty of the season bore no sign of approaching decay, but all over the green earth's broad bosom were sunshine and loveliness. No cloud was in the summer sky—no gloom in the cool, sweet depths of the glorious old woods that skirted the city, and spread its dark, green foliage miles and miles away towards the broad river.

There had been tokens of an insurgent spirit among the Canadians for some months. Secret meetings had been held, arms provided, and the watchword was only needed to arouse the lion hearts longing to achieve the deeds they fondly hoped would lead to independence. Of these hearts, Simon Duncombe was the strongest and bravest. By common consent, he had put himself into the foremost rank, and was allowed to retain his position without a rival. At once statesman and soldier, with judgment and experience to mark out the path for himself and others, and bravery to lead them on, each insurgent involuntarily looked to Duncombe, as to the gallant leader who, in some way, was to gain the prize for which their souls panted.

Every one knows how this ill-fated struggle ended—how powerless was the insurgent force against the serried ranks of England's army. But perhaps few know what became of the brave Duncombe—of him who left his blood in streams upon the streets of Montreal; and who, not until his associates were all cut down by the bayonets of the soldiers, or were made prisoners, sought to secure his own immediate safety.

Hastening unperceived from the melee, he succeeded in gaining his own house, where he remained until evening, with his wife and children clustering about him, deploring the fate that was about to separate them perhaps forever. For the brave associates who had fallen by his side, there was an honorable grave. For him, in perspective, there was only the traitor's death. It could not be! No rope should ever touch the free neck of Simon Duncombe; and although his brave heart swelled at the thought of flying ignominiously from his family and friends, still it was the only alternative, and he felt compelled to embrace it.

In the depths of the forest was a cave which he believed was unknown to any person but himself and his eldest daughter, who had frequently accompanied him on his exploring or hunting expeditions. To this place he resolved to trust himself for a few weeks, or at least until the storm raised by the insurrection should have blown over, or the hot pursuit which would probably be made for him should have abated.

In the dead of night he left his wife and Constance weeping bitterly at the necessity of this painful separation. Sadly, and yet with a step that did not once falter, he passed around the beds of his sleeping children, kissed their bright, rosy lips and fair, waxen eyelids again and again, pressed his wife and daughter to his bosom in a long and lingering embrace, and was off under the clear depths of the midnight sky to his lonely place in the deep wood. Thither his daughter promised to go on certain days, and keep him supplied with fresh food.

"But the danger to Constance, Simon—have you thought of that?" Mrs. Duncombe had tearfully asked of him.

"All, all has been in my thoughts, Mary," he answered, "and provided for, as far as possible. Constance will show you the little case of pistols which I have given her; and she has had experience enough in our excursions through the woods, to avail herself of her skill in fire-arms to defend herself should she be attacked by any animal; and I do not apprehend any danger from pursuit in that part of the wood through which she will have to pass. Take courage, Mary! God will protect the right!"

It was the third morning after Simon Duncombe had left his house, and judging that by this time the food he had carried away was consumed, Constance prepared herself for a walk through the woods. She took with her a brother of about ten or eleven years old, both as a companion, and also to give a color to the story she might be forced to tell respecting the food. Taking care to select provisions that would afford the most nourishment with the least bulk, she divided it with Roland, first making it into small packages, that could be easily disposed about the person.

Roland was a bright, intelligent, little fellow, who almost worshipped his sister Constance. And indeed Constance Duncombe was a sister to be proud of. Handsome, dignified, yet without a touch of vanity or haughtiness; modest and delicate, yet with a smack of her father's brave and indomitable spirit; fleet and agile as a young fawn, from her health-giving exercise, taken in the woods and on the mountain tops with her father, in his wandering hours, yet graceful in every movement as the most courtly lady in the queen's household, Constance, at nineteen, was almost matchless in the rich gifts of her beauty and goodness.

Nor was she less fond of the beautiful boy, who already gave promise of a life that should be rich with the affluence of his beauty and genius. It was rare hearing the boy converse with his sister, as he now did, upon the probable fate of his father. That he would escape—would go to America—would there become a great, free and glorious leader of thousands, seemed to be in the boy's mind. Such faith on the part of a few more of such brave hearts as those who drenched Montreal with their blood, would have made Duncombe at this moment the leader of a mighty host, or the ruler of a people.

"And now, sister Constance," he continued, "how long do you suppose papa will have to stay in that horrid cave?"

"Not horrid, Roland! The cave is a very good hiding-place for papa. Do not think of it so, Roland; it will make you unhappy. Papa and myself have stayed in that cave through a tremendous thunder-shower, but yet it did not seem gloomy to me."

"That is because you are such a famous hunter, Constance. Wasn't it a pity that you were not a boy? You would have made such a glorious huntsman; and perhaps Mr. Morton up at the Lodge would have let you marry his daughter."

"Why, Roland, do you consider that as the greatest happiness?"

"Why, Constance, Agnes Morton looks like an angel! Did you ever see such beautiful eyes? They seem to look right into my heart."

Constance could not even smile at her brother's enthusiasm, so much did she regret his too mature nature. "Whoo! the god's love, die early," she had often heard it said; and always she thought of that mournful prophecy, when Roland was the subject of her meditations. And certainly there was room to fear that the boy-poet—his whose thoughts ran into verse, even before he had learned to write them down—would not be very long-lived. Already he had addressed stanza after stanza to Agnes Morton, who had become spiritualized and holy to the boy's poetic imagination. Leading the subject back to his father, Constance tried to interest him in her description of the cave, and thus beguiled their weary walk.

An hour's smart walking brought them before it, and then Constance began to tremble. What if her father had never found his way hither during that night? What if he might already have been tracked and imprisoned? For a moment her strength failed her; but in faith and hope she sprang forward, lifted the tangled brushwood that hid the mouth of the cave, and entered, to find herself and her brother clasped in their father's arms.

He looked careworn and thin; and it was with a strong effort, that he could appear cheerful before the children. His wounds were partly healed, and Constance helped him to dress them with the bandages she had brought with her. A part of his sufferings had proceeded from this circumstance; and now that the wounds were easier, he wore a more cheerful aspect. Hour after hour elapsed, and still the children stayed on. They could not bear to leave their father alone, and Roland seriously proposed remaining with him.

"That will not do, my son," said his father. "Constance would, in that case, be obliged to go home alone. I sleep here, too, much more comfortably than if I had a child to protect. So, go home, my good children, and come to me again in three days."

As she emerged from the deep underwood that sheltered the mouth of the cave, Constance fancied that she heard another step than her own or Roland's. Nor was she mistaken; for before she had gone many yards she encountered Duncan Law, a half-crazed, half-idiotic fellow, who lived at the outer edge of the wood, and whose wandering propensities were well known to herself and her father, who frequently met him in their rambles. She could not tell by his countenance whether he suspected anything or not. He did not look surprised to see her in that place, but he looked rather strangely at the boy, whom he had never seen there before.

"An' whar's your braw father, Miss Constance?" said Donald, in his broad Scotch voice and accent. "He doesna hunt in the woods as he did lang syne."

"No, Donald," she answered, kindly. "Papa has been wounded, and has gone away from home to recover. We hope he will be able to be about and well before long."

The "innocent" nodded, and Constance fancied that he directed a furtive glance in the direction of the cave. Scarcely had she time to take in this thought, which was in itself unwelcome, if not positively alarming, before a man dressed as a soldier appeared at the opposite side of the wood. He started at seeing the odd group, but recovered his presence of mind, and blew a small whistle, which hung at his belt. Another appeared; and so much time elapsed after that, that Constantine felt reassured by the thought that there were no more to come. These two confronted the idiot, who drew his face into such a hopeless, senseless look, that the men fairly smiled.

"A pretty enemy to attack, Bill!" said the one who came at the sound of the whistle. "No wonder you were afraid! Formidable foes—a fool, a girl, and an infant! Well said some of our fellows at mess the other day, that Bill Herkimer was a good scout, but a bad fighter!"

"Don't say that again, Joshua, or you will find Bill Herkimer's courage somewhere about your long, lean carcass."

"Well, well, Bill, put your courage in your pocket now, for I don't think you will need it here. But you must speak to the enemy. I am too bashful. The girl looks as if she was the leader. Faith, she is a pyout one, I know!"

All this Constance heard, and then, taking Roland by the hand, and beckoning Duncan to follow, she took up the line of march, and passed directly in front of the soldiers. Such were her dignity of manner and the air of conscious superiority she wore, that they stood amazed, not offering to move until she was entirely out of sight.

"I say, Bill, that must be the quacco, God bless her!" said Joshua. "No common 'oman could look and walk like that. What's your opinion?"

"Don't speak to me, Josh. I am consamedly flastrated; and if we've done wrong in not taking her before the lieutenant, I can't help it. I couldn't touch her, and she looking so grand all the time!"

Meantime, Constance and her companions made what haste they could out of the woods. She saw that Donald trembled and grew pale at the sight of the soldiers, and this determined her not to follow a plan which she had half conceived in her mind, of trusting him with her father's retreat, so that, in case of anything happening unexpectedly to herself in the way of capture, she would have no apprehensions of his starving to death in the cave, or running the risk of being taken by leaving it.

She charged Roland not to tell her mother that there was any danger to be dreaded, but determined to go more frequently to the wood and watch. Under pretence of gathering roots, she carried a small basket and a knife, and equipped Roland with a similar outfit, taking care to have the knives well ground. As she entered the house, she uttered almost a scream of delighted surprise at seeing the guest who was with her mother. The stranger rose and clasped her in his arms. It was Roderic Heathfield, the long-acknowledged lover of Constance, and the special favorite of all the Duncombe family, from the father down to little Kitty. And well he might be, for, bating a little family pride, Roderic was a very noble fellow, and his love for Constance Duncombe was fast outgrowing all his little defects of character springing out of this very quality of pride.

"Thank Heaven, that you are come, Roderic," said Constance. "Now indeed I shall have no fear"—feeling assured that her mother had explained her father's position.

"I came because I heard such exaggerated stories of the quelling of the insurgents," he said. "Maury told me at Quebec, that your father had been among the killed, and that his family had fled from Montreal. I was almost frantic until I reached this place. I would have gone immediately to meet you, had not your mother assured me that I should not find my way to the cave."

Constance's happiness had now but one drawback, and that was her father's situation; and the danger of this, too, faded away before her lover's glowing description of the beautiful scenery of American landscapes, the glory of American sunsets, and the priceless worth of American freedom. Constance listened, and drank in the desire of seeing her father safe in one of those highly favored spots which he described so glowingly. Roderic must, of course, return soon, and whatever was to be done, must be done quickly. No time was to be lost. She must visit the cave the next morning early, and make preparations for her father's escape.

At dawn the next morning, Roderic and Constance went to the cave, carrying a suit of boatman's clothes for Mr. Duncombe. Dressing himself in these, they found, to their great satisfaction, that the disguise, assisted by a brown wig, fitted over his black hair, would be impenetrable.

Their plan was for him to steal from the cave at night, and meet them at the river side before dawn. They would touch at a given point with a boat, while Roderic, who should be similarly dressed, should in reality perform the labor of rowing, while Mr. Duncombe should appear to relieve him. Thus, if they were seen on the river, they would be apparently conveying the old lady, whom Constance was dressed to represent, her various trunks, packages and boxes down the river.

Under the very eyes of a sentinel, who was pacing his slow, sleepy walk, at the breaking of the day, they shot off into the stream, and when at last he strained his dull vision, as the muffled oars dipped in the water and gently dripped the sparkling drops from their blades, he was greeted with the mortifying sight of two men with red flannel shirts, and what seemed to be a bundle of shawls lying in the boat.

"Sold, by heaven!" was his half drowsy exclamation; but he concluded to keep his own counsel, although he shrewdly suspected that some escape had been made which should have come under his surveillance.

Row on, brave oarsmen! the danger is over!

On the banks of a glorious river in the New World, a neat, white villa, cushioned in its embowering green, rises with such a perfect affluence of beauty upon the eye of the passing voyager, that he longs to land and thread with his footsteps its vine-covered walks, and listen to the tinkling music of its fountains.

Here dwells the fugitive, Simon Duncombe. Here also are Roderic and Constance, long since married. And here, too, is the boy-poet, filling his pages with inspiration drawn from the beautiful scenery around him. Hush! he is reading his poetry to Agnes Morton, who has come from her Canadian home to bless with her angel eyes the home of Roland Duncombe! All are here—Simon's gentle wife, now passing into the quiet beauty of a peaceful sunset; little Kitty, now grown into the image of Constance; and a group of older, but graceful and handsome, brothers and sisters are seated together on the broad piazza, watching the gay steamers as they hurry on their course upon the noble river.

SANITARY STATISTICS.

The sanitary survey of Massachusetts gives pulmonary statistics of all New England, which shows that the usual average of about one death in five, from all diseases, occurs from pulmonary diseases, in the mountains and hills of Vermont and New Hampshire, as well as in the interior of New York and the Middle States, and that the same ratio, for a series of years, holds good on the seacoast, and in the cities of Boston and New York. Boston, from its population of one hundred and fifty thousand, loses by consumption about fifteen per week, sixty-five per month, or about seven hundred and eighty per annum; New England not less than twenty thousand; and with the State of New York added, the victims of this single disease swell to forty thousand a year. WAGON HALT NEAR PRESBURG, HUNGARY.

HUNGARIAN SKETCHES.

We present on this page two striking views in Hungary. One represents a halt of Hungarian wagoners near the city of Presburg. Their shaggy horses, the wild figures and peculiar dresses of the men, make up a group of great interest. Some are lounging on the grass, too weary even to light their pipes; others are enjoying the luxury of tobacco. The only busy person in the group is a man who is mending his sandal. These men are peasants. The Hungarian peasants wear, summer and winter, their sheepskins, dressed with the wool on, except that in the summer the wool is turned outside; but every one strives to assume something of a soldier's dress, as spurs, heavy riding-boots, or hussar jackets. The women generally have handsome faces, with an air of melancholy about them. The people, children of a wild and romantic country, have much of the fiery temper of the south, and are fierce, proud, and eager to resent an insult. They have always been reputed the best soldiers of the Austrian army. In the distance, the profile of the city, with its castled eminence, rises boldly against the sky. Presburg is on the frontiers of Hungary, 46 miles from Vienna, and 75 from Pesth. The adjoining country is quite healthy, and the very reverse of the Hungarian countries properly speaking, and the country between the Danube and Theiss, and beyond this mighty river, where frequent swamps and morasses intersect the arable land. Here, too, lies Debreczin, a large unpaved village; and Kerskemet, proverbial for its mad, which proved fatal to so many Austrian men and horses during the Hungarian revolution. In the castle, on the hill, above the city of Presburg, the States formerly assembled; and in the Cathedral of St. Martin the kings of Hungary were crowned. The town is very ancient and pleasantly situated on the Danube. The fortifications are of a secondary order. Our second engraving represents a Hungarian wagon, a peculiar conveyance of the country, heavily laden with wices. It moves but slowly on its broad wheels along the sandy roads near the Platten Lake, where chaussées and artificial roads are unknown. The kingdom of Hungary, united under the same civil government as determined after the peace of 1815, comprehends Hungary (Proper), Slavonia and Croatia; to the last of which the circle of Carlstadt (previously part of Illyria) and the Hungarian littoral, or sea coast, were annexed in 1822. The military frontier, though geographically a part of Hungary, is under a peculiar and entirely distinct form of government. The kingdom, within the above limits, is bounded on the north by Moravia, Silesia and Galicia; on the east by Transylvania; on the south by the military frontier (which separates it from Turkey), and by the Gulf of Quarnero; and on the west by Illyria, Styria, Lower Austria and Moravia. There is, perhaps, no country of the same extent which contains such a variety of nations as Hungary. The Magyars, or proper Hungarians, are originally an Asiatic people; there are also Wallachians, Armenians, Germans, Italians, Jews, Servians, and a medley of tribes, distinguished by names not easily accommodated to English orthography or English pronunciation; Russiaks, Slovaks, Croats, and Wendians, improperly called Vandals—these four and the Servians being of Slavonic origin. The face of the country is extremely varied. The northern and western parts of the kingdom are very mountainous. The Carpathians on the north, and the Alps on the frontier south of the Danube, surround almost the whole kingdom, like a girdle, and send out numerous branches, which cover nearly thirty-three counties. These heights enclose beautiful valleys, drained by large and small rivers, verdant meadows, rich corn fields, fruitful gardens, vineyards many leagues in extent, and vast forests. While one part of the kingdom is covered with mountains, another spreads out into interminable plains, some resembling the Pampas of South America, and others being oceans of sand like the Sahara; whilst in the mountains are innumerable caverns, many of them of great beauty. Hungary is particularly favored by nature. It is one of the healthiest countries of Europe. Protected from the north winds by high mountains, it is open to the mild sea breezes from the south, which are tempered by great bodies of water. The soil is very fertile. Among its agricultural productions are all kinds of grain, maize, rice, garden vegetables and plants, melons, plums, grapes, woods, gallants, tobacco, hemp, flax, hops, saffron, madder, somach, cotton and rhubarb. Horses, cattle, sheep and hogs are raised in great number. In the north the forests abound with game, and sturgeon and salmon are plentiful in the rivers. Honey and silk are produced in great quantities. Among the minerals are gold, iron, lead, zinc, cobalt, antimony, sulphur, alum, vitriol, coals and peat. Among the precious stones, the opal and chalcodony are remarkably beautiful. No country has so many mineral and medicinal springs. The Hungarian has a natural inclination to the agricultural and the breeding of cattle. Both agriculture and cattle-breeding, however, are still in their infancy; but the inexhaustible fertility of nature supplies every deficiency of industry and skill. It must be remembered that Hungary is, after all, but thinly populated, that the Hungarian peasant has no property in the soil, and that foreign commerce is checked.

THE STATE OF RHODE ISLAND.

The beautiful emblematic design on this page is from the pencil of the gifted Billings, and is one of the most felicitous of the many drawings with which he has enriched the Pictorial. In the centre are the State-arms—simple and expressive—the anchor with the legend "Hope." This is surmounted by a view of the famous old round tower at Newport, which our romance would fain believe to be the fortress of a northern Viking, in spite of the prosaic explanation that it undoubtedly was a mill. On the left is seen a galley filled with Northmen pushing for the shores of the Narragansett, thus illustrating the legendary story of the past. On the right is a scene illustrating the modern condition of the State—two men drilling rocks, a factory in the distance, a lighthouse on a headland, and a railroad train arriving. At the base and around the vignettes are vines and other emblematic ornaments; among them the spear, sword and winged helmet of the Northman, the earliest visitor to the shores of North America. This State is the smallest in the Union. It lies between 42° and 43° north latitude, and 71° and 72° west longitude from London, comprising an area of 1306 square miles. About a tenth part of the area is water, a very considerable portion of the remainder islands. The islands are generally fertile, while a large portion of the main land is rough and unfitted for cultivation. The largest and most beautiful of the islands is the island of Rhode Island, in Narragansett Bay, fifteen miles long by three-and-a-half wide. Its fertility and the salubrity of its climate, has gained for it the name of the "Eden of America." Narragansett Bay, which extends some thirty miles into the State, affords excellent harbors along its whole length, of which that of Newport is not excelled by any in the United States. This circumstance at one time gave rise to the belief that Newport would be the commercial capital of the Union. Formerly Rhode Island ships visited all parts of the world, and they were the second, if not the first, to display the American flag in the Chinese ports. But within the last half century the commerce of the State has declined, and capital been changed to manufactures and the mechanic arts. More persons are now engaged in the cotton manufacture than in any other business. Education has received close attention in the State, though it does not possess the same resources as other States for making appropriations, having no public lands. A State normal school was established in 1854. Brown University at Providence is an institution of high repute, which has sent forth many accomplished scholars. The State owes no debt except what it has used of the United States surplus revenue. The Butler insane hospital at Providence can accommodate 145 patients. A large sum is annually appropriated for the education of deaf, dumb and blind persons, who are sent to Hartford, to South Boston and elsewhere. The liberty of conscience always allowed in this State has led to the establishment of every denomination of Christians. The population, by the last census, was 147,545. Roger Williams and his associates commenced the first settlement at Providence in 1636.

OR, THE

YOUNG AMERICAN SOLDIER.

A TALE OF 1812.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

CHAPTER V.

RICHMOND TAKEN CAPTIVE BY THE INDIANS.

WILTON RICHMOND had heard that Bessie had gone from her Uncle Grosvenor's, but this did not prevent him from calling as had been anticipated. It was the first time there had been an opportunity for him to call after his journey, though several messages had passed between him and the two cousins.

As he entered the parlor, Mr. Grosvenor was unfolding a newspaper, that moment received. The first words which met his eye caused a glow of enthusiasm to overspread his countenance. He waved his hand to Wilton to be seated, and then commenced reading in earnest and eager tones.

"BRILLIANT NAVAL VICTORY."

"On the nineteenth inst., off the coast of Massachusetts, the United States frigate Constitution, commanded by Captain Isaac Hull, fell in with the British frigate Guerriere, commanded by Captain Daecres. After an action of thirty minutes, the Guerriere struck her colors, every mast and spar having been shot away, and one third of her crew either killed or wounded, while the loss of the American frigate was only seven killed and seven wounded. The damage sustained by the Constitution was so slight that she was ready for action the following day, while so complete was the wreck of the Guerriere that she was set fire to and burnt."

"There's a little comfort in that," said Wilton, "after the shameless surrender of Detroit."

"Yes," was Mr. Grosvenor's reply. "The British may yet find that they reckoned without their host, when they boasted that the whole of the American navy would be soon swept from the ocean. But Edith, my child, how pale you are. One would think that your sympathies were with the enemy rather than with your countrymen."

Edith replied only by a faint smile, for a short time since she had heard—in an indirect way, it was true—that Sedley Austin had been transferred from the British sloop-of-war to which he had been conveyed by the press-gang, to a frigate called the Guerriere. If the information should prove to be correct, the hope that he was restored to freedom was more than counterbalanced by the fear she entertained that he was among those who had fallen. The bare thought of the suspense which she might be subjected to, unless some means, to her unavailable, were resorted to for ascertaining the truth, was almost insupportable.

Wilton, with that truer instinct in such matters natural at his time of life, as well as by that keener perception resulting from having the deeper and purer founts of his soul stirred by an ardent and honorable attachment, was quicker than Mr. Grosvenor to comprehend in some degree, the cause of Edith's emotion.

"It is but natural," said he, addressing her, finding that her father was engaged in reading the newspaper, "that the account of this naval battle should bring to mind our friend Sedley, who, it cannot be denied, may, sooner or later, be subjected to the painful necessity of bearing arms against his own country."

"He has already been subjected to it, there is but too good reason to fear," was her reply.

"He couldn't have been aboard the Guerriere?"

"I have heard that he was, and, as I believe, from a reliable source. The circumstance was mentioned incidentally, in a letter sent to a lady of this country by a gentleman in England, and forwarded from Canada a long time after it was written."

"I shouldn't wonder then, if we see him in a few days."

"If he is alive and well, you mean—but that can hardly be expected."

"I will make every inquiry it is possible to make, at once. I cannot leave my post, or I would go in person to inquire into the matter. But if I cannot go myself, I can find some one who will. You shall not, longer than necessity compels, be tortured with suspense."

"I will not attempt to tell you how deeply I appreciate your considerate kindness. Your own heart will tell you better than I can. If I could only bring myself to entertain even a faint hope that he escaped uninjured, I would try to wait patiently during the time which must necessarily elapse before he could be here. But even at the risk of your thinking me superstitious, I will confess that I feel as certain that he is either dead or dangerously wounded, as if a messenger had been sent to tell me."

"Dear Edith, don't indulge in feelings, I beg of you, which are but the effect of that nervous excitement naturally superinduced by listening to the account of the engagement between the two frigates."

"What I feel is a presentiment, and has no connection with nervous excitement. It was the same before I listened to the description my father read, as it is now."

"Instead of presentiment, wouldn't superstition be the better word?"

Edith shook her head, and tears came into her eyes.

"Forgive me, dear Edith, but you, yourself, are aware that you are subject, more or less, to influences both natural and moral, which have a tendency to promote feelings of superstition. Only a short time since, you repeated to Bessie and me, some of the wild legends about wriths and winding-sheets told you by your old housekeeper, who, as I think you mentioned, passed the first twenty years of her life in the highlands of Scotland, where the scenery, wild as it was, could not be wilder or faller of savage grandeur, than many a mountain-pass or deep glen within fifteen or twenty minutes' walk of your home."

"All this may have had a certain influence, I grant," said Edith, "but could hardly have produced the vivid picture I saw last night. You would call it a dream, but to me it was a reality, and what my father read in the paper was but a cold description of what I beheld last night."

"Which was nothing more nor less than the reproduction of what, owing to your anxiety on Sedley's account, has, I dare say, often been present to your imagination."

At this moment Mr. Grosvenor looked up from his paper.

"Wilton," said he, "since I last saw you, I've made up my mind to strike a blow for my country. I saw a little service near the close of the Revolution, and though I was young—not over eighteen—I believe I was never known to flinch. I don't take to myself much credit on that account, however, for I candidly think it requires more courage to run away than to stand your ground. At any rate, if the ardor of youth be a little subdued, I trust I shan't—according to the example set so recently by one in an elevated station—prove to be a recreant."

"That, sir," said Wilton, "is a word which no one dare couple with your name. By some hints I the other day heard thrown out, I am certain that your willingness to accept it, is all that need be known to insure your being offered the commission of a lieutenant-colonel."

"I expected that, by this time, commissions of every kind were pretty much disposed of. If so, I can serve as a common soldier. Better and abler men than I am have not hesitated to do so. When I think of the shameful excuses and the miserable subterfuges resorted to by many of those who sit in high places, as reasons for withholding the men from duties of such vital importance to the country, I've no patience. The governors of several of the States, I've been told, have actually withheld the militia, when called for by the president."

"Under the pretence," said Wilton, "that the officers of the general government have no power over the militia, until consigned to their authority by the State executive."

"Yes, and that even then they cannot be compelled to march beyond the boundary of the republic. But you are silent, my daughter," said he, turning to Edith. "You are too much of a patriot, I know, to wish your father to remain idly at home."

"I ought not to wish it," she replied. "I even feel that I am to be envied when compared with Bessie, who has so little cause to be proud of her father."

"I couldn't have thought," said Mr. Grosvenor, "that my brother Hamlen would take the course he has. Whatever opinion as to the expediency of the measure may be entertained, now that war is declared, he who doesn't go heart and hand with his country is, to say the least, but one remove from a traitor. The most sacred of all authorities says, that 'he who is not with us, is against us.'"

A servant now put his head into the room and told Mr. Grosvenor that some one in another apartment wished to see him. After he withdrew Wilton remained half an hour longer, chatting on various subjects connected with Bessie and Sedley Austin. When, at last, he rose to go, he promised Edith to lose no time in endeavoring to ascertain Sedley's fate.

"Don't take the path through the woods, Wilton," said Edith, as, mounting his horse, he rode up to the open window where she was sitting. "I have been told that they are swarming with Indians."

"I thought of taking it, the distance that way is so much shorter," was his reply. "I hardly think I should incur much risk. I have a pair of pistols carefully loaded, and I'm not a bad marksman."

"But your skill in that respect is useless, unless you can see your mark. The way through the woods is so narrow—nothing more than a bridle path, you know—that even at noonday the sun can't pierce through the thickly interlacing branches overhead. The stars, bright as they are, cannot penetrate the darkness."

"Well, since you desire it, I will take the open road. If the way is longer, it is easier and better, and an hour's brisk ride will take me to my quarters."

"When shall you have time to ride over again?"

"In the course of a week, I think. By that time there may be a line from Bessie, and possibly, from our friend Sedley."

Wilton once more bid Edith good-night, and then, starting his horse into a canter, was soon out of sight. It was not long, however, before he lost himself in one of those waking dreams such as those of a poetic temperament are apt to indulge in, and unconsciously he suffered the reins to fall loosely on his horse's neck. The animal accepted it as a signal to slacken his speed, and exchanged the canter for a walk. This slow movement was well suited to Wilton's dreamy state of mind.

He had reached the most lonely part of the road, one side of which was skirted by some trees, when he was roused by the whizzing of a rifle-ball, which must have passed within an inch of his head. Another ball would doubtless have followed, had not a voice exclaimed:

"Hold! I claim him as my prisoner."

A savage yell followed this announcement, and before Wilton had time even to attempt an escape, he was surrounded by a party of Indians. The most that he was able to do was to fire one of his pistols at random, the deep shadow cast across the road by the trees, added to the gloom of night, rendering the forms of those flitting around him nearly as dim and indistinnet as the shadows themselves. The next instant he was dragged from his horse, which was reluctantly abandoned by his captors, for soon their course would be through the wild and desolate forest, unmarked by even the vestige of a path, and often obstructed by tangled boughs and a thick growth of underwood. Half an hour's hasty march brought them to the precincts of the forest through which their course lay. They were not long in penetrating to a small glade, walled in on every side—except at one point, hardly wide enough to permit the ingress of a single person—by the dense foliage of trees and embowering shrubbery. Here they prepared to encamp for the night.

"To-morrow's march will be a long and weary one," said one of the Indians, addressing Wilton. "Sleep, or your strength will fail."

Wilton made no reply, but followed the example of those around who were hastening to repose themselves on the green turf, or at the best, a heap of dry leaves, for he had no wish to exhaust his energies, either physical or mental, by indulging in a feverish restlessness, and on the preservation of each in their unimpaired vigor depended his chances of escape. But his will was not strong enough to overcome his excitement. He found it impossible to lose himself in sleep, even for a single moment. The monotonous, droning sound made by the breathing of his captors, who, excepting one acting as sentinel, had in a few minutes sunk into a profound sleep, which, under different circumstances might have had the effect of an opiate, had now an irritating effect on his excited nerves.

On his first entrance into the glade, to his unaccustomed eyes, the surrounding gloom, unbroken save by the light of the few stars shining overhead, seemed nearly impervious, causing the Indians who swarmed around to look shadowy and weird-like. Soon, however, the outlines of each, as they lay in different attitudes of repose, were defined with tolerable distinctness, as were those of the sentinel, who sat motionless and statue-like as the trunk of the tree against which he leaned. Wilton thought he might be sleeping as soundly as the rest, and in order to satisfy himself, partly rose so as to lean on his elbow. A slight movement made by the Indian as he commenced raising himself, and instantly checked when it was found that he made no attempt to rise to his feet, showed him how little he had to expect from any lack of vigilance.

He remained for a minute or two in his half recumbent posture, as his eye could then take in the whole number of the sleepers. He found there were eleven, the form of one of them being so slight that he could not have been more than fifteen or sixteen years old. Wilton was not sorry when he became sensible of that cool, fresh feeling of the air which betokens the break of day. It was still two hours to sunrise, and the sleep of the Indians continued heavy and unbroken. He, too, took care to preserve an attitude fixed and immovable, as if he had been buried in slumber as profound as theirs.

It appeared a long time before the stars began to fade, but at last the largest and most brilliant, while his eye was yet fixed upon it, seemed to go out like a light suddenly extinguished, and soon afterward, here and there, through an opening in the leafy wall by which they were enclosed, from the rising sun were darted golden arrows of light.

In a few minutes the swarthy band had risen, and then, with a faint, sickening sensation, he saw, depending from the belt of a tall, sullen-looking Indian, whose name, as he afterward learned, was Memattanon, some half dozen scalps. From one of them swept downward as low as his knee, a cluster of tresses of a bright golden brown. At sight of them a cold shudder ran through his frame, for they resembled the soft, silky curls of Bessie.

There was only one whose belt was not garnished in the same horrible manner, though less profusely. This was the boy whose slight figure as he lay sleeping, had attracted Wilton's attention, and who, as he could now see, was a captive. Though he must certainly have had an admixture of Indian blood in his veins, his complexion was a warm brown, rather than the dull copper color characteristic of the race, while his eyes were larger and softer in their expression, and his hair, instead of being straight and dull of hue, fell round his neck in rich, wavy masses, and was as lustrous as the raven's wing when glancing in the sunlight.

The boy's eyes for a moment met Wilton's, and then, with a mournful look and a slight shudder, they glanced at one of the scalps which hung at Memattanon's belt.

At another time, Wilton would have keenly enjoyed the freshness and fragrance of the morning in this sylvan solitude. The more flexible branches of the trees were swaying to the cool currents of air, and the rustle of the foliage formed a low and grateful accompaniment to the sweet, wild bird-music floating from every spray. Even as it was, he so far forgot himself as to experience a moment's exhilaration of spirits.

"This is good," said Memattanon, approaching Wilton, and fixing on him his eyes, which gleamed with a dark, lurid fire.

"What is good?" Wilton asked.

"That my father's spirit is doomed no longer to wander unappeased."

"What means the chief?" said Wilton, who half read his deadly purpose in his eye.

"Listen, and you shall know. My father was a great warrior. He fell by the hand of yours. His last words before he entered the path that leads to the great hunting-grounds of the other land, were these:

"My son, avenge your father's death. He will wander about gloomy and sorrowful till he sees the pale-face whose sword drank his blood, enter on the dark trail."

"What shall Memattanon do," I then said, 'if he should escape—if death should come to him in some other way?'

"He answered, 'He has a son. Seek him and send him along on the dark and gloomy trail that leads to the desolate land, forsaken by the deer and the buffalo. I shall see him and shall be glad. Give no rest to your feet till it is done.'"

"Your father escaped me. When he died it was not by my hand. His son is now before me. He cannot escape. He shall burn at the stake, and then will my father frown on me no more."

"When must I die?" said Wilton, thinking that if several days were to intervene, there might be a chance for him to escape.

"You will know when the appointed time comes."

Wilton, knowing that importunity would be worse than in vain, said no more. Startling as was the announcement he had just listened to, his courage did not forsake him.

By this time a slight repast, consisting mostly of dried venison, had been spread upon the grass, of which Wilton and the younger captive were told to partake. Wilton was surprised to find how firm his nerves were, now that he was aware of the precise nature of the danger which was looking him in the face, compared with what they were while he remained in a state of uncertainty. He ate heartily, but in spite of his attempt to preserve the appearance of apathy, the Indian youth was unable to swallow a mouthful of food.

Memattanon smiled when he saw that what he had told Wilton did not prevent him from eating.

"Though the young white warrior," said he, "knows that when he reaches the desolate hunting-grounds, whence the deer and the buffalo have fled, his rifle must rest idly on his shoulder, his courage does not fail. I and my braves know how to torture, but he will not shrink. His skin is white, but he has the heart of an Indian. Indians have courage—they fear not pain. My father will be glad when he sees so brave a warrior wandering gloomy and comfortless in the dismal land whence the game has fled, with the rust eating into his rifle."

By this time the frugal meal was finished, when a few brief directions were given by Memattanon, relative to the day's journey. They then, one by one, left the glade, and proceeded in single file through the dim and devious mazes of the forest, the Indian who came next to Wilton pressing so closely on his footsteps that he, in turn, almost trod on the heels of the one who immediately preceded him.

Next but one to him who led the way, came the young Indian captive. Faint and exhausted from agitation, long abstinence from food and the want of sleep, he soon, as Wilton could see, began to falter. He longed to be able to offer him the support of his arm, when, now and then, the way became less narrow and intricate, but this he dared not do, knowing that it would only draw upon the hapless boy taunts and reproaches, if not personal abuse.

Once the boy looked back, and his eye sought Wilton's. He returned the look, purposely throwing into his countenance an expression of hope and encouragement. This was in turn replied to by a faint smile, and for a short time, rallying his failing energies, he proceeded with a firmer and freer step. But this could last only for a short time. He again began to droop, and more than once came near falling.

"Leave me and let me die—I can go no further," he then said to the Indian in front of him.

The aspect of him whom he addressed was milder than that of his companions.

"Let not the chief hear you say that," said he. "The way is more open here. Lean on me. A little further on and we shall rest. Poor child," he added, as if speaking to himself, "the voice of the bird that sang in his heart is hushed."

He wound his strong, muscular arm around the boy's waist, and half supported his sinking form. They thus proceeded ten, or perhaps fifteen minutes longer, when, making an abrupt turn round a mass of huge, precipitous rocks, they were introduced into a scene of wild and wondrous beauty.

The hard, gray rock, rising on one side almost perpendicularly, and in some places standing out bold and bare, was in others half screened by the foliage of a birch or an elm. Still more frequently, wherever a twig or a fissure in the rock was offered to its clinging tendrils, the wild grape-vine spread its green and glossy drapery, and its heavy clusters of fruit, already tinged with a faint purple. But these, as well as many another feature of this singularly wild and beautiful spot were unheeded by Wilton. A spring rimmed with flowers and verdant moss, whose cool, translucent waters sparkled brightly in the sunbeams, was the only object that engaged his attention. Quickly twisting a broad, smooth leaf of grape-vine in such a manner as to form a drinking vessel, he filled it with the water of the spring and handed it to the Indian lad, whose lips were parched with fever. Many times was it emptied and re-filled ere his burning thirst was slaked, and then, with grateful, low-breathed murmurs he sank upon the turf, and nestling close to Wilton's side, in a few minutes was asleep.

Wilton and the youthful Indian were apart from the rest, in the shadow of an overhanging rock, where no ray of sunshine could penetrate. The murmur of the breeze among the foliage of a cluster of maples near at hand and the hum of the wild bee made pleasant music.

The Indians, having drunk of the spring, with the exception of two, remained mute and almost motionless, either lying on the grass, or leaning against a rock or tree. One of these was Memattanon, and he, for the most part, was silent, though now and then he spoke in a low, suppressed voice to him who sat near him. Wilton, though he closed his eyes and pretended to sleep, listened with deep attention, for he soon found that what was said had reference to himself and the young Indian captive. He, himself, as he already knew, was to be sacrificed to the maues of Memattanon's father, who had been slain by his, and he now found that the evil spirit who scattered mildew and blight among the fields of corn, was to be propitiated by the sacrifice of the Indian lad.

"When will the sacrifice be?" asked the Indian who sat by Memattanon's side.

"The day when, at the same moment the sun goes down in the west the moon will be seen rising in the east. In how many days will that be?"

"Three."

"The spirit of dreams whispered to me last night in my sleep, and told me that then would be the fitting time. I knew he would come to me when I slept, for in the faint star-light I saw his dim and shadowy form flitting in and out among the trees. 'Even now,' said he, bending over me, 'thy father is glad with the joy of expectation. Often he stops in the chase and turns his eyes towards the dark trail on which he knows the young pale-face, the son of him who slew him, without any one to bear him company, will soon enter. He smiles, and his eyes sparkle.'"

Wilton, who ventured occasionally to partly uncloze his eyes, saw that when he ceased speaking he bent his ear close to the ground as if he were listening.

"The tall morning shadows," he at length said, "are gathering themselves up, and begin to press closely to the foot of the rock. They want come."

"No—it is past the hour," returned the other.

As Wilton afterward learned, they were expecting a party of Indians to meet them there at a certain hour.

Memattanon gave the signal to resume their journey. Wilton reluctantly roused the poor boy sleeping near him. As they rose to their feet, the Indian who had so kindly assisted the younger captive, with a seemingly careless air passed near them with lingering steps, though without looking toward them.

"To night be on the watch," said he, "and if there should be a chance to escape, let it not slip."

"I will remember your words," was all that Wilton found opportunity to say in return.

They filed off from the wild and beautiful spot where they had been resting, in the same order they had entered it, the friendly Indian, as before, immediately preceding the boy, and drawing him to his side and sustaining him whenever the way would permit. A little before sunset they reached the place where they were to encamp for the night. Six hours' march on the following morning, as Wilton gathered from what was said, would bring them to the Indian hamlet where he and his fellow-captive were to be immolated.

The place of their encampment was on the banks of a rivulet sheltered by a grove of oaks and other forest trees. The hour was calm and very lovely. A canopy of clouds of every gorgeous hue hovered over the setting sun, from which small masses, momentarily detaching themselves, floated toward the zenith. The Indian lad, as at the other resting-place, seated himself near Wilton. As he sat in a half-reclining posture, his dark, liquid eyes, full of a dreamy light, were directed to the sunset sky. Suddenly a bright smile, like a burst of sunlight, broke over his countenance, and with a quick, eager, movement, laying one hand on Wilton's, with the other he pointed to the western horizon.

"See!" said he.

Wilton looked in the direction he indicated, and beheld the fragment of a clond of great brilliancy and beauty.

"'Tis the Wakon-bird!" said the boy.

The cloud most certainly resembled a large and beautiful bird, soaring upward with a graceful, undulating motion. Drops of liquid gold seemed sparkling amid the rich purple and crimson of its outspread wings, and the long train, curving gently downward, exhibited all the varied and gorgeous colors of the rainbow.

"The Wakon-bird, did you say?" said Wilton.

"Yes."

"You believe it to be a good omen?"

"It foreshows that peaceful and happy days will be his over whom is shed the glory of his wings."

"You think your life is safe now?"

"Yes—yours and mine. The hand of mortal cannot reach the life of him who has seen the Wakon-bird. Look, it will soon be gone!"

As he spoke it began slowly and almost imperceptibly to blend with a mass of clouds which for some time had been hovering near, and in a moment more was lost amid their rosy folds.

"We must try and make good the happy omen," said Wilton. "To-night we must endeavor to steal away, when all except the sentinel are asleep."

"It will be vain to try. He who will be set as a watch over us will lose his life if, in the morning, we should be gone. It will make his eyes sharp and his hearing keen. Not so much as the breaking of a twig or the rustle of a dry leaf will escape him."

"Are you willing to try?"

"Yes, though 'twill be better not."

At this moment an expression of pain crossed the young Indian's countenance. Wilton noted the direction of his eyes, and found that they were turned towards Memattanon, who stood on the verge of the embankment which overlooked the rivulet, his tall figure being thrown into strong relief against the sunset sky.

"'T was the white captive's," he murmured.

Wilton knew what he meant, for he saw the long, fair curls of the scalp already alluded to, waving in the fresh breeze which had just sprung up.

"Who was the white captive?" asked Wilton.

"My sister—the adopted daughter of my mother. She was a prisoner of the Iroquois when our people found her."

"Is your mother a white woman?"

"No—she's a Seneca. The Senecas, as you know, are friendly to the whites, and that is why you see those Indian scalps hanging from the belt of Memattanon and the others. Our warriors were gone. None were left in the cabins but the old men, women and children. A few made their escape, among them my mother. The rest were slain and the cabins burnt. I was abroad with my rifle. I saw the sky red with the flames which were consuming our dwellings, and hastened towards the spot. As I drew near many rifles were ready for my life, when Memattanon cried with a loud voice, commanding them to spare me. 'The evil spirit is angry,' said he; 'it is long since we offered him any sacrifice, and he begins to shed mildew on our fields of corn.'"

"You said that your mother made her escape. If you were about, how could you know?"

She was concealed behind some trees. I passed close to them and he spoke to me. 'T was in a whisper, but I knew her voice, and held my breath to listen. 'I have heard what Memattanon said,' were her words, 'but the Great Spirit will save you by the hands of our warriors, whose wives and children are slain, and whose bones are now only so many heaps of ashes.'"

Food was now placed before them, and the Indian lad, cheered by what he considered the happy omen, ate heartily.

"Sleep now," said Wilton, when he had finished his meal, "and I'll wake you if there's any chance to escape."

"There'll be none, my brother," he replied.

In half an hour the Indians were soundly sleeping, all except him whose task it was to watch the prisoners. He had seated himself close to their feet, so that the slightest movement on the part of either was sure to redouble his vigilance. The moon had come up from behind the eastern hills, and had for hours been pursuing "her blue path in the heavens." Wilton felt no wish to sleep, and the grim watcher at their feet was as untiring as ever, but the slumber of the Indian lad was as sweet and unbroken as if he had been in his own home.

At last, when the moon was long past the meridian, the eyes of the sentinel closed, his form began to droop, and finally his head bent forward so that his chin rested upon his breast. Wilton half suspected that he only simulated sleep, and to ascertain if his suspicion was correct, he raised his head and looked round. The Indian remained immovable, betraying no sign of consciousness. Wilton ventured to make an attempt to rise. At the same instant the Indian's rifle was pointed at his head. Not a word was spoken, and Wilton again sank down on the turf.

Convinced that escape would, at least for that night, be impossible, and worn and weary with his day's march and long watchfulness, all care and anxiety were soon lost in the oblivion of sleep. When he woke, the sun was up, and the rivulet, stirred by the morning breeze, flashed back thousands of diamond sparkles to his unclouded beams.

CHAPTER VI.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE SACRIFICE OF THE CAPTIVES.

WHEN they reached the Indian hamlet, Wilton was placed in a small lodge by himself. Though he ventured to request it, the Indian lad was not suffered to be with him. It was almost dark when a woman entered and placed food before him.

"I offered to bring it," said she, "that I might bid you hope."

The gloom prevented him from distinguishing her features, but he thought he knew her voice.

"Is it Christina Burmann?" said he.

"Yes."

"Have you left the hut in the woods?"

"No—Dorson sent me here with a message for Memattanon. Though I came reluctantly, I am glad now, as I may possibly be of service to you."

"There is a captive besides me—an Indian lad."

"Yes, I know him and his mother well. I saw her this morning, and she told me what had befallen her and her son. She is a Seneca, and if your life is saved it will be by the people of her tribe. I have means of communicating with them through her."

"The time is short."

"Too short. You might count on your rescue as certain if there were only a few hours more."

"If I could only escape to-night."

"That cannot be. Memattanon, who has at last seized the prey he has long watched for, will see that you are strictly guarded."

"There is little chance for me or the poor Indian lad, I fear, certain as he is that he shall be rescued."

"I shall not sleep to-night, and meanwhile I will do all I can." Footsteps were now heard near the cabin, and lifting a mat that fell over an opening on the opposite side, she quickly withdrew.

The hour appointed for the sacrifice was near at hand. The medicine-men and the initiates who were to assist at the terrible rites, had been preparing themselves by fasting and such other observances as were enjoined by their wild, mystical faith.

The place selected was a large, smooth area, a short distance from the village. In form it resembled an amphitheatre, a dense growth of pines forming the background. Two pyres were placed some twenty or thirty feet distant from each other, near the centre of the amphitheatre. Men, women and children were gathered round with looks of eager expectation. The warriors, their faces streaked with red paint and their heads adorned with feathers, stood in grave and silent dignity. But the exaltation of Memattanon could not be wholly suppressed. A fierce joy at times was seen to kindle in his eye, and occasionally he would throw out his brawny arms with a wild, impatient gesture towards the sun, as it neared the horizon, exclaiming:

"Hasten! The spirit of my father waits!"

At last, when not even a rim of the fiery orb was visible, and the full moon, with a mellow, golden light, was seen in the eastern sky, the two captives were led forth. Wilton was bound to the stake which rose in the midst of one of the pyres, the Indian lad to the other.

The medicine-man, with a blazing torch in his hand, approached the pyre of the young Indian. When within a short distance, followed by several of the initiates, he commenced pacing round the pyre with slow and measured steps, chanting the subjoined lines to a rude and wild melody, the initiates joining in the chorus.

"Spirit, whose dusky wings
Bright and midday shed
Wherever the green corn waves,
Leaving it sere and dead,
Come from the poisonous fen—
Come from the glassy flood—
Come from the stagnant pool
When the scent of burning blood
Is on the murky air.

Chorus.—Come, come, come—
Come when the crackling flames rise high
And stain the evening sky
With their blood-red glare.

Come, and in the red flame's light
Thy dusky pinions bathe—
That no more the foul and deadly blight
They shed where the green corn waves.
Come from the fen—
Come o'er the flood—
Come from the pool
At the scent of burning blood.

Chorus.—Come, come, come—
Come when the crackling flames rise high,
And stain the evening sky
With their blood-red glare,
And the scent of blood is on the air."

As they proceeded in the chant, gradually they began to move quickly, tossing their arms wildly in the air and brandishing their glittering tomahawks. The voice of the medicine-man at every line grew more shrill and piercing, as did the voices of those who joined in the chorus, the four concluding lines being shrieked forth in a manner inconceivably wild and discordant, each in succession hurling his tomahawk in the direction of the victim's head, though at the same time taking care that it should not strike him. When the last note died away there was a breathless silence, and the medicine-man drew nearer to the pyre, slowly waving the flaming torch.

During the whole of the frightful performance, the Indian lad manifested no symptom of fear. He had even more than once looked towards Wilton with a smile full of cheerfulness and encouragement. The hope inspired by the happy omen was strong within him.

The medicine-man bent forward to light the pyre, and Memattanon stood regarding him with a look of fierce exultation. Even at the very moment of applying the torch, it was dashed from the hand that held it, and almost at the same instant the things that bound the young victim to the stake were cut asunder. At the same time Wilton was set free. The rush of the red warriors from behind the pines had been so sudden that not an arm was raised against them. Before there had been time to realize that the prisoners were liberated, they had both been hurried into the woods and impelled swiftly along by strong and willing arms.

CHAPTER VII.

BESSIE'S INTERVIEW WITH DAME ANSTIS.

"WHAT has happened, my daughter?" said Mrs. Hamlen, as Bessie, pale and agitated, entered the room with an open letter in her hand.

"Edith writes me that Wilton is gone—no one can tell where."

"Gone? How long since?"

"Read the letter, mother. It will tell you all about it better than I can."

After a few remarks, preparatory to the unpleasant news which was to follow, the letter ran thus:

"Wilton came, as he promised, the day after you left. About an hour after he left, a horse at furious speed came up to the door. It was soon found that he was without a rider, and that he belonged to Wilton. It was the one father gave him a short time before you went from here. My father, taking with him several of the hands who work on the farm, one of whom was furnished with a lantern, immediately set out in search of him, for it was thought that his horse might possibly have thrown him. The search was a vain one, and up to this time every attempt to trace him has proved unavailing. The general opinion is that he has been captured by a party of Indians, but father bids me tell you that you must be of good courage, as there is often some chance to escape, and Wilton is not one of those who would be likely to let it slip. For my own part, I feel nearly certain that he will escape.

"Perhaps I am more hopeful than I otherwise should be, on account of the good news I have received from another quarter. A letter from Sedley Austin now lies before me. You may remember that I heard he was aboard the British frigate Guerriere, which was recently captured by the Constitution. He was wounded, though not dangerously, and thought that his letter would not precede him over a week or ten days. After spending a short time at the farm-house he will visit his parents, who, as I believe I have told you, live in Tennessee. He says that he doesn't think that he was cut out for a sailor, and intends, as soon as his health is re-established, to join the army under General Jackson, whom he has often seen, and for whom he entertains great admiration.

"My father has accepted a lieutenant-colonel's commission. He, at first, insisted on serving in a more subordinate station, for, although he is not over fifty, he says that a younger man would fill the place better. For the truth of this assertion he says that we need only to look to General Hull, whom, by the way, he judges more leniently than he did at first, and thinks that, instead of being a coward or traitor, he was only superannuated. He says that 'age deliberates when it should act. Deliberation follows deliberation till the opportunity is lost in the multiplicity of counsel. Youth resolves and executes. The conception is but the prelude to the enterprise. Where realities are to be encountered, the less the counsel the surer the victory.'

"All this is very true," said a gentleman who was present when he made these remarks, 'but they don't in the least apply to yourself. You are neither so old as to be dilatory, nor so young as to be rash. Everybody knows that energy and prudence are your distinguishing characteristics.'

"I don't think my father was sorry to have his objections to accepting the appointment overruled. I am certain that I was not, for all who are best acquainted with him are satisfied that he is fully equal to the discharge of those duties which will necessarily devolve on him. Knowing well that my cousin loves her uncle, she will forgive my egotism, for it is egotism of a certain species to hold up for the admiration of others the excellencies of those who are dear to us.

"If I hear a word about Wilton, I will write to you without a moment's delay. Do not indulge in gloomy presentiments concerning him. There is nothing in them. I was almost certain that I should hear Sedley was dead, but you see that I was mistaken."

Bessie took the letter when her mother had finished reading it, and went to her own room, for she heard her father's steps in the hall, and she did not care to see him until she could appear less agitated. Some hours afterward as she stood looking out of a window, she saw the boy Hammett coming down one of the garden walks. Perceiving that he walked slowly, as if reluctant to approach the house, she went out to meet him.

"Annt Anstis wishes you to come to her," he said.

"When?"

"This afternoon."

"It is late, now."

"There will be time."

"Wont to-morrow do as well?"

"She said she must see you to-day."

"Tell her I will come."

"I am to wait for you in the woods."

"Go then—I will soon be there. I only wish to let my mother know that I'm going to see Dame Anstis."

The boy hastened to the shelter of the woodland, which was only two or three rods back of the garden, and in a few minutes he was joined by Bessie. She was a good walker, so that nimble-footed as Hammett was, he found that she outstripped him no delay.

Bessie saw, when she came in sight of the cottage, that Anstis, the same as when she last visited her, sat just outside the door, at her spinning-wheel. When she perceived Bessie, she rose and set it aside, and placed her chair nearer a rustic seat overshadowed by a grape-vine. She had, in expectation of her youthful visitor, altered her dress somewhat. The blue and white checked apron which she usually wore, was exchanged for one of white lawn, and her plain cap had been laid aside for a kerchief of crimson silk, richly fringed and embroidered, which was gracefully twisted into the form of a turban, and rested lightly on her head, so as not wholly to conceal her jet black locks, not a hair of which was yet frosted by time.

"I expected you yesterday," said she, as Bessie took her seat on the bench overshadowed by the grape-vine. "Why didn't you come?"

"I couldn't without offending my father."

"Why?"

"We had a visitor—one that my father had invited to stay to tea."

"I knew 'twas so. Do you know why Ishmael Withers so often visits you?"

"He is my father's friend."

"He is no man's friend, but he means one day to make my 'Bright Bessie' his wife."

"He never will!"

"Say that always, even though he were able to offer you a palace of pure gold to live in. But," said she, looking earnestly into the young girl's face, "it wont do for me to call you 'Bright Bessie' to-day. The light in your eyes grows more mournful every time I see you. You've had bad news."

"I have."

"And about Wilton Richmond?"

"Yes."

"I knew it three days ago, and so did Ishmael Withers."

"Why didn't you send me word?"

"That you might be spared the pain of knowing it a little time longer, and perhaps enable me to obtain some good news to put with it."

"How came Ishmael Withers to know it?"

Anstis answered by putting a piece of soiled paper into her hand, intended to have been folded into the form of a square, though one of the angles was rather acute. It had, in lieu of a wafer, been sealed with a piece of pine pitch, and was directed to "Mister Squire Ishmael Withers."

"Read it," said Anstis, seeing that Bessie hesitated to unfold it. Though no easy task to decipher the scrawling, irregular lines which at first sight might have been taken for so many rows of rude hieroglyphics, with the help of Dame Anstis, after a while Bessie succeeded in reading as follows, except that in transcribing, certain liberties have been taken with the orthography:

"The chap you know of is trapped. There would have been an end of him right off, for I had told the Indians not to let him slip through their fingers but to put a bullet through his head, and they were ready enough to do it, for I did as you told me, and promised them the red gold if they would make clean work of it; but Memattanon must needs have him saved for a sacrifice to his father's spirit, which, according to his way of thinking, is kind of uneasy-like because the chap's father, who killed him, died a natural death, as 'twere, though Memattanon hunted him for years the same as if he had been a wild beast. Now, you see, he means to make the chap answer instead of his father—supposing that the old Indian chief will be about as well satisfied with the young man as he would have been with the old, seeing the same blood runs in his veins. My advice is, that before long you had better come this way and see what is going on.

"Yours to serve, JAKE DOBSON."

"Do you think Wilton is the person meant?" said Bessie, when she had finished reading it.

"Yes—but he is already out of danger."

"Out of danger?"

"Yes. Those who do my work have better heads, stronger hands and swifter feet than those employed by Ishmael Withers. That dirty scrawl will tell you better than you knew before, what kind of a man Ishmael Withers is."

"But are you certain that Wilton is safe?"

"He is, unless he has fallen into some other danger."

"This letter—how could you get it?" said Bessie, with a look of perplexity.

"Fortune favored us in that. Hammett found it in the woods. Withers must have dropped it. You thought that my nephew might be in the confidence of Withers—was it not so?"

"The thought did pass through my mind."

"Think so no more. Hammett is a good boy, and may be trusted."

"The letter Hammett found—is it best that I should speak to my father about it?"

"No, Bessie—lock your knowledge of it in your own bosom. If your father knows it he will tell Withers, which may cost my nephew his life. Besides, it would only make him careful to work more in the dark while weaving those toils about Wilton by which he will strive to again place him in danger. The only way to deal with him at present is to meet his plots by counter-plots."

"Is Withers indeed so cruel and vindictive?"

"Yes, he is capable of any amount of cruelty which will go to accomplish his wishes. No, no Bessie—if you value Wilton's safety, breathe not a word of it at present, even to your mother. So dangerous a secret cannot be too well guarded."

BATHING IN THE DEAD SEA.

From a work recently published in England, the annexed extract on the buoyancy of the waters and the appearance of the Dead Sea is taken: "Though in breadth not exceeding ten miles, the Dead Sea seems boundless to the eye when looking from north to south, and the murmur of waves, as they break on its flint-strewn shore, together with the lines of drift-wood and fragments of bitumen on the beach, give to its waters a resemblance to the ocean. Curious to experience the sensations of swimming in so strange a sea, I put to the test the accounts of the extreme buoyancy felt in it, and I was quickly convinced there was no exaggeration in what I had heard. I found the water almost tepid, and so strong that the chief difficulty was to keep sufficiently submerged, the feet starting up in the air at every vigorous stroke. When floating, half the body rose above the surface, and, with a pillow, one might have slept upon the water. After a time, the strangeness of the sensation in some measure disappeared, and on approaching the shore I carelessly dropped my feet to walk out—when lo! as if a bladder had been attached to each heel they flew upwards; the struggle to recover myself sent my head down, the vilely bitter and briny water, from which I had hitherto guarded my head, now rushed into my mouth, eyes, ears and nose, and for one horrible moment the only doubt I had was whether I was to be drowned or poisoned. Coming to the surface, however, I swam to land, making no further attempt to walk in deep water, which, I am inclined to believe, is almost impossible."—Boston Chronicle.

DESTRUCTION OF MOSCOW.

It was on the 16th of September, 1812. At midnight, Napoleon, in utter exhaustion of body and mind, retired to rest. The gales of approaching winter shrieked portentously around the towers of the Kremlin. Suddenly the cry of "fire!" resounded through the streets. Far off in the east, immense volumes of billowy smoke, pierced with flame, were rolling up into the stormy sky. Loud explosions of bursting shells and upheaving mists scattered death and dismay around. Suddenly the thunders of an earthquake were heard in another direction. A score of buildings were thrown in the air. Flaming projectiles, of the most combustible and unquenchable material, were scattered in all directions, and a new volcano of smoke and flame commenced its ravages. Earthquake succeeded earthquake—volcano followed volcano. The demon of the storm seemed to exult in its high carnival of destruction. The flames were swept in all directions. A shower of fire descended upon all the dwellings and all the streets. Mines were sprung, shells burst, cannon were discharged, wagons of powder and magazines blew up, and in a few hours of indescribable confusion and dismay, the whole vast city was wrapped in one wild ocean of flames. The French soldiers who the incendiaries, bayoneted them, tossed them into the flames, but still, like demons, they plied their work.—Boston Gazette.

INFLUENCE.—Influence is to be measured, not by the extent the surface it covers, but by its kind. A man may spread his mind, his feelings and opinions through a great extent, but, if his mind be a low one, he manifests no greatness. A wretched art may fill a city with dabs, and by a false, showy style, achieve reputation; but the man of genius, who leaves behind him a grand picture, in which immortal beauty is embodied, and which is silently to spread a true taste in his art, exerts an incomparable higher influence.—Channing.

THE BASIN OF COMMERCE, OSTEND.

SKETCHES OF OSTEND.

Ostend, with a harbor on the North Sea, is a place of considerable trade and importance, and much resorted to by bathers in the hot season. It is memorable in history for sustaining a three years' siege by the Spaniards (1601-1634), at the expiration of which it capitulated on honorable terms. We present two correct views, drawn on the spot. The first represents a lively scene sketched from the Basin of Commerce. The steam packet quay is that facing the spectator. On the right is the handsome railway station, with a train of cars on the track, while the quay to the left is called the "Quai de l'empereur"—Imperial quay. The second picture is a scene on the sands with some of the bathing machines. These are on wheels, and are drawn by horses into the water. A group of fishermen are in front—one of them wearing wooden shoes. The young girl is an attendant on the bathing horses. The quay represented in the first picture, was built by Louis Napoleon. The railroad connects Ostend with the great cities of Belgium, Holland, France and Germany. The town of Ostend is well built, the streets are wide, and cross each other at right angles; but its distinguishing feature is found in its fortifications, which at present defend 13,000 inhabitants. The ramparts are nearly three miles in circumference; on the southern side, near the sea, they are of prodigious strength; the moats are triple, and bastions, mounds and redoubts are duplicated and re-duplicated, till the utmost resources of Vauban's art appear to be exhausted. As a fortress, Ostend forms the first member of that great chain of defences which were intended to protect Belgium on the side of France. The peace-securing railway crosses these formidable works. As a watering-place, Ostend presents many advantages. The sands are of immense extent, the beach is free to a weed, and the walks on the Digue form very noble promenades. The people are handsome, obliging, and remarkable for the neatness and simplicity of their attire.

THE COTTAGE OF MY MOTHER.

BY J. M. FLETCHER.

To the cottage of my mother
O! I long to his once more,
Dearest cottage of my mother,
On the wild New England shore;
Where the balmy breeze is laden
With the perfume of the flowers
That are springing, fresh and lovely,
In my native woodland bowers.

There the gray old hills are glancing
In the morning's golden light,
And the merry rills are dancing
Down the lofty mountain's height;
And the voices of the loved ones
In their sweetest accents flow—
To the cottage of my mother,
Dearest mother, let me go.

For my soul was nurtured roughly
Midst the stern and wild and free,
And it loves New England's valleys
As the petrel loves the sea;
To her stern and rocky high lands,
And the meadows green below,
To the cottage of my mother,
Dearest mother, let me go.

THE GARDENER'S BOY.

BY SUSAN H. BLAISDELL.

As I sit here to-night in my study, with the last leaf of my to-morrow's sermon lying, just completed, upon the table before me, I rest from the labors of the present, and let my thoughts wander back to times years and years gone by, and to things that happened then.

When I was a boy—it does not seem a long time since I was one, although I am eight-and-thirty now; for the events of those days rise in strong, fresh, vivid colors before me, like the events of yesterday.—I was the only child of my father and mother. They are both dead now, and I am far away from the place that was once our home; but we dwelt together then, at the foot of a brown hill in Dorsetshire, where for a time we were all very happy. My childhood was a pleasant one. My parents loved me dearly. I was their joy, their pride, their hope; for they had no other child save their little Harry.

And I loved them with equal affection in return. My happiness was in playing about on the floor at my mother's feet: in following her around wherever she went; in sitting for hours and hours at her knee, watching her while she spun, and listening to her pleasant songs, and the thousand and one stories to which I loved so to listen, and which she was never weary in repeating to me. And it was my delight, too, holding her hand, to go with her to the garden gate, to welcome my father home from his day's labor; to sit by him while we partook of our simple evening repast, and sit on his knee afterwards, in the open doorway, with my mother close by, during the hour preceding my bed-time, when I received the good-night kiss of both, and went to slumber.

This was my life, through the years of my childhood. I was a quiet child. I had few or no companions among other children, and, indeed, wished for none. At play or at study, while my father was away, my mother was all-in-all to me. The simple education I received, up to my twelfth year, she gave me. I was always at home, always quiet, always happy.

The distinguishing mark of my boyhood was a love of books. I studied diligently all that came in my way, calculated to increase the knowledge for which I thirsted. They were not many, but they were good and instructive, and such as I should have had; and I mastered them thoroughly.

My father and mother were well pleased at the studious disposition which they observed in me. Then, from time to time, my father procured a new book for me, and every one was a treasure of untold worth, in my eyes. My only trouble was, that I could not have more; but he was far from rich, and he could not satisfy all my wants then, without deferring indefinitely a day to which he was looking earnestly forward.

He wished, at some future time not far distant, to send me to school. For this purpose, every penny he could spare was saved carefully. Frugal, industrious and persevering, he and my mother managed, from time to time, to lay up little sums for my benefit, trusting in a while to amass enough to compass the wished for end. Meanwhile, everything not absolutely necessary at the time was denied us all; and hence it was that my father said to me: "Wait a little, and be content, my son, for by-and-by thou wilt be the better for it. Study what thou hast, and thou'lt be able the sooner to go to school, where thou'lt make up for all thou lackest now."

So I waited; and ah, with what joyful anticipations we all looked forward to the day on which our mutual hopes were set! But truly it is written, "We know not what a day may bring forth." It wanted but a little time of that so confidently anticipated, when, by some unhappy accident, our little cottage was one night destroyed by fire, and with it the entire sum which my parents had been so patiently and diligently hoarding for my future education. Now were we indeed distressed: I, because my parents were deprived of their sheltering roof; they, not so much for that, as that they had no longer the means of educating me. I, for my part, would not dwell upon this consideration. It gave me the sincerest pain, but I banished it as selfish at this time.

To a good neighbor, a prosperous farmer, we were indebted for a temporary shelter.

"And now," I said to my mother and father, "I will no longer devote my time to studying, but go to work with my hands, and help to gain the means to rebuild our cottage. I am strong enough, and old enough; for was I not eleven last spring? And in the evenings I will study, when I have done my day's labor. Thus I shall do very well."

They smiled, and were pleased with my resolution.

"But, dear child," said they both, "what canst thou do—thou, so young? Thou art not old enough, nor strong enough for the labor that would be required of thee."

"But I can work," I answered, "and I will; for to be idle now would be to be unhappy."

Therefore, I cast about to see what might be done. As my parents had said, I was not large or strong enough for hard labor; but I knew there must be something I might do, and I resolved to find it. In this state of affairs, I suddenly bethought myself of a plan.

At a distance of something like half a league from us, there dwelt a very rich old gentleman, who had the finest and most extensive gardens in the country, and who, I had heard, was in want of a lad to assist his head gardener. The thought of this pleased me. Young as I was, and only self-trained, I had not a little skill in the culture and care of flowers; and from my infancy, the little garden about our cottage had been my pride and delight. I had taken almost the entire charge of it, and always with the greatest success. True, it was not to be supposed that our plain, common flowers were to be compared with those in the gardens of Mr. Burrage, nor that the culture of these was such as they needed; but then I was confident of soon learning all that would be required of me, and I was sure I should take the greatest pains to give satisfaction. I determined to apply for this situation.

Accordingly, I set off the very next morning, and, arrived at the house of Mr. Burrage, inquired for and was shortly introduced to him. I found him a free, kindly-spoken and evidently good-humored old gentleman, of fifty-five or sixty years, who greeted me in a hearty, pleasant way that very much encouraged me, though it was with many blushes that, after informing him who I was, I made known to him the object of my errand.

He listened with every sign of lively interest, and asked me several questions concerning myself and family, which drew from me an account of our affairs, that is, so far as was proper for me to make them known to so new an acquaintance.

Finding what good reasons I had for desiring the situation, and hearing what experience I had already had, he instantly declared that he was perfectly disposed to receive me, and named, as the half-yearly amount I was to receive, a sum which to me appeared, at that time—and which, indeed, really was,—a very handsome one, for the services I was to render.

Then he took me out into his garden, and introduced me to the gardener, who appeared to me a very good sort of man indeed, and with whom I quickly became well acquainted. The conclusion of the matter was, that I was engaged to come next day; and after a little further conversation with Mr. Burrage, took my leave with a light heart.

He had promised, I may add, to call on my parents some time; which he did, very unexpectedly, the following morning. He spent nearly half an hour in talking with them concerning me; after which, he took me back with him, and I was installed immediately in my new office.

It was one in which I succeeded not only to my own satisfaction, but to that of my employer, and of the gardener whose assistant I was. I learned very easily and quickly whatever he taught me, and with the greater facility, I think, because of the object for which I was working. I was always diligent, always busy. My master came out to see me very often in the garden, and had always a gay, good-humored word for me, which gave me infinite encouragement in my labors, so that I worked all the harder and all the better for it.

But one day I heard something which somewhat troubled me. I said to the gardener, after one of these visits of Mr. Burrage:

"What a kind-hearted man he is! His people must love him very much."

"Ay, Harry," answered the gardener, "a right good master he is when he's not crossed in anything; but thou must be careful, lad, never to vex him, or there's no telling what may happen. He's main good-humored when all goes smooth, but he's a terrible temper when it's roused. So mind thee well that thou'rt not amiss in thy duty, and that thou make no blunders and do no mischief, or the least of it may be, mayhap, that thou'lt lose thy place."

All this caused me some dismay, and for awhile, as I have before said, I was much troubled; for I thought, "What if, by any means, I should unintentionally anger my master?"

But presently I saw that it would not benefit me to alarm myself about a thing which might never happen. I, therefore, dismissed my trouble, resolved not to fear for the future, and only to take, henceforth, the greater heed to please Mr. Burrage.

In this effort, I was successful to my utmost contentment. The summer passed and autumn came, and I had never received a single harsh word or look from my master. On the contrary, he was always kind to me.

Once, indeed, I saw his anger break out, though not against me, but one of the domestics in the house. The man had committed, it is true, a somewhat serious though perfectly unintentional and, therefore, excusable offence; but Mr. Burrage, giving way to such a tempest of wrath as made me tremble, discharged the poor man on the spot, and though it was a long time before he got another place, never would take him back, or in the least relent.

"Harry, lad, let it be a warning to thee," said my friend the gardener. And it was a most serious one.

In the autumn, I had more time to myself than in the summer, and every spare hour was devoted to my beloved books. I studied with more diligence than ever; but, though often sorely tempted, I never let my love of study encroach upon the time that was legitimately my master's. I worked at my employment in the garden most faithfully, and never wasted an instant there. My master often commended me. That made me glad. And at the end of September, too, I received a quarter's wages, which I joyfully hastened to place in my father's hands. I felt that I was working for something.

My master interested himself very much in the circumstances of my parents as well as myself. His was no idle interest, either. He saw that we were willing and anxious to help ourselves, and, therefore, he was disposed to assist us. He saw my father and mother industrious, energetic, active. He knew me patient, willing, assiduous in the toil to which I had voluntarily subjected myself. This pleased him. He liked us all, and determined to help us. An opportunity for the execution of his good intentions was soon opened, and unexpectedly. But alas! whatever was the merit that he saw in us, how brittle we found the thread which attached us to his favor!

It was at the close of fall, when winter was just setting in, that, from some business embarrassment of my father's employers, he was thrown utterly out of work; and at that season of the year, he found it impossible to obtain another situation, even of the meanest kind. We were poorer now, almost, than we ever had been. My father had not a penny in the world. All the wages that both he and I had earned, during this last half year, had been employed to pay our way as we went, since the fire, and to keep out of debt. Nothing had been laid away.

Now my master's opportunity presented itself. On the very evening after he had heard from me of our misfortune, he visited my father and mother. It was even while they were talking together of the destitution in which they were left at the very commencement of the rigors of a most severe winter, that my master made his appearance. After a little conversation with them on the subject of their losses:

"I have," said he, "at the distance of a league from here, a well-stocked farm, which is without an overseer at present, the one whom I have had having lately left the country with his family. I must have some one to keep it in order, and to see after the creatures there, which else will certainly suffer this hard winter. If you will both go thither and live, it will be for our mutual advantage."

It was with much gratitude that my parents accepted this offer. It was decided that they should go in three days; and, meanwhile, they were to make preparations for their departure. I was delighted with this new phase in our circumstances. It was a happy hour that I spent with my master, talking with my parents; and then Mr. Burrage set off for home again, I accompanying him.

When we reached there, my master's son, a fine little boy of some eight or ten years, who had lately come home from a visit of some months to a relative in a neighboring county, came running to meet us. His father, who was very fond of the boy, stopped for some moments to talk with him, and then went into the house. Francis, however, accompanied me to the conservatories, whither the plants had been removed from the gardens, when the first frosts began to set in, and which were now for a few days under my charge, during a temporary indisposition of the gardener.

I went about, as was my custom, to see that everything was safe for the night, and that all my master's favorites were well sheltered; for the evening was intensely cold. But I was not so particular as usual that night, for Francis was eager for me to go with him and see a fine new sledge which had just been finished for him to ride upon the ice in.

I was quite confident, however, that I left everything right when I went with him. I very much admired the sledge, which was really a beautiful one; and when we had both looked at it sufficiently, he went to his father, and shortly I repaired to my own room. My dreams were happy ones that night. I could not dismiss, even in sleep, the memory of my parents' happiness, and the goodness of my master.

But alas! my joy was of short duration. The following morning, on going to the conservatory, I found that a small door at the far end had been left open all night, owing to some oversight of mine on the evening previous, and that several of my master's finest plants had been completely destroyed, one of the number being an exceedingly rare exotic, which he valued, if possible, more than all the rest he had. For several moments, I stood perfectly petrified with consternation, distress and terror. Ficially, recovering myself sufficiently for action, I ran directly to Mr. Burrage, and told him of what I had done.

Words cannot express the violence and intensity of his anger on learning the consequences of my remissness; but when he actually saw for himself the ruin wrought among his petted favorites, in which he had taken so much pride, the storm of his wrath became terrible. He reproached me in the bitterest terms, charged me with wilful carelessness and ingratitude, and commanded me to leave his sight at once and forever—to let him see no more of me or mine.

I had no words to defend myself. I knew my fault deserved punishment. Silent and sick and trembling, I turned away. I went to my room, tied up in a parcel the few articles of clothing I possessed in the world, and left Mr. Burrage's house.

It was a wild, bitter wintry morning. The skies were gray and cold as I left the gates. Far down on the lake, which was thickly frozen over, I descried the little Francis, in his beautiful new sledge, flying swiftly thither and thither, guided by one of the servants. Then my tears blinded me; they filled my eyes, and ran over my cheeks like rain, freezing as they fell. I hurried on. I was afraid that the affectionate little fellow should see me, and I could not bear parting with him.

I reached home, and told my father and mother what had happened. They were both startled; both looked pale, and grave, and sorrowful, for a little while.

"Your fault has indeed been a serious one, Harry," said my father, presently. "You have caused Mr. Burrage a great loss. But we must even try and repay it as soon as we may, though I fear it will be long before we are able to do so."

He spoke so gently that my tears burst forth afresh, and flowed the faster as I met my mother's sad yet pitying glance. They both entreated me not to weep. But how could I help it? I had not only caused Mr. Burrage a great loss, but I had also deprived them of the home which had been promised them. Of this last, however, unselfish as they were, they would not think.

"We must seek to repair the evils that befall us, rather than lament them," said my father.

And after a somewhat lengthy conversation with my mother, he declared his intention of setting out on the morrow to a neighboring town, to seek for employment of some kind, let it be what it would. I wished to go with him. This, however, he would not allow. I was not big enough, he said, to walk so many miles as he should be obliged to go. So the next morning he kissed my mother and me, and set off by himself.

All the remainder of that week we were alone—my mother and I. With sad hearts we waited for some tidings from my father. And all that week I mourned in secret over my fault, the consequences of which had been so unhappy. One day, the gardener from Mr. Burrage's came to see me. The honest man was much distressed at all that had happened.

"I had hoped," he said, "that thou wouldst stay there; for thou'rt a clever lad, Harry, and I like thee. But now I know thou'lt never come back again, for the master is bitter against thee. He's been angry many a time with one and another, but I never see naught like this."

I could do nothing but weep, boy as I was. I had learned to look upon my master with affection, during the time I had been in his service, and he had treated me so kindly. Now, it was a most bitter grief that he thought so hardly of me. The gardener said that little Francis had been very indignant at my being turned away, and wished to come and see me, but that his father had sternly forbidden his doing so. I could not but be gratified with this evidence of the child's love for me. It gave me a sad kind of pleasure. I bade the gardener tell him I should always remember him, and then bidding me a kind good-by, he went back.

That evening we received a letter from my father. He was at a place some thirty miles away, where he had found, he said, some temporary employment, and bade us come to him the next day but one, with some neighbors who were going that way, sending, for our journey, the little sum we would require. With a full heart, the next morning, I wrote a brief letter to my former master, thanking him for all the kindness he had ever shown me, and expressing my grief for the loss which I had occasioned him, and which, I said, I would endeavor sometime to repair. I told him of our intended departure, and bade him farewell. This letter I sent in the morning, and then, with my mother, made ready for our next day's journey.

That afternoon, my mother went to make her last visit to a sick neighbor; and when she had been gone about two hours, and I was impatient for her return, she sent me word that our neighbor was so much worse that she had been requested to remain over night with her. So I sat down by a window, alone, to spend the rest of the short December afternoon in solitude and in sorrowful reflection.

It was a wild, fitful, gusty afternoon, bitter cold out of doors, and so dreary and dismal that it made me even more gloomy than I had been before. The landscape was covered with snow; the heavens were dark and cloudy. The wind, whistling and wailing drearily around, foreboded a storm near. And it came soon. It was about two hours before dark when the first flakes came driving down. I watched them coming—thinly scattered at the beginning, one here and another there, but promising a heavy drifting squall ere long.

And as I sat there at the window, I saw a little sturdy figure plodding bravely along towards the cottage—a little figure in a snow plaid coat and cap that were powdered lightly with the snow that was beginning to fall. It was Francis Burrage, my master's son.

He saw me at the window, and took off his cap, waving it to me. I sprang to open the cottage door and let him in. I was both pleased and surprised at seeing him so unexpectedly. He, on his part, threw his arms about my neck and kissed me tenderly.

"You see, Harry, I have come," said the dear little fellow. "I couldn't stay away any longer. I must come, whether my papa would let me or not; for you are going away to-morrow, aren't you?"

"Yes, Francis," I said, "I am going away to-morrow. It is very good, indeed, in you to come and see me, and I am very glad to see you. But was it not wrong to come without your father's leave or knowledge?"

He looked grave.

"Yes—it was wrong, Harry; but I couldn't help it."

"And this storm coming up, too, and you at such a distance from home! But you will think I am not glad to see you, Francis, if I talk in this way; and I am very, very glad indeed."

I kissed him, as I placed him in a chair by mine, and took off the little snow-sprinkled cap from his bright curly head. His face brightened.

"That's right, Harry. I like to hear you say that. I knew you would scold me a little for coming when—when papa bade me not; but I thought I would brave the scolding, just to see you once more before you go away. It's a great shame that you must go."

"You know it, then—your father got my letter?"

"Yes—at noon. I made him let me have it to read. It had angered him very much to read it, Harry. It was then that I made up my mind to come. But I asked him first, indeed I did, Harry."

"Well, he said no."

"He said he would punish me severely if I tried such a thing."

"And he meant it. He will punish you, Francis. Poor child! you knew it."

"Yes—I knew he would do what he said, Harry. But, for all that, I must come." And the boy sighed. "Besides," he continued, "I wanted to bring you this. You mustn't look at it till I'm gone." And he pressed something slyly into my hand.

But I saw. It was the pretty embroidered purse, containing a precious five pound note—his last birthday present from his father. I made him take it back. My heart was almost too full for words, as I experienced the faithful and generous affection of this dear child; but I was forced to disappoint him. I assured him firmly, though gently, as soon as I could speak steadily, that I could not take his gift, and that he must receive it again. I put it in the inner pocket of his little jacket, and buttoned both that and his coat over it.

He saw I was resolute, and would not be disputed. The tears came into his eyes for a moment, but he brushed them directly away.

"Well, Harry, if you won't take it now, I shall send it after you, or give it to somebody to spend for you."

"No, you will not, Francis," I said, kissing him; "because it would be very wrong. Your father would not wish you to do so, perhaps, and you would be doing it without his knowledge. But whether he approve or not, I could not take that money from a little boy like you; do you not see, Francis? I should as soon think of eating my kitten's dinner."

All this time, the snow-flakes had been falling. Francis suddenly started up from his chair.

"I must go now, Harry. See—it snows faster than when I came."

It did snow faster. A terrible storm it was going to be, by the wild, swift driving of the flakes, as they came hurrying down; and I knew that he could not get home in safety now. I was loth to let him go; but he declared that he must.

"Let me send some one up and let your father know where you are, that he may send for you, then," I said.

No—he must go home himself. I knew this was right, after all, though it might not be safe.

"Then I must go with you, Francis," I said, and went to get my cloak and cap.

He was overjoyed to think I was going. He said that after I got there, I should stay all night.

"No—I shall not go in," I answered. "I shall leave you at the gate, and come directly home."

"We will see then, Harry," was his resolute reply. "I tell you my father will keep you after coming up with me in the storm. It will be too bad for you to come back."

I let him have his own way. But I remembered that my master had forbidden me even to enter his doors again,—that even the letter I had written him that day had been received scarcely with toleration, by what Francis had said.

We set off together—Francis and I. Hand in hand we trudged along towards his father's house. It was quite half a league distant—a long way, with a storm driving about us, for two boys like us to tread. But I was not afraid for myself, though the way was lonely and wild. My greatest care was for my little companion. I walked fast with him for the first mile, that we might get along as far as possible before the storm made much progress. But often he grew tired, and then we were forced to proceed more slowly.

The wind blew violently, and was bitter cold. The road was white with snow, and the fences, and the trees. The air was full of it; above, around, beneath, nothing but snow was to be seen. It fell faster and faster, cutting our faces sharply as we went along, stinging like so many thousand needles. And how cold it was!

"Francis, how do you feel?" I asked of the little fellow who plodded on so bravely at my side, his hand held fast in mine.

"Are you very cold?"

"Not very," was the stout answer. "I can get along nicely, Harry."

And we kept on. I talked to him cheerfully, when I could, to keep up his spirits,—that was, when the wind did not take away my breath; for, as the storm increased, it seemed to blow from every quarter at once. Colder and more icy the snow-laden atmosphere became. Sometimes we could not see a dozen yards before us, so thick and fast fell the flakes. Soon the snow began whirling around in drifts across the way. I was glad I had come with Francis. Now that the drifts were beginning to form, they grew and multiplied fast, and I was forced to lift him through them. We made slower progress now.

An hour must have passed, or nearly that, since we left home, and we had not accomplished more than half the distance we were to go. But, by my own feelings, I knew that my companion must be not only wearied out, but almost frozen as well. My shoes were full of snow; my feet and hands were almost numb with cold. My face had scarcely any feeling in it. Still Francis plodded on.

"How are you now?" I asked, looking down in the little face that was red with the beating of the icy storm. My very heart misgave me as I asked the question.

"It is cold—isn't it, Harry?"

It was all he said; that was uttered in a very faint voice, and I was more troubled than I can tell.

"And you are very tired, Francis?" I said.

"Yes, Harry."

The voice was scarcely audible now. There was something besides the snow on his face. The child was crying silently, with fatigue, and cold, and fear. The wind grew wilder, the storm more furious, the drifts deeper and colder.

"Do you think we shall ever get home again, Harry?" came the faint, trembling, childish voice to my ear.

I could not have answered without bursting into tears. I looked at Francis. He dragged along more wearily at every step. Stooping, I lifted him as well as I could in my arms, though I staggered beneath even his light weight, and stumbled on through the drifts, while his head sunk on my shoulder.

I could not see my way. The air was all white around me. Everything was white. There was no path. I felt myself pressing through a snow-drift; higher—higher, my feet moved wearily, sluggishly. I could feel nothing now—not even the cold. My limbs seemed to grow numb—sleepy; and now I could not see at all. Everything became dark. And little Francis was quite still. A terrible agony possessed, though it had not the power to rouse me from the lethargy that was creeping over me. I think now it was the dread that Francis would die of cold. With the last struggle of receding consciousness, I tore my own coat from my shoulders and wrapped it around him, but as one moving in a dream. And I knew no more.

Francis would have died had it not been for him. His own coat had been taken off, and covered the child, whom he held sheltered in his arms, even in unconsciousness. It was thus he found them.

Was I awake—and on earth? A glow and a warmth were around me. An indistinct brightness afar off, crossed by ever-moving figures; and I heard the words I have recorded. The glow grew brighter. In a moment more, sight was given me. I was awake, and on earth. It was in a wide chamber of my master's house I lay, and my master's face bent eagerly over me.

"Thank Providence, the boy is safe!"

With a sigh of relief and terrible suspense, the words broke from his lips, as I opened my eyes upon him. From the lips of my master! I heard them. I was really and truly on earth, and not in a world of spirits. But it was as if I had come back from the grave.

I had been very near mine. It was only when fully restored to consciousness that I knew how near—when I knew that my master and his servants, in going at night-fall to seek through the storm for little Francis, whom some one had seen going to the house of Harry, the gardener's boy, had found Harry lying senseless in a drift on the road leading to Mr. Burrage's, with Francis folded in his arms, and sheltered by his coat, which he had taken off for the purpose, and which had saved the life of the child by the warmth it afforded; when I found both Francis and his father by my pillow, and knew that I had saved my little friend by submitting to the exposure which had nearly cost me my own life; when I found that the whole story had been related to the father by the innocent lips of the child, and my master, shaking my hand, with the tears actually standing in his eyes, declared me the preserver of his son's life, and himself my debtor forever.

From the circumstances of that day, in my boyhood, sprung the fortunes of the man. From the hour in which his beloved son had been so nearly lost, so barely saved to him, I held a place with Francis in the affections of my master. But my master no more—rather a father—a guardian. For to him was due the after-prosperity of my parents, who owed a future of happiness to him, in his gratitude; and to him, under Providence, I refer the destiny of the poor gardener's boy, who was ever after as a son to him. At the same academy with Francis, I was placed to continue my education immediately; and entered, eight years after, on my theological studies, after which I was ordained for the ministry. With the hand of a firm, unchangeable friend, Mr. Burrage helped me through all this, and gained for me, at last, the life for which my soul thirsted.

LINES TO E. M. H.

BY F. E. R.

Let others hail thee, fairest one,
An opening flower—a dawning beam!
Emblems of human love alone,
To me thy charming beauties seem.

There's love upon thy pure white brow;
There's love upon thy gentle lips—
A fountain sealed! but whence shall flow
Such honey as the wild bee sips.

For God hath gifted thee beyond
The herald's bootless pomp of pride,
With sweeter looks—with smiles more fond
Than ever decked a monarch's side.

Ehonor! be thou ever blest
And beautiful as now thou art:
A star of hope in every breast,
An idol to each kindred heart.

PYROTECHNICS.

BY FREDERICK W. BAUNDERS.

It has been sagely remarked by some shrewd observer of human nature, that, in every respect, there is as much difference in folks as there is in people; and in nothing is the truth of this remark more apparent than the different light in which different people view the subject of public amusements; and in no species of amusement is there a greater diversity of opinion than in the matter of fireworks. There are individuals—few in number, I grant, but very respectable, notwithstanding—who hold pyrotechnics in utter contempt. To them a bunch of India crackers is full of sound and fury, signifying nothing. A blue-light they look upon as a burning shame; a soaring rocket they consider the height of absurdity, and they never weary in making light of Roman candles. That such individuals have an undoubted right to their own opinion, neither you nor I will pretend to dispute, although they differ from ourselves so materially.

Now for my part, although I do not absolutely pine after fireworks, I am nevertheless disposed to look upon them with favor, particularly when they are exhibited in the proper place and upon the proper occasion. But I think I can convince the reader before I have done with him, that there are times and seasons when a display of this kind, so far from being a source of pleasant amusement, becomes in fact a positive evil and an unbearable nuisance, as the ensuing narrative will illustrate.

It happened one day during the fourth of July week just past, that Tompkins, having been invited out to dine with a friend, proceeded to array himself in his subdued mouse-colored breeches, his black velvet vest, and our new black dress coat—and thereby hangs an explanation.

Now it is absolutely necessary that I should make known to the reader why I say our dress coat, before I proceed any further, and to facilitate the explanation, it must be recollected that my roommate, Tompkins, and myself, are of the same height, weight and build, and in every respect precisely similar as regards physical conformation, with the trifling exception that, whereas Tompkins is rather an ordinary looking gentleman, scarcely possessing a claim to that somewhat doubtful title, "a fine-looking man," I am, on the contrary, a most remarkably—indeed I may say a miraculously—but never mind, I am not given to blowing my own trumpet. When we consider the striking similarity of our conformation, the absurdity and extravagance of possessing between us two garments precisely alike, becomes obvious. We long ago discovered this great truth, since which one black dress coat, one ditto frock, ditto one blue, and one brown ditto ditto, has constituted our joint wardrobe. This community of interests is attended with peculiar advantages, each of us receiving from our fellow-men the deferential consideration due to the possessor of four new coats, besides which, they are oftener replaced, and of later styles than would be the case if worn by one person only.

And again, it is much easier to obtain credit, as any sagacious and reflecting tailor would be much more easily persuaded to deliver a garment on time to a corporate concern than to a single individual. Secondly, it is much easier to dodge a tailor, and put him off when he becomes importunate, as tailors will. When we see the footstep of our relentless creditor approaching our room, what strategical exploit can be more exquisitely beautiful in its conception, than to have Tompkins dodge into the closet, while I, with a patronizing smile, encounter the knight of the shears on the threshold, and with much feeling express my regret that he had not called five minutes sooner, as Tompkins had but just gone down town for the express purpose of settling his little account, and was without doubt at that very instant chasing him (the tailor) about the city, with his (Tompkins) breeches pockets stuffed almost to bursting with bank notes of a large denomination. Such a course of proceeding is pretty sure to send the unwelcome visitor off in a pleasant mood, and when after a considerable interval he calls again, it is only necessary to vary the performance by going myself into the closet and leaving my partner as spokesman. I have known this single manoeuvre to hold the enemy in abeyance for three months, and never did I know it to fail of a good effect but once, when Tompkins, soon after entering into his closet and shutting the door, was seized with a prolonged fit of sneezing, which betrayed the hoax and caused our creditor to become so obstreperous that we were compelled, out of respect to ourselves, to kick him down stairs. It is true we paid dearly for it, but such accidents do not happen every day.

I mention this little dodge merely as a sample of the many that will naturally suggest themselves to a man of talent. Lastly, it is almost impossible to enumerate the many benefits beside those already mentioned, which flow from a community in coats; and in conclusion I would respectfully suggest that you try the experiment, making a partner either of your room-mate or some trusty friend. You are almost certain to succeed, and it cannot be denied that you really need a new coat, notwithstanding it would be so excessively inconvenient for you to pay for it just now.

But this is a digression. Tompkins having accepted the invitation, was of course obliged to wear the new dress coat, for, as is well known to all who, like yourself, adore the higher walks of society, that man could not be forgiven, who in this age of enlightenment should attend a dinner party in anything else; indeed, no person who was not determined upon committing social suicide, would ever make the insane attempt to swallow a mouthful in any other than a black dress coat. The invitation was extended to me also, but it being Tompkins's turn to wear the coat, I of course was obliged to decline. Indeed, I could not have accepted had it been my turn, for just at present I am making strenuous efforts to establish a reputation among my friends, of being literary, and a profound student. To effect this it is necessary for me to eschew all hilarity, to affect the dignified and reserved, to walk with my claws clasped beneath my coat-tails, my head bowed, my brow knitted and my lips muttering; to start suddenly when spoken to, and appear abstracted and thoughtful. It is mighty difficult to accomplish all this, for a fellow is apt to forget himself and appear inconsistent; but I am already well paid for my trouble, for it is the firm conviction of all my acquaintances that I am engaged upon a great work, requiring the profoundest research and study, a conviction which I render a certainty by allowing to lie upon my table several quires of partially written manuscript, upon the outside sheet of which is inscribed in bold characters, "Shakspeare and the Shakers; being an inquiry as to the real authorship of the works hitherto attributed to Mother Goose."

But here I am again wandering away from my subject. I must stick more closely to my text, or the little incident I had intended to relate in about forty-three words, will extend to as many pages. To take up the thread of the story then where it was broken off, Tompkins donned the black dress coat and went to the dinner party, leaving me to my literary labors, which for that day consisted in repairing sundry rips and rents to which my nether garments had been subjected in the battle of life, and replacing divers suspender buttons and other of those artificial aids which help to support frail human nature in its weary pilgrimage to the grave. Profoundly interested by the absorbing nature of my occupation, the hours sped swiftly by, until Tompkins's well known footstep was heard upon the stairs. At the moment of his return all my energies were bent upon darning a large hole in the toe of one of my stockings. The proper performance of this important matter I found to be attended with no little difficulty, and it taxed my ingenuity to the utmost. Three several times had I obliterated all traces of the aperture by passing the needle and yarn backward and forward across the objectionable opening, until to all appearance the stocking was good as new, though there was an evident disproportion in its shape. The singular look of the thing induced me to try it on, when I found to my surprise that, although a perfectly sound stocking, it had somehow become much shorter than it was wont, bringing the heel toward the middle of my foot. Three separate times I undid my work, and as many times did it over again, but with the same result—it was too short. I was a good deal vexed at my want of success. There was evidently something wrong, unless, indeed, the thing was enchanted, and I determined, come what might, to darn that stocking in a proper manner and have it long enough too. It had become a matter of principle with me to accomplish that object, and I set myself deliberately to consider the cause of the strange phenomenon that had thrice baffled me.

At length an idea occurred to me, and hastily undoing my previous work, I took a pint porter bottle, and inserting it in the stocking foot, distended and held apart the edges of the foramen while I wove the yarn back and forth across it. This plan succeeded admirably. I was even more than successful, for not only was the stocking long enough, but there was a considerable superabundance of toe to be lapped over. This to be sure was not altogether desirable, but I had achieved a victory, and it could be borne; indeed, I rather looked upon that extra bunch of woolen as a trophy to my skill and indomitable perseverance.

It was while in the midst of this absorbing occupation that Tompkins hastily entered the room. Too much interested in the accomplishment of my object to give much attention to him, I merely looked up and again continued my work, while he divested himself of his bestmated apparel and stuck himself into other and less expensive garments.

"There, Jinx," he said, as he hung our coat in the closet, "I've been buying a mess of those firework concerns, crackers, torpedoes and that sort of thing, to throw out the window at the gals, to frighten 'em a bit, you know, on the fourth—wont it be jolly?"

I admitted that the effect to be produced would without doubt be uncommonly jolly.

"I say, Jinx," he continued, as he left the room, "I'm going down the harbor with a crowd of chaps, to have a reg'lar high time; so you needn't be alarmed if you don't see me back here again afore a week from next fall;" and slamming the door behind him he galloped down stairs, leaving me to my labors, which I continued with much ardor, being so much pleased with my newly discovered plan of darning that I could not bear to stop. One stocking after another was nicely mended, until the supply began to fall short, and I was thinking seriously of going to the room of some other lodger and repairing his hose for him, so greatly was I pleased by the discovery of this new and improved process, when the girl who answered the door bell entered with a note.

The sight of the well-known hand-writing upon the envelope put me in such a flurry that I pricked myself consumedly with the darning needle in my hurry to get hold of the note. It was from Carrie! The beloved female with many expressions of endearment gave me to understand that, had the fates so willed it that she could visit the theatre that evening and witness the enactment of that highly intellectual drama, "The Forty Thieves," her happiness would have been complete. "But," continued the note, "if it was so ordered by an over-ruling destiny that she was to be debarred from that as from other innocent amusements, she would try to bear up under it, and though her heart bled, she would wear a smile on her countenance, and in my own beautiful language, 'suffer and be strong.'"

The meek spirit of resignation evinced in the missive touched me deeply. It would have touched any chap, particularly if his adored had credited to himself Mr. Longfellow's fanciful version of that grey-headed recommendation to "grin and bear it."

There was no resisting such an appeal as this. No human power could have prevented my going to the theatre that evening, and taking my dear Carrie. I do not think I should have wavered in my resolution, even if it had cost me three dollars. It was already quite late in the afternoon, and the performance began early; so casting aside the half-darned stocking, which now held only a secondary place in my mind, I looked anxiously at my watch; but I might as well have looked at a brick—the thing being intended rather for show than for service—the fact of my looking at it at all being more the result of a habit I have contracted by a frequent pretended consultation of the turnip when in company. But to do the concern justice, it has a magnificent case, and, as Tompkins says, "It has been a good time-keeper in its day, but it aint now and never was." I was therefore not in the least disappointed at not being able to learn anything from that source, and running the superior portion of my tenement of clay so far out the fourth story window that I nearly lost my balance and precipitated myself into the street below, I was enabled to get a glimpse of the church clock. It wanted but just twenty minutes of the time mentioned in the bills for the curtain to rise "precisely." Withdrawing my head and shoulders and so forth from their exposed position, I proceeded to make a hasty toilet. To wash and shave the "human face divine," to brush the two rows of teeth appertaining to that divine face, and to neatly tie a flaming red cravat immediately beneath the whole divine concern, occupied just no time at all. Jumping into my boots and under my hat, I ran my arms into the sleeves of our dress coat and left the house. I noticed there was something heavy in one of the tail pockets, but being in too great a hurry to examine what it might be, I walked rapidly toward Carrie's residence. The dear child was in ecstasies of delight at seeing me, she was so—so glad I had come; she had not the remotest idea her little note would induce me to go to the theatre; indeed, she hadn't thought of such a thing when writing it, etc., etc., very much after the manner your own little darling goes on.

I admire to hear Carrie lie, she does it so prettily; so circumnavigating her with my coat-sleeve, I kissed her, of course, precisely as I would any one of my charming young lady readers, if she was my beau and was going with me to a jollification; though for that matter I don't think I should hold back hard enough to pull the buttons off my coat, if the young lady aforesaid possessed neither of the aforesaid qualifications. I will not insist, however, upon this latter point, for there is no knowing how I might feel under fire; I should, nevertheless, like amazingly to try.

But to continue: there was little for Carrie to do, she being already as well prepared for the excursion as though our going had been decided upon a week previous; so taking one of her little wings under my arm, we walked rapidly toward the theatre, chatting and giggling and saying nice things to each other, just as pleasant and happy as anything. Arrived at the spacious and brilliantly-lighted entrance to the temple of the drama, with the monstrous placards upon either side, my attention was attracted by the staring letters announcing the play, and I unconsciously uttered in an audible tone, "The Forty Thieves."

"Yis, mister, and there'll be forty-one when you get inside!" shouted a ragged little pocket edition of a man, as amid the laughter of the bystanders he prudently took himself out of my reach.

Now, although I am by no means of an irritable disposition, or given to flying into a passion without cause, I was nevertheless vexed by the impertinent remark of that miserable little boy, and nothing but the fact of my having a lady on my arm, the fear of the police, the danger of being late to the play, the probable interference of the crowd, the chance that the affair would be mentioned in the papers in connection with my name, and the danger that some big fellow would take the boy's part and give me something I could not buy at the apothecary's, prevented me rushing after that ragged, impudent youngster and demolishing him on the spot.

A moment's reflection upon the above objections enabled me to overcome my propensity to tear the offender limb from limb; and having with some little difficulty procured tickets, we were fortunate enough to obtain seats in the very centre of the house, where, in listening to the fiddlers fiddling upon their fiddles, and in contemplating a splendid portrait of the immortal Shakspeare, with a forehead fourteen inches in height, I speedily "recovered my temper," as people ridiculously say; though why they should say so I never could divine, for it seems more reasonable to me that when a fellow is getting over a mad fit he is losing the temper he had aboard when his anger was excited, and that he recovers his temper when the injury or insult, or whatever it may be, is repeated.

For my part, I cannot recollect a single instance of having my nose pulled or being kicked, that I did not gain temper amazingly.

I will not occupy valuable space with an account of the play, but hasten at once to the catastrophe. Let it suffice that everything went off admirably, the audience being particularly fascinated with the irresistible manner in which "first thief" (Mr. Janius Brutus Boots) would every now and again pop his head out of an olive jar and then pop it back again, a proceeding which brought down the house every one of the thirteen times it was repeated.

In this play, as all theatre-goers are doubtless aware, a considerable amount of vocal music is often introduced, particularly if the stock company happen to have voices of the slightest degree above the miserable—and in this respect our company was especially favored—on a body in particular, who "executed" an incredible number of songs, having formerly been prima donna to an Ethiopian troupe. One of her pieces was immensely popular; twice had it been encored, and now she was preparing to sing it the third time. She began; the audience listened in breathless attention; she commenced the second verse; you might have heard a pin drop (nine pin); she struck into a cadenza, her voice rising high and shrill in a sort of quivering squeal, like the opening notes of a horse's neighing, only less musical—a sort of thing called in musical parlance "a trill."

To say that I was entranced by the music, would be to chronicle a whopper—to me it seemed but small potatoes, anyhow. Not so the rest of the house—they literally held their breaths in silent admiration. Thinking I might as well improve the opportunity by blowing my nose, I sent one of my hands round behind me to my coat pocket on an exploring expedition in search of Sir John Handkerchief, and having discovered it, I began to draw it slowly forth. I may have drawn it half way out of my pocket—perhaps a little more, perhaps a little less—I will not pretend to be strictly accurate in this particular, but let the proportion removed be what it may, it was while the audience was the most silent and attentive, and when the singer was in the midst of one of her shrillest and shakiest squeals, and making her worst faces at us, that there occurred directly behind me a loud and most appalling crack, perhaps as loud as a small pistol, but in the perfect silence sounding like the thunders of Jove. In an instant all was confusion; the cantatrice faltered and stopped, the audience as one man sprang to their feet, while I, no less astonished than the rest, turned sharply round to see who the presumptuous individual might be that dared explode a torpedo so close to me, muttering an indignant "put him out" as I did so.

Not being able to fix upon any one as the perpetrator of the deed, I gave another tug at my handkerchief to remove the rest from my pocket, when crack, crack, crack! went more torpedoes, still behind me. Astonished, I again turned and beheld all eyes fixed upon me, while at the same time a rattled spluttering and snapping of unmistakable Indian crackers, and a thin smoke rising in my immediate vicinity, gave birth to a terrific idea—the recollection of Tompkins's purchase of fireworks flashed into my mind. Hastily thrusting my hand into one of my coat pockets, I withdrew it again with the speed of lightning—bang! For an instant I was motionless with amazement and horror, but a sharp burning sensation quickly roused me to action. Grabbing my coat-tails in both hands, I endeavored to smother the fire. Vain attempt! it only rendered matters still worse. Half a dozen of those confounded squirming concerns called serpents flew out through my fingers, and emitting a stream of sparks in their course, flew over and under and around among the ladies, singeing their hair and setting fire to their laces.

A terrible uproar ensued; men shouted "put him out!" and thumped the floor with their canes, women screamed and fainted, and came to and screamed again, louder than ever, while amid the tumult I despatched a couple of police officers making for me; but there was little need of their services; I was quite as anxious to depart as they could possibly be to have me go, for the unexpected "fire in the rear" produced a sensation which the reader can only appreciate by finishing this article while seated upon a red-hot griddle. With both hands holding my coat-tails straight on end behind me, and thereby in a slight degree diminishing the acute pain, I darted up the aisle, over the benches and down the stairs, capsizing men, women and children in my headlong course. Out of the building I rushed, a trail of sparks and exploding crackers streaming behind, amid the hoots and jeering cries of "go it, comet," from the boys.

Panting and exhausted with fatigue and pain, I reached home just as the last piece of that infernal bunch of pyrotechnics burnt itself out. Crawling up to my room, I proceeded to do that which it would have been better had I done before—to wit: to remove my coat from my shoulders. But let those who think I could have done so try the experiment themselves, and they will find that the instinctive action of their claws to hold the fire as far as possible from their persons, will keep them too busy to accomplish any other object which upon deliberate and cool reflection may seem to be the better course. Upon examination I found one tail of the coat completely burnt off, and the other partly gone, while my pants were 't all over—in short, they were badly damaged. Throwing coat and a heartfelt explication together into a corner, I flung myself into a chair and immediately flung myself out again. A sitting position was a decidedly uncomfortable one.

But I will pass over the events of that night. The next day I walked over to see Carrie; she rallied me good-humoredly upon my accident and asked me to sit down. I declined and walked home again. I walked my room all day. I believe I am getting fond of walking; I didn't use to be. If I was a member of the present Congress, I feel certain that a fair exhibition of my limbs would ensure my appointment as a member of a perpetual standing committee.

THE CHILD'S PRAYER.

BY MRS. E. WELLMONT.

Little hands are clasped in prayer,
Holy incense on the air—
Wailed to the fount of love—
Pleading to the One above—
Listen—for my child doth pray!
Listen—how she taught her how to say

"Our Father," give to me
Thought and heart to worship thee,
Thou, from whom all blessings come—
Parents, pleasures, friends and home—
All my warmest love and praise
To my Maker would I raise!

In this world of trial, Oh,
Father, keep me pure within;
Make me gentle, true and kind,
Onward, upward, thee I bind—
Till at last through Him I rise,
Jenny opens Paradise!

A HOT NIGHT IN THE CITY.

BY MRS. E. WELLMONT.

It is trying enough to feel, as the church clock twangs out the hour of ten, that the thermometer stands at 90°, by moonlight; to see the streets getting gradually thinned; the man with the checked coat who compromised his dignity by sitting in his doorway, and the daughters who promenaded, bareheaded, with their fans, dressed in gossamer, retiring for the night; the clerk and his pretty little seamstress, who have just taken an "ice" together, are separating; house-doors adjacent, over the way and further up the hill, are slammed together, and the great keys are turned to bid defiance to night burglars. There is no gas burning, for the moon has taken the office from the lamp-lighter; only here and there a hatless pedestrian is wending toward his lodgings, perchance dreading to reach his small attic chamber, the window of which careless Mag has left open all day to the full blaze of the sun, and the bed which he would give his last dime to know has no unwelcome tenants; he goes whistling along with the hope that he shall be master workman by-and-by, and build his house, and find his mate, and keeps pondering over what Jenny said when he last met her, until he has reached his suffocating room, away down in Mechanics' Alley. And Jenny, too, sits in her upper room, watching to see "Thomas" pass, hiding herself behind the flapping, fluttering curtain, while the perspiration rolls off her broiled face; for she has just left the ironing-table, where a dozen of mistress' skirts are made to stand alone with polished stiffness, and the bosoms and collars of the father and sons will require another hot day to rumple.

And it has now come to be eleven—so says the same church clock, and scarcely a being is seen; and feeling solitary, we, too, are missing. Spiral mattress—what a luxury you are! Linen sheets, cold and agreeable, who can say aught against you? City house, with the whole story unoccupied, and such delicious breezes playing through opened windows and wide halls, how can we envy poor mosquito-bitten friends at Nabant, or those pent up in little closets nicknamed "lodging-rooms," even at the "Notch," or at Nigurata at the "International," where the eternal roar keeps one wakeful? Why not say your grateful prayers for such a home, and go to sleep in happy contentment! Cool and quiet, such may be your honest intention; but alas! just as you are about sallying off to dream-land, that baby over the way sets up its nightly serenade. If this were its first concert, we would pity it and lie awake,—but no; every night for a fortnight, at about the same hour, the little tyrant grows restless, and cares neither for disturbing nurse or neighbor. How visions of Godfrey's cordial, and valerian, and soothing syrups rise before us! No mistake—we heard the pop-spoon drop on the floor. How long is the query, before it takes effect? The hour of midnight is tolled out, and still the baby cries. How long before he will get his teeth? But then there is the pain always right under the front breadth, and can we suppose "dear little Johnny" is going to suffer in silence?

And now comes retrospection. It was just so last year. Other tenants occupied the same premises; the baby cried just as all over-fed children do cry, and the nurse slept on and let it pursue its disturbing employment. And so we moved into the back chamber. True, we had seen a family moving in at the next door some days ago; but we never thought about their having a baby, and never should, had we not been aroused at the same hour as before by the long-continued, unending, snarling little wretch (the mother calls it angel), who would not be appeased until the nurse had recourse to the old-fashioned custom of sitting in a common chair and violently rocking, accompanied with the old goose melody of "lullaby baby on the tree-top," etc. The perspiration settled on my brow, a burning sensation came over my limbs, an irresistible impulse to sit at the window and give up all ideas of invoking Morpheus.

It is one o'clock! What train of cars leaves the city at this hour? Yet there is the whistle; the steam is on; the passengers are in cool quarters, and how swiftly they leave us behind who are soon to encounter another burning high pressure, and feel the ill effects of this night's restlessness.

It is now three o'clock! The ponderous ice-carts have just struck yonder bridge; the office-boy is trudging along two hours in advance of his usual time; noises, such as only can be heard at early dawn, are distinct; a little bird has come to sing his plaintive note before the bustle of the day; the baby is hushed; a few pedestrians are dimly seen, perchance they, too, have had a sleepless night; the sounds of active life are fast returning; house-mounds are cleaning the sidewalks to the entire destruction of brom-com, and sand is faithfully washed out between the interstices of bricks; yet it is a fashioning-day, a household law, which must be obeyed when necessary, and when not so.

Morning has come! You close windows, darken rooms, read journals, letters from friends in various quarters. One tells you "what an icy chillness came over him as he yesterday went into the Tuckerman Hayne, and found a huge unmelted snow-bank." Another speaks of "an iceberg encountered in a given latitude;" and yet another represents himself "under shade trees, where the brooks are gurgling by, and the breezes are laden with the fragrance of the newly-mown hay." Now whether shall we go?

We have tasted all these enjoyments; the novelty—or shall we call it the enthusiasm!—which such scenes occasioned has died out of us, and in hot weather it cannot be re-kindled. We know from experience what it is to be primmed up at the "United States" in Saratoga, and be present at a sweltering "hop" in the evening. At the White Mountains, too, when the sun at midday struck us speechless, and took all the sublimity away. On the seashore, where burning and glittered till our eyes grew dim; and epicurean tit-bits lost all flavor; and in the homestead, too, under the shade trees whose long shadows protected us from glare, and a desire to change our place. And yet, were it not that those babies keep up such an unceasing, inharmonious concert, we should cast our vote to remain in our own domicile until dog-days are ended, and then with renewed vigor we would taste the pleasures of travelling. "Better bear the ills we have," than fly to others we know all about. We only grieve for those who cannot withstand the tyrant custom which they fancy must be complied with—of eating hotel dinners in flooziness out of which the starch is taken; of lounging in drawing-rooms among a promiscuous crowd who know not how to dispose of themselves; of fanning oneself with very vexation because the lodging-room is so small and ill ventilated; and of hearing, to increase the annoyance, that the charge is nearly doubled at this hotel compared with five years ago, when we tarried there. "Yet we have engaged the rooms," says my friend, "and we must remain. Come and see us and attend a Fremont ratification meeting. We are to have glorious times next week." Just as if we would go a hundred miles to attend a political gathering, when we can witness such a spectacle almost any evening from our own windows! Besides, it is too hot weather for us to draw our conclusions as to which party we had better belong. We have read "Upham's Life of Fremont," and thought Young America had in him all the requisites to make him the most available candidate; and we have heard much to respect in Mr. Buchanan. We remember, too, how imposing was his appearance at a certain watering-place, where we sojourned with him; and had we with prophetic eyes then looked upon him as a candidate for the presidency, we should have sought to know him better.

But as women are excused from "stamping it" in favor of either candidate, and both parties are well represented by scores of our friends, we will take time to consider who would have our vote were we allowed to give one. But we must coolly reflect, and with the present intention of keeping dark and comfortable and at home, if we survive a few more hot nights in the city, our "ratification meeting" will be to call home all sojourners who are carried off by custom or fashion, and enduring "all the ills that flesh is heir to," no longer to victimize themselves, but rally under one common standard upon which is legibly inscribed the word home.

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF JAMES P. HICKCOCK. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 12mo. pp. 5-7.

Of course this book will have a great sale and it deserves it. It is a thrilling narrative of a white man—American, brought up among the Indians, and ultimately a chief of the Crow nation. As a mountaineer, a hunter, scout, a pioneer, and a faithful servant of the United States, on the war-path and in battle, his romantic adventures deserve to be perpetuated. The book was written by T. D. Bonner, at the dictation of the hero. For sale by Redding & Co.

THE TONGUE OF FIRE, or, The True Power of Christianity. By WM. ARTHUR, A. M. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1856. 18mo. pp. 354.

A powerfully written work of religious truth, suggestive of serious thought, and of great practical value. For sale by Redding & Co.

BERNARD LEE. An Historical Romance. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 287.

The period of this story embraces the Texan revolution and the Mexican war, a fine field for graphic narrative. In his portraiture of southwestern character, the author has avoided the "impossible" dialect attributed to the people of the southwest by many American writers. The name of the author (Col. Jeremiah Lee), will alone give this book a wide currency. For sale by Redding & Co.

ENGLISH TRUTHS. By R. W. EMERSON. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 312.

We are inclined to think that this work will somewhat disappoint the admirers of Emerson. It is a rather shallow and careless, and an occasional passage of power and eloquence. We are curious to see what the English will say to their portraits as painted by the American philosopher.

NEW MUSIC.—From Oliver Ditson, Washington Street, we have the "Champlain March," the "Brunette Polka," "Gipsy Polka," "The Poppy," a song, from G. P. Keet & Co., 13 Tremont Street, Boston. "There are angels over near us," by James G. Burnett; "The Truest Friend is God," a sacred song; and La Traviata waltz.

THE ANGEL IN THE HOUSE.—THE ESPERANÇAS. Boston: Ticknor & Fields. The favor with which "The Betr that" was received will ensure a warm welcome for this continuation, and both will grow upon the reader. Both "The Betrothal" and "The Espousals" are full of exquisite gems of expression and thought, and the tone is lofty and pure. The simplicity of the book is one of its chief recommendations.

CORIN NICOLAUS. By REV. RICHARD BARNUM, author of the "Ingoldsby Legends." Buffalo: A. Burke. 1856. 12mo. pp. 377.

This story first appeared, some years since, in "Blackwood's Magazine," and was then read with the greatest interest. We are not aware that it has ever before appeared in book form. If so, the American publisher deserves credit for getting out a neat edition of so spirited, so amusing, and so interesting a work. For sale by G. W. Colburn, 55 Cornhill, Boston.

EUGENE PIERRE GODARD, THE AERONAUT.

We present, on this page, a fine portrait by Hill, from an admirable photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee and Case, of this city, of the most daring and successful of living aerial navigators, a gentleman who has added an American to a European reputation. Eugene Pierre Godard is a native of France, and was born at Batignolles-Monceaux, in the banlieu of Paris, August 27, 1827. From an early age he exhibited a decided penchant for aerial adventure, and read up everything relating to acrostatics with the utmost avidity. His passion for soaring above the earth was first gratified on the 8th of October, 1847, at which date he made his first ascension from Lisie to a paper balloon inflated with heated air. Since that time he has made repeated ascensions, his last from this city, being his three hundred and seventh voyage. In Europe, he has ascended from Paris and other cities in France, and from cities in England, Germany, Italy and Belgium. At Gratz, in Germany, he had the misfortune to lose a noble balloon, the "Europa." He had made a brilliant ascension, had descended in safety and was letting out the gas, when a bystander, thoughtlessly lighting a match, set fire to the stream of hydrogen and the balloon was almost instantly consumed. In October, 1851, he went from Paris to Belgium, a distance of 200 leagues, in twenty-four hours. He has crossed, in his balloon, the English Channel, the Carpathian Mountains and the Alps. On one occasion he took a large party from Paris to Versailles, landing them safely. From Vienna, he made, in the space of six hours, six separate ascensions with the balloon at liberty, and eight ascensions to the extremity of a long rope, permitting some of the most distinguished ladies of the city to experience the novel sensation of rising in the air. Many distinguished European celebrities have been, at different times, the compagnons de voyage of M. Godard—among others, Arago, the astronomer, Victor Hugo, the author, and Prince Murat. On the apprehension of hostilities in Europe, M. Godard offered his services to Louis Napoleon, proposing the establishment of a corps of aeronauts, for the purpose of making military reconnaissances. It will be remembered that the victory of Fleurus, won by the French in the days of the first republic, was attributed to the information obtained by observations made from a balloon over the enemy's lines. Louis Napoleon courteously declined the offer, but the Austrian government, to whom he made a similar proposal, accepted it conditionally, and if they had sent an army into the field, M. Godard would have been employed as chief of an aeronautic corps, with high rank and pay. An official agreement to this effect was drawn up and signed by the minister of war and other authorities. M. Godard came to this country, landing in this city in 1854, and made his first ascension from the Hippodrome, New York. He was quite successful in New York, New Orleans, Havana and other places, and particularly so at Manchester, N. H., on the 4th of July last. On this occasion, as on that of his first ascension from this city, he appeared mounted on a live horse. He has such complete command of his nerves, that, suspended to a bar below his car, he performs a variety of difficult gymnastic feats with as much coolness and certainty as an acrobat in an arena on terra firma. He is generally accompanied in his air voyages by Madame Godard, who is perfectly fearless and thoroughly acquainted with the management of a balloon. Several American editors have accompanied our aeronaut into the realms of space—among them representatives of the New Orleans, New York and Boston presses. Mr. Fuller, of the New York Mirror, who ascended from New York, was much pleased with his trip, and wrote a glowing description of it. "The city itself," said Mr. Fuller, "seemed exactly like a miniature block model city, or like the village built with toy houses on parlor floors by children. The horizon seemed to rise, giving the earth a concave appearance. There was not the slightest oscillation to the car, which seemed to be perfectly stationary, except when very near the earth." Mr. Lassalle, of the New York "Courier des Etats-Unis," who accompanied M. Godard on one of his finest voyages, has placed upon record a spirited account of his sensations and his experiences. When they were about a mile high, he says: "A truly magnificent spectacle awaited us. The descending sun began to disappear behind the Highlands. A mass of fog cut off our view of the earth, and we seemed literally journeying in free space. Nevertheless sounds from below reached our ears with a certain distinctness." "The sun, with its parting rays obliquely illuminated the fog, and thus converted it into a rosy mirror in which we could see our shadow upside down. By degrees, the splendid picture was veiled by the shadows of evening, and the sun's disk finally disappeared behind the mountains. 'The sun leaves us too soon,' said M. Godard, 'let us go and find him.' A little ballast thrown overboard sufficed to unveil to our wondering eyes a new horizon still glorified by the rays of the setting sun. We can say, hereafter, with perfect truth, that we have seen the sun set twice in one day. The moon rose. We were now nearer the earth, and our shadow followed us in the form of a microscopic balloon in black, thrown into relief upon a luminous cloud. Soon, upon our left we discerned a city in a glow of gas-light which we rightly judged to be Patterson. We continued to descend, and, in a little while, found ourselves within hail of the earth, above a deep valley." Our contemporary, Mr. J. Howard Sleeper, who ascended from this city, in company with Monsieur and Madame Godard, Mr. George L. Colburn of Boston, and Mr. F. S. Merritt, of Roxbury, June 28, 1856, was equally well pleased. He alludes to a phenomenon noticed by all aeronauts. "Our car appeared to be stationary; and it seemed as if that, instead of leaving the earth, the earth was gradually receding, then rapidly sinking away from beneath us, leaving our balloon and car suspended in mid air." The balloon (the America) used on this occasion, was sixty-two feet high, forty-two in horizontal diameter, and contained more than 45,000 cubic feet of illuminating gas. It was subsequently ruptured, and had been through so many storms as to be no longer considered safe. M. Godard is now having constructed a new one of a large size.

CROSSING THE FORD. "COME ALONG."

This is one of those charming artistic conceptions, whose simplicity and truth to nature ensure sympathy and popularity. A young mother, laden with her burthen from the reaping field, is crossing the stream, followed by a charming child, the image of herself, a miniature copy of a rustic belle. Though the child is apparently left to its own guidance, and the mother, to inculcate self-reliance, bids it "come along," yet you see in her expression, her backward glance, the most tender watchfulness. Should the child miss its foothold, it would be in its mother's arms and clasped to her heart before it could strike the water.

HOME.

BY ROBERT R. MCKAY.

Where is there a spot so dear on the earth,
As the home of our youth, the land of our birth?
Where shall we find, in this wide world alone,
A place so endeared as the one we call home?

'Tis there we are happy with those that are dear—
We'll think of them often with many a tear;
We'll think as we wander, o'er earth as we roam,
Of the comforts and joys we had in our home.

Then give me my home, I'll love it the more—
Its joys and its ties in years I'll deplore;
Though humble it be, though lowly the cot,
I'll ask for it back, content with my lot.

'Twas there I was born, 'tis there I would live;
No spot in the world such enjoyment can give:
Though I wander about, my thoughts they will flow
Back, back to the scenes of my home long ago.

THE SHIPWRECK.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

"It will be a very wild night," said Michael Wayne to his wife, as they moved up closer to the comfortable stove.

"A bad night for seamen, poor things!" echoed Hannah, and a ready tear forced itself down her cheeks, for Hannah's father and brethren had all been sailors, and each had found a grave in the sea.

A terrible wind came at that moment, and beat in one of the windows. Another sigh of wind, and the chimney threatened to topple down; and the third seemed to shake the foundations of the small cottage in which the pair lived.

Michael Wayne was a poor man. All his life from his youth, he had been a fisherman, barely gaining enough in the short summer and autumn to supply the wants of the long winter and the tardy spring. His food was poor—his clothes were poor—and his was also a poor little cottage. And yet, by that law of universal compensation, which evens and equalizes all life, Michael was rich in many things. He was rich in a sunny, cheerful temper, which no poverty could fret nor sour; rich in a wife, who was the kindest and pleasantest soul that ever brightened a poor man's home; and rich in one child, whose youth was just opening into manhood, and whose devoted attachment to his parents was the theme and the cry of all their prayers.

And on this stormy day, the good and affectionate son—the only and dearly beloved—was out on the waves, exposed to the storm of wind and rain, thunder and lightning, and the pitiless hail which came rattling down like a shower of stones from the clouds. Neither of them could mention Paul's name. Something—they knew not what—kept back the well beloved name, which, before, was ever on their lips, until, at a more blinding flash than the rest, and a louder peal, as if the heavens were bursting asunder, Hannah uttered the word "Paul!" and sank upon the floor.

Merciful indeed, to the poor mother, was the deathlike swoon, and Michael thought it almost cruel to awaken her; but he took her in his arms, laid her on the bed, and bathed her cold hands and face with brandy—which he kept in the house as a restorative for those who might be cast on the shore—and poured some of it into her pale lips. She revived, and then begged him to go out if possible, and see how the storm was dealing with human life. There was an interval, perhaps only long enough to gather new force, Michael said, and he could not bear to leave her, struggling with her mighty fear—but she insisted; and he walked down to the shelving rocks that overhung the beach. Soon other men joined him.

Two or three large vessels were careering onward and still onward to the dangerous shore. Loud cries were heard, above the hoarse murmur of the waves, and the louder din of the storm, while the occasional flashes of lightning revealed ghastly faces and clinging forms, in every attitude of the deepest fear. Michael's heart sank within him. Beyond the shore, at a long distance from the other vessels, a single light burned steadily, like a star, when all other lights were quivering and trembling. He kept his eye upon that one beam, and the next flash showed him the whole of the little schooner from which it proceeded. He knew it instantly. Paul's hand had trimmed that binnacle lamp the very day before he sailed, and remarked upon its peculiar steadiness, owing to a certain wick, which he had himself prepared, as well as to the superior oil which he used.

"If he can but keep her head off shore," said he to himself, and yet aloud.

"What is that?" asked a hoarse voice at his side.

"Is that you, Mr. Washburn?" asked Michael.

"It is, my old friend," answered the gentleman, who was the richest ship owner in the town, and whose son was daily expected home in the Cygnet. "Are you expecting any one, Mr. Wayne?" continued Mr. Washburn; "or is it only your usual custom to brave the elements in this way?"

"I always come out in a storm," said Michael, "but to-night, I am expecting trouble for my son, who is out here; I fancy; I believe that to be his schooner, just inside of Norman's Woe, as well as I can see."

"I, too, fear for the Cygnet's safety," said Mr. Washburn. "And yet, perhaps, I ought not to expect her so soon. God grant that my Willie may not be near this coast!" And the strong man wept like a child.

"Your only son, Mr. Washburn?" said Michael. "Paul is my only son, sir. If you have other sons, you can hardly think what store we—that is, his poor mother and myself—set by the lad."

"I had another, Mr. Wayne. But he went to sea, many years ago, when he was but a mere boy, and since then we have never seen nor heard from him. Ah! that was trouble, my old friend! Must I be called again to endure the same?"

"Mr. Washburn, God will do right by our children. Let us humbly believe that he will, and give them up to his care. He will not lay upon us heavier burdens than we can bear—and yet, O, Mr. Washburn, while I speak, my heart tells me that if my Paul is taken from me, I shall rebel against his will!"

At this moment, a large ship came on, pitching and rolling, with one mast shivered, as if by lightning, and a band of ghastly looking objects on deck. As she made one fearful lurch, a terrible and prolonged cry came up from her, that seemed to rise far above the fury of the storm, or the deep thunder of the waves.

"That must be the Cygnet," said the deep voice of an old sailor, beneath the cliff. "She is expected daily, and Mr. Washburn's bright little son is in her."

"Mr. Washburn, hold up, for God's sake, sir!" said Wayne. "There is hope yet. Don't give way so, man! Willie will be saved yet!"

Onward drifted the ship, and fast in her wake shot forth the bright light in the binnacle of the little schooner.

"Both our sons! God help us, Mr. Washburn!"

On and on they came, now rising with the billows, mountain high, and then settling down into the trough of the sea, until both vessels were directly in front of the rock where the two fathers stood, regardless of the pitiless storm that was drenching them through, and only alive to the danger of their sons. They grasped each other's hands with a grasp that seemed to bring their very hearts and souls into contact. The poor man and the rich man! now poor alike, and bending before Heaven together in the same deep sorrow.

There was a time—it might be possibly ten minutes,—but it seemed hours on hours, when the noble ship was groaning, creaking, bending under each successive strain, when suddenly she righted! Contrary to all reasonable expectation, she took advantage of a temporary lulling of the wind, and stood off, with her shivered mast showing strongly in the first bright flash that came. But the schooner! where was that? They missed the bright light that had shown itself from the binnacle, and at once the fearful truth seemed revealed to them in characters as burning as the fierce lightning that flashed over the waters. The ship, in righting, had borne down the schooner!

Mr. Washburn had no comfort to give to the half-distracted father, who lay on the wet rock, unable to move, or to control the terrible sighs that burst from him. Nothing could be known, for the ship was still standing off, under her bare and shivered masts, and there was no probability that any communication could be had with her until morning. The stricken father arose slowly, and turned towards his home. Mr. Washburn supported him. He had mastered his own anxiety about the Cygnet, feeling nearly sure, after her late exploit, that she would ride out the gale; and his sympathies went to his poor neighbor, in his sighs and desolation. He bore him up kindly to his home. Hannah Wayne, hearing the sound of footsteps, joyfully believed that her son had returned with his father. She opened the door, and the appearance which her husband presented, sent her back, reeling, to her chair. The white faces of the two men told a tale which she had, for hours, been dreading to hear.

Mr. Washburn left the pair together, conscious that here there was no comfort to be given, and then went back to the beach. As the clock struck twelve, the wind subsided, and with it, the dense, black clouds parted. Through the rift, a single star shone out like a diamond upon the black robe of the night; and as the wearied man threw himself down on the rocks, beside the powerless watchers there, he saw another and another, until the deep, clear vault showed itself all smudded with the "poetry of heaven." A soft, warm south wind had succeeded the storm, but the ocean lay, with its great heart palpitating in strong, deep throbs, and the stars were looking down on fragments of wrecks that already were thrown on shore.

On the opposite point, large fires were burning, and showed, even at that distance, figures moving about, but diminished by the distance to mere specks. There was, doubtless, then another wreck there, and the watchers on the opposite shore began to think of walking over the narrow strip of land that separated them. A single horseman was heard galloping across, and the remaining few felt assured that he would soon be back with the news, whatever it might be; so they walked up into the town. Mr. Washburn was fascinated to the spot. As long as that black mast stood there before him, he must stay, and not lose sight of it. A man crossed the beach, and called to him. He answered, and the man ran up to where he sat.

"Mr. Washburn," said he, "is that you, sir?"

"It is, Burns; and yonder is the Cygnet, and in her is my poor, motherless boy! Burns, there is a stout wherry turned up on the beach, a hundred feet from here;—I will give fifty dollars to the man who shall row me over to that ship."

"I will do it, Mr. Washburn—not more for the sake of the money, than for the sake of the boy. Willie was always kind to every one, and I will engage to take you over safely. The waves are still boiling, but we can do it."

The boat shot out from the beach, and was soon riding on the billows, with the strong spray dashing over her, yet swaying to the fall of the waves, as if conscious that she carried a father's love. The strong arm of Burns was severely taxed, but they soon came within hailing distance. Burns lifted the trumpet, which he invariably took with him whenever a storm seemed to indicate any use for it, and hailed the battered ship.

"Ship ahoy!" he thundered through its tube, with a strong and powerful voice. "What ship is that?"

"The Cygnet, Crawford, master!"

"Are all on board?"

"All on board, but one!"

Washburn started. Was that one Willie? He shrank, trembling, to the bottom of the boat, awaiting the answer to his name, for which Burns had called.

"Stephen Morrison!"

"Thank God!" was all that Mr. Washburn could utter. In a moment, his joy struck him as being selfish. Somebody would mourn for that drowned sailor!

They neared the ship, and with difficulty got to her side. A crowd of eager forms were seen standing on her deck, looking down upon the little, venturesome boat, and eager to exchange words with the men who were in her. A slight boy appeared among them, and as the father was raised slowly into the ship, Willie's arms were around him! Even the rough sailors wiped their eyes with the sleeves of their water-soaked jackets, and old Tom Saunders, who had imbibed rather freely after the storm, from a bottle which he had stowed away behind his berth, blubbered out his satisfaction, in tones that sounded like a nor' wester sweeping round Eastern Point.

Burns hung on to the side of the vessel, his stout arms rather sore and tired, and the sailors on board, who knew him, alternately coaxing and jeering him. At length he sprang on board, by a strong effort, and as he pitched into the midst of the weather-beaten crew, he looked steadily at one man, who, with head and face tied up, and his arm in a sling, was sitting near.

"I ought to know that man," said Burns, approaching him. "Isn't it Paul Wayne?"

"Paul Wayne, sure enough, Burns, what is left of him. I have got a small buttering—not much to speak of—but when I went down in the schooner—poor old Angeona! I struck the side with my head, and somehow, my arm got broken, and—"

He was running on, quite out of Paul's usual calm and quiet way of talking, when one of the sailors, more considerate than the rest, suggested that the poor fellow was delirious, and advised his being sent to a berth, to sleep off the effects of his wounds.

"By no means!" said Mr. Washburn. "He must not be permitted to sleep for several hours."

The morning was now dawning—and hundreds were coming off from the shore to the ship. As Mr. Washburn was the owner, he could take Willie back with him, and feeling assured that young Wayne needed medical aid, he had him wrapped in the only dry blanket that could be found, and deposited at the bottom of the boat. Another man took the oars from Burns, and they soon touched the shore.

At Mr. Washburn's house, all was hustle and confusion. The wreck at the point, had thrown on shore several persons, only a few of whom had been restored to life. Among the latter, was a beautiful child, whose rich clothing and jewels were so conspicuous, that the doctor who had been called to the spot, deemed it best to take her in his carriage to town, and confide her to the care of Mr. Washburn's housekeeper, whose skill and kindness had been proverbial. She had been restored with great difficulty, and had it not been for the persevering skill of Dr. Page, would have been laid aside with the other dead bodies.

She was a slender, delicate girl, with blue eyes and long, golden hair, now soiled and dragged with the sand and sea-weed; while her skin, except where the rocks had cut her face and arms, was exquisitely fair and white. She lay on a sofa, in the housekeeper's room, when Mr. Washburn returned home with Willie and Paul Wayne. The doctor was still there, and it was thought best to dress his wounds and set the limb before his father and mother should know of his being there. The carriage which brought him to Mr. Washburn's house, was now despatched for his parents, and when they arrived, the housekeeper's room seemed like an hospital. Willie looked pale and wan, after his restless night, and occupied a great chair, while a large lounge was drawn in from the hall, for Paul; for Mr. Washburn had decided to keep him at his house, until he had entirely recovered, promising to bear the expense of his sickness, and, also, to provide him with a good vessel, when he should be able to go again to sea.

They found that the little girl was an English child, who had been sent over, with her nurse, to visit some friends; her father and mother being dead, and her nearest relatives in America. Mr. Washburn communicated with them, and they agreed to have him adopt her as his daughter, although not quite willing that he should do so, when they learned from England that she was a wealthy heiress. Mr. Washburn gave Paul a year's schooling, to fit him for the station of mate, and afterwards captain, of a fine vessel, which he was having built. The last voyage which Paul made, was finished just in season to see Willie married to little Alice Robinson, his father's adopted daughter, now become more truly his daughter.

Nothing is so beautiful as the devotion Paul bears to his parents. He has placed them in a comfortable home, in sight of the ocean. Mrs. Wayne's sitting-room is filled with marine treasures, shells, coral, sea-mosses, wrought into beautiful pictures by her son's hand, and these with curiosities brought from foreign countries, form a perpetual amusement for all. Michael Wayne can distinguish his son's vessel, before any one else knows a vessel is in sight, for, in the upper room, Paul has fitted a splendid spy-glass on a heavy frame, and hither, when they are expecting him, Michael takes his book and Hannah her knitting-work, and alternately, they peep through the tell-tale tube, until one or the other exclaims, "He is coming!"

A novel case of assault recently came before a London magistrate. Mrs. Baker loaned a griddle to a neighbor, and the neighbor returned it covered with candle-grease. The owner of the griddle, indignant at this treatment, took the griddle to the neighbor's house, and used it upon the latter's head with particular ferocity. The magistrate thought it very foolish for neighbors and friends to fall out about such trifles, but a breach of the peace should not be allowed to go unpunished, and he must therefore fine Mrs. Baker ten shillings, or send her to prison for ten days.

IRISH AND SCOTCH LABORERS.

The two pictures on this page are sketches from the life. The first, the Irish reaper, represents "a broth of a boy," in the palmy days of Donnybrook Fair, before good Father Mathew had revolutionized the land. His hat-band is of wheat straw. He has tucked his sickle under his arm, and is raising to his lips a keg containing, not water, but a fiery freight of "potheen," the "mountain dew" of the Scotch Highlanders. Now-a-days the reaper's bicker contains nothing but "water, bright water." A great change has come over the social character of the Irish peasantry, and the grand locality of their ancient saturnalia, Donnybrook, presents the most striking evidence of the transformation. The good sense of the people and the exertions of the friends of temperance have effected this revolution. The larger picture represents the female turf-carriers of Lochaber, Scotland. Two girls, both good-looking, with huge baskets on their backs, heavily laden with blocks of peat-turf, are descending the rocky side of a hill to their cottage. These girls are laying in a winter's supply of fuel. The scene demonstrates at once the excessive poverty of the people and their singular provident habits. In the north and west parts of Scotland, the only material in general use for the domestic hearth is turf, or peat, called in the Highlands foid and moin. It is unnecessary to describe so well-known a natural feature as a moss or bog, and the manner of its formation from the marshy deposit of vegetable substances, accumulating for ages. Such a tract is sometimes of wide extent, and although in many cases shallow, in others the depth is found astonishingly great. One at the foot of the Grampian mountains, in Aberdeenshire, was sounded with an auger of forty feet without meeting other soil! Mosses are often an unsightly blemish on the fair fields of a proprietor, and are frequently brought under tillage, and rendered excellent soil by agricultural skill. This is accomplished sometimes by cutting up the surface, which is barned, and the ashes scattered around; at other times, judicious irrigation speedily transforms the dusky heath into a verdant field; and in the case of the great Blair Drummond Moss, in Perthshire, the turf being cut deeply out, it was, by an ingenious contrivance, carried away by water, and floated into the river Forth. When the fuel is plentiful, a moss may be brought into cultivation without hardship to the people, and should it be wanted in future, the peat will again be found under the surface soil. The destruction of the Caledonian forest, which covered the Highlands, and the progress of improvement, have denuded the country of its ancient wood; and where coal is wanting, mosses afford a supply, as if by the order of Providence, of an article of the first necessity, for which no substitute is to be found. In some parts, where peat is valuable, the several farms have certain allotments, or "peat banks," specified in the tack or lease; but great liberality is generally shown in this matter, the poorer tenantry being by most land-owners allowed to supply themselves with as much as they require during the year. Some proprietors have, indeed, restricted this practice, of immemorial observance; at which the people very reasonably grumble, as an interference with their ancient rights. The peat harvest, to assume an expression, takes place in the months of summer, and the cutting or "casting" begins in May, the operation being performed with an implement called torrisgian, by which the turf is cut into pieces in the form of a brick, but thinner, and some inches longer. The surface being taken off, the torrisgian is applied, and the spade part being furnished with a sharp projection, at right angles, cuts the moin into the shape described. This is done within a certain breadth, the workmen passing alternately from side to side, and the operation is continued to a suitable depth, the pieces being detached with rapidity and thrown to the bank, where a person dexterously catches them; and when there are no wheelbarrows, and plenty of hands, the peats are passed from one to another, spread out to harden, and then set on end by threes and fours to dry. If the weather is propitious, and the people diligent, they are then removed home, and "stacked" or built up in an oblong form beside the house, like a small hat, and protected from wet by a covering of the upper part of the moss. They are often, however, left in this state on the moor, and portions carried home when required for use. The primitive stack was conical, and hence called "cruch whoine," as descriptive of its form. The poorer people have their "firing" cut and taken home for them by their friendly neighbors, and there is often seen a spirit of co-operation such as a socialist might envy. A certain farmer wishes to have the whole quantity of fuel which he requires cut up at once, he therefore intimates his desire, when all the adjacent tenants turn out, both men and women, and the work is speedily accomplished, generally in one day. This affords a scene of great animation, for casks of whiskey and ale, bread, cheese, fish and mutton, are provided in cheering abundance; and now-a-days the portion of the laborers are provided with their valued beverage, the heart-healing tea. This is a mutual service rendered to each other with great delight, and is particularly remarkable in the country of Sutherland. Peat fuel is burned on the hearth, and considerable skill is said to be necessary in its right management. It makes a cheerful fire, throwing out great heat, with a smell which pervades the whole house, but is not disagreeable, and its effects are said to be less injurious than those of coal. The ashes are carefully preserved and are a useful manure, especially when mixed with sea-weed or with other substances. The Scotch peasantry are famous for their habits of thrift; indeed, without the most rigid economy and self-denial, numbers of them would perish of actual starvation.

GRANT THORBURN.

The accompanying portrait was drawn for us by Barry, from a painting by Freeman, and is pronounced by competent judges an excellent likeness of the well-known original. Mr. Thorburn was born in Scotland, but has for many years been a citizen of the United States. Galt, the Scotch novelist, introduced him into a romance under the pseudonym of "Laurie Todd," but his actual career, which, in some respects, has been "stranger than fiction," has been delineated in an autobiography, published in New York. Arriving in this country just after attaining his majority, with nothing but his trade (that of a nail-maker) to rely upon, he worked his way up to competence by diligence, industry and resolution. For many years he was a leading seedsman and florist in New York, having been accidentally led to the adoption of that business. He still pursues this occupation in New Haven, Ct. Though far advanced in life, he is still in the enjoyment of his faculties, as the readers of the "Pictorial" and "Flag of our Union," who have perused his spirited original sketches of the olden time in New York, have had occasion to note. In reply to some inquiries which we addressed him, Mr. Thorburn furnished us with the following memoranda, written in his characteristic style: "I was born in Scotland 18th February, 1773, arrived in New York in my 22d year, a wrought-nail maker by trade. Could only read the Bible and write my own name. In 1802 the cut nails cut me out of employment, and God transformed me into a seedsman—have married three Yankee ladies—one on the 27th of June, 1797, one on the 14th May, 1802, and one on the 12th June, 1853, and the honeymoon is still in the ascendant. Have six children, forty grand-children, and twelve great-grand-Scotch-Yankees. I have been only six days confined by sickness since I saw America; I never was drunk in my life; I never eat enough; I have drank six gills of coffee daily for thirty years past, and smoked six pipes of tobacco every day through the last sixty years (a slow poison in my case). I walk without a staff; I sleep without rocking, and eat my food without the help of brandy or bitters. I wear flannel next my skin summer and winter from my neck to my ankles, hence I never felt a rheumatic pain. The first night I slept on shore was the 17th of June, 1794; the garret was covered with shingles, the roof within five feet of the floor; there was no bed in the garret—I spread my ship mattress on the floor and laid down; the night was very hot, and the room alive with fleas, bedbugs and mosquitoes; sleep fled from mine eyes. At midnight the lightning flashed, the thunder roared, and hail and rain drops beat on that shingle roof. I knew not what it meant—we have no shingle roofs in Scotland, no such heavy rain, nor lightning flashing, nor loud thunder. The windows being open the garret seemed on fire—I trembled in every limb. The storm cleared and day broke at three A. M. I rose—head-ache, bone-ache, and spirits sunk down to my heels. I wished myself at home again; I had never been twenty miles from the house where I was born till I started for America. Being a stranger, I was loth to disturb the family by going out so early; to improve an hour I opened my small box of books, thinking they wanted airing, having been fourteen weeks in the damp hold of the ship. On the top lay a small pocket Bible; I opened the book. My eye lit on the words, 'My son,' I thought my father spoke; his pious hands placed the book where it might draw my first attention. I read to the end, when, looking up—I had been reading the third chapter of Proverbs. The effect was—my headache fled, pain disappeared and my spirits rose ninety-nine per cent. above par; I grasped my nail-hammer and went forth to earn my first sixpence in America, resolving to take this chapter for my guide and the sixth verse for my pilot. It is sixty-two years since that morning, and often, very often, when not knowing whither to turn, to the right hand or to the left, on turning to this chapter, I found written: 'This is the way—walk ye in it.'

MORMONS CROSSING THE PRAIRIE.

The striking scene on this page was drawn for us recently at Fort des Moines, and may be relied on for its fidelity. It was made on the occasion of the transit of a company of Mormons, numbering about six hundred, men, women and children, on their way to Salt Lake, 1400 miles from the fort. They travelled on foot, each family drawing a handcart containing household goods, etc. The train presented a novel sight as it moved on over the great overland route to the Pacific, and though the dwellers on the line see many different kinds of conveyances, the Mormon equipage was something new.

CHAPTER VIII.

INTERVIEW BETWEEN MR. HAMLEN AND ISHMAEL WITHERS.

AN hour or so after Bessie returned home, Ishmael Withers called and inquired for her father.

"My husband," said Mrs. Hamlen, "is in the library, and requested me to tell you, if you called, that he would see you there."

Mr. Hamlen, who had heard him enter, came to the head of the stairs and invited him to walk up.

"Well, sir," said Withers, seating himself in the comfortable arm-chair which Mr. Hamlen offered him, "have you spoken to your daughter yet, on the subject I named to you?"

"No, not yet—but I've thought about it, and have come to the conclusion that we had better give her time to get her thoughts off of this Wilton Richmond. Besides, we may as well, in the first place, come to a fair understanding between ourselves."

"This, sir, is nothing more nor less than clear, sheer evasion. I am not to be trifled with, Mr. Hamlen."

And Withers knit his brows, and a fiery gleam shot from his eyes, which materially detracted from that look of meekness which he usually endeavored to assume.

"You are mistaken, Mr. Withers. I am sure I never entertained the thought of evading the matter. It will be no fault of mine if Bessie doesn't consent to accept you for a husband."

"I am glad to hear you say so. I believe I haven't named to you that I have recently received a letter containing rather pleasing intelligence respecting this Wilton Richmond?"

"No—what is it?"

"I will read the letter to you—that is, all you will care to hear. It is from a man I have dealings with, and part of it relates to my own affairs."

As he finished speaking, he put his hand in his pocket and took thence a number of papers, among which were several letters. He looked them over, and then once more put his hand into his pocket, which he found was empty.

"Can it be possible that I've lost that letter?" said he, his pale countenance growing still more cadaverous than usual.

"You may have left it at your boarding-house. You of course remember what was in it?"

"O, yes, to be sure I do—but then, as I said, a part of it relates to my own affairs—you know I have been dabbling a little in the fur trade—and when I make a bargain, I prefer to have the knowledge of its details confined to the parties immediately interested; otherwise, before I'm aware, a dozen spoons will be dipping in the same dish with me. Besides, it isn't exactly safe to have it known that I have dealings with those Indians who have accepted bribes of the British."

"That is true. But what is this pleasant intelligence about Wilton, which you spoke of?"

"Nothing, only he has fallen into safe hands—that is, as far as your interests and mine are concerned."

"Have the red-skins run across him?"

"Yes, and they'll take good care of him."

"They wont murder him?"

This was said with a slight shudder, and he looked Withers keenly in the face, as if he imagined that the true answer to his question might be found there, rather than in his words. But Withers had already so far recovered from the sudden agitation caused by finding that the letter was missing, as to assume that impassive look, with which he was wont to mask what was passing in his mind, and he answered carelessly:

"No," said he, "there was no danger of that. He was alone when they came across him, and they might have killed him on the spot, had they chosed. You may as well hint to Miss Bessie the fellow's fate, or rather, as a drowning person will catch at a straw, the communication better be made in such a way as to give her the impression that the red-skins didn't spare him. As long as she thinks he is alive, I shall stand no chance with her."

"That is exactly my opinion. I will give her to understand that there's no hope of her ever seeing him again—that he has been put out of the way."

"It will, at least, prepare her mind for what you are to say in my behalf, or rather in your own."

"We may as well say in yours and mine too, I should think."

"Well, we wont waste words in drawing nice distinctions. As I have told you more than once, a powerful squadron, now in preparation, will enter Chesapeake Bay early in the spring, and it depends mainly on yourself whether these fine buildings of yours, after being plundered of whatever is valuable, are spared or reduced to ashes."

"But are you certain, even if my daughter were your wife, that you have enough influence with him who is to command the squadron, to persuade him not to destroy my property?"

"I shan't have to resort to much persuasion, I'm thinking."

"How will you manage, then?"

"Just whisper a few words in his ear, which, if known, would place his neck within the compass of a halter."

"But what if Bessie refuses the offer of your hand? I cannot be so much of a tyrant as to compel her to accept it."

"I can only say, if she does refuse it she and her parents will be reduced to beggary. I mean, of course, if your lives are spared, which it isn't very likely they will be, for General Cockburn will undoubtedly have some of the red-skins to aid him, and he isn't the person to balk them, if they wish to take a few scalps."

"And you would permit this to be done, when the few magic words you referred to would prevent it?"

"Why shouldn't I, unless I am rewarded for my trouble in the way I wish? They who desire me to do them a good turn, must show themselves willing to do me one. This disinterested benevolence I don't understand, nor have I any ambition to understand it. If you have any powers of persuasion, you had better hunt them up. I have already given you to understand that I am not to be trifled with, and if you don't believe me now, the time will surely come when you will."

During this colloquy his usual appearance of hypocritical meekness had been gradually thrown off and an air of bold audacity substituted in its stead. He thought that he had made the discovery that if he intended to succeed, he must appeal to Mr. Hamlen's fears. Though cowardly to the last degree when exposed to immediate danger, no one, when he thought it would subserve any desirable purpose, could better put on the airs of a braggadocio.

"I will do all I can—I will speak to my daughter," said Mr. Hamlen, his voice and whole appearance expressive of an abject spirit.

"And when?"

"To-night, if you wish."

"This evening, if you say so."

"Well, I do say so. It has been too long deferred. But mind that you don't forget your promise, as you did before."

Mr. Hamlen did not forget it. The moment Withers was gone, he sought his daughter and told her that after tea he wished to have some conversation with her. After what Dame Anstis had told her, she suspected what was to form the theme of conversation, and would gladly have avoided the interview. There was no alternative, however, and she could only promise compliance. She would have preferred to have her mother present, and expressed a wish to that effect, but the consciousness that he was about to overstep the legitimate bounds of parental control, caused him to withhold his consent.

At the appointed hour, Bessie entered her father's presence. He at once approached the subject to which he wished to call her attention, for it was a painful one, and he was desirous to get rid of it as quickly as possible.

"Your mother," said he, "told me what your cousin Edith wrote you respecting Wilton Richmond. Since then, I've had news which is more explicit."

"Mr. Withers told you—did he not?"

There was something—probably unintentional—in the peculiar intonation of Bessie's voice, as she asked this question, which caused her father to withdraw his eyes from the carpet and fix them on her face; but he could see nothing there to confirm the half-formed suspicion that she did not think he had derived his information from a very respectable source.

"Yes," he replied, after the momentary scrutiny, "as was suspected by Edith and her friends, he fell into the hands of the Indians, and his fate is, without doubt, sealed ere now."

"In what way?"

"You can certainly understand without my going into a minute explanation of so unpleasant an affair. You know, as well as I, how much mercy can be expected from those who captured him."

"The Indians sometimes adopt a captive into their tribe, and sometimes, watchful as they are, a prisoner has been known to make his escape."

"The instances are so rare, they're not worth mentioning. But it can be of no consequence to you, whatever, as far as your future prospects in life are concerned, whether he is living or not. Not long since I forbade all correspondence between you, and even if he is alive, I have no intention of withdrawing my prohibition. I have other views for you, and if I hadn't, Wilton Richmond could never be my son-in-law. It was an unheard-of piece of effrontery for him to aspire to such an honor."

"Everybody who has ever known anything about him, gives him a good name."

"That may be, but I don't choose that my only child should be the wife of a poor fisherman's son."

"I never heard it mentioned before that he was the son of a poor fisherman."

"No—he thought proper to conceal it. I didn't know it till Mr. Withers told me. If I had, he never would have been admitted beneath my roof, even as a common acquaintance, much more, as a suitor to my daughter."

"I cannot think that Wilton had any wish to conceal the obscurity of his origin. He was too frank and open for that. At any rate, he was always a welcome guest at the houses of the first families. The first time I ever saw him was at Mr. Marston's, whose son was his most intimate friend."

"Mr. Marston and his son are not people for me to copy. If a young man looks and appears tolerably well, and they know nothing against his character, it is all one to them whether he is the son of a gentleman or a chimney-sweep. But, if you please, we'll say nothing more about this Wilton Richmond for the present. As I have said, I have other views for you. Mr. Withers, who owns one of the finest estates in Virginia, though distinguished for his prudence and discretion, is willing to marry you—to make you, young and volatile as you are, the mistress of his princely estate."

An answer full of keen and cutting sarcasm rose to the lips of Bessie, but the habitual deference and respect with which education had taught her to treat her parents, prevented its expression, and she merely said that she thought Mr. Withers had better select some one for a wife, whose tastes were congenial with his own, and who could preside with more dignity at the head of his princely establishment than she could.

Mr. Hamlen sat silent for a few moments, then rose and took several turns across the room, in order to call to his aid a little more resolution than he really felt, for he could not but realize that Ishmael Withers was not the man whom any young lady of taste and refinement would select for a husband.

"Bessie," said he, when he had arrived opposite the place where she sat, "you must make up your mind to marry Mr. Withers."

"Then I must make up my mind to do what will make my whole life miserable."

"I have a reason, and a very weighty one, for requiring you to do this."

"It should be a weighty one, which would compel me to marry a man, whom I believe to be unworthy any woman's love or esteem."

"You are prejudiced against Mr. Withers, because his personal appearance isn't in his favor."

"It isn't that."

"Will you be so obliging as to tell me what it is then?"

"I believe him to be a bad man."

"Have you any proof that he is, or is your opinion founded on mere caprice?"

Bessie could have told him that she had proof, but she recalled to mind the caution of Dame Anstis, and refrained.

"You can certainly answer my question," said he, seeing that she hesitated.

"I disliked him the first time I saw him," she replied. "There was something in his appearance which I cannot well describe, that made me recoil from him."

"That was merely a foolish whim. You will get over it when you become better acquainted with him."

"I don't think that I shall ever get over it, for the dislike that I at first felt soon amounted to loathing. Tell me, my father, I entreat you, by what fatality has it become necessary for me to be bound for life to one I hate and despise?"

"To save your mother, and me, and yourself from ruin."

"There can be no greater ruin for me than to be the wife of Ishmael Withers."

"Well, if you like the phrase better, it will save us from being reduced to poverty."

"Were I obliged to choose between him and the most abject poverty—such as would oblige me to beg my bread from door to door—I should not hesitate, I would choose the poverty."

"You seem to forget that your parents are too advanced in years to give up the comforts and luxuries of life with the same indifference as a girl in her teens. We couldn't endure the privations and hardships it would involve."

"But how can your property be subject to this bad man's control?"

"You may be aware, that since our rulers, in the superabundance of their wisdom, have seen fit to plunge our country into this unhappy war, that property on the sea-coast is liable to be destroyed."

"Yes, I know."

"And have you heard that early in the spring it may be our bay will be entered by a large squadron which will sweep everything before it?"

"I've heard there was reason to fear it would."

"Villages, country-seats and farm-houses will first be plundered and then destroyed. My property must share the fate of the rest, unless you will consent to save it by marrying Mr. Withers."

"I cannot see how, unless he has some secret understanding with the enemy."

"It is true that the person who is to command the squadron is his friend, and will, at his intercession, spare whatever belongs to me."

"I understand now—but O, my father, can you indeed consent to save these buildings, beautiful and costly as they are, at such a price?"

"I merely wish you to marry a man of wealth, who would deny you nothing."

"He could not be less hateful to me, if the wealth of the Indies were at his disposal. But, father, even if your buildings are destroyed, these broad acres, which extend on every hand almost as far as the eye can reach, cannot be burnt up. You would be a rich man still."

"It would be like beginning life anew. I am too old for that. I should be utterly disheartened. Give yourself time to think of it, Bessie. You surely cannot decide to let the home inherited from my father be destroyed."

These were Mr. Hamlen's words, but he kept back the more powerful motive which impelled him to urge his daughter to so great a sacrifice. He did not dare to tell her that he feared the malice of Withers, should his wishes be defeated, even more than he did the danger which threatened the destruction of his property, lest, by changing her aversion and disgust into horror, it should tend to overthrow his own purpose. He was even conscious, as he sat in the silence and gathering gloom of his own apartment, after his daughter had left him, of a sensation akin to this himself, when he recalled the words of Withers, and remembered the cold yet fierce glitter of his eyes.

He tried to banish a feeling which he whispered to himself was foolish and absurd, but his efforts, instead of being successful, had a contrary effect, till, at last, it almost appeared to him that some horrible though invisible power, with serpent folds was tightening around him. Mr. Hamlen, who had, heretofore, always basked in the sunshine of prosperity, had the reputation of being a very agreeable, gentlemanly and amiable man. What he lacked most, was energy of character. He had never "learned to stand alone."

CHAPTER IX.

HOW WITHERS CAME INTO POSSESSION OF HIS ESTATE.

BESSIE could not help thinking that what Withers had told her father respecting Wilton Richmond, had no foundation in truth. She, however, subsequently learned that it was, at least, partly true. During the recent interview with her father, she had learned for the first time, that Withers owned a plantation in Virginia. But he had never told Mr. Hamlen how he came in possession of it, nor was it at that time fully known, except to himself and two others. Some of the circumstances were known to Dame Anstis, and these she related to Bessie the next time the young girl made her a visit. We will give the story in her own words.

"A gentleman by the name of Edgar Percival," said she, "formerly owned the estate now in possession of Ishmael Withers. During the last two years of Mr. Percival's life, Withers was his steward. About a year previous to his decease, being incapacitated from failing health to attend to his business, he gave the entire management of his affairs into the hands of his steward, whom he knew to be equal to the task, and who was, as he believed, trustworthy."

"Mr. Percival's only heir was a grandson, at this time about three years old, both of whose parents were dead. A girl, who had been Mrs. Percival's nursery-maid, continued to have the care of the little Edgar after the decease of his parents. When the weather was fine, she was in the habit of taking the child to the woods and the fields, where she often remained hours at a time. In this she was encouraged by his grandfather, for it was plain to see, by the vigor of his little limbs and his blooming complexion, that the pure, fresh air had a salutary influence on his health. The favorite resort of the girl was a little woodland glade, the entrance to which was a few rods from a beautiful stream of water. The shore of this stream directly opposite the glade was bold and rocky, rising perpendicularly, or nearly so, ten or a dozen feet above the surface of the water. At only a short distance from this, the river was margined by white and shining sand, perfectly smooth and level."

One day, the girl with her young charge sought, as usual, her favorite retreat. It was the first day of June, and the soft, velvet grass at the entrance of the glade was flushed with violets. She filled the child's lap with them, and then, throwing herself on the flowery turf beside him, with the help of a few long and shining blades of grass, she entwined some of them into a wreath which she rested lightly on his soft, sunny curls.

"Now Anzy must have some of the flowers on her head," said the delighted child, clapping his chubby hands.

"Anzy will," was the girl's reply.

"And she bent down her head so as to enable him to arrange the flowers as fancy willed among the shining braids of her black hair. It amused him for a long time, and he laughed gleefully when he had finished, but the soporific influences of the low and peaceful murmur of the river mingling with the mysterious harmonies of that wind-harp of the woods—a lofty pine, which rose near where they sat—were irresistible. The white lids drooped over his eyes, blue as the violets, and then Anzy, as was her custom, made him a kind of hammock by fastening the four corners of a large shawl to the limbs of a tree, about three or four feet from the ground. She had just placed her young charge in his aerial bed, and seating herself on a rock close at hand, had taken from her reticule a sash she was hemming for him, when a girl of eight or ten years old appeared at the entrance of the glade."

"Grandmother wants you to come over to our house," said she.

"For what?" inquired Anzy.

"She's sick, and wants you to make her some herb tea."

"I don't see that I can go and leave Edgar."

"But he's asleep, isn't he?"

"Yes, but he may wake while I'm gone."

"Grandmother is dreadful bad," said the girl. "I'm afraid she'll die. It won't take you but a little time."

"Well," said Anzy, after a minute's reflection, "if you will stop here and watch Edgar, I will go."

"Grandmother said I must come right back, the minute I'd told you."

"Anzy went and looked at the child and found that he was sleeping quietly. It was seldom that he waked under an hour, and she concluded to go. A path which crossed the woodland led directly to the house, and in less than ten minutes she was there. As the girl had told her, her grandmother either was, or appeared to be so ill, that unless she could obtain speedy relief, it didn't seem possible that she could live only a short time. Anzy insisted on sending for a doctor at once, but this the old lady opposed with so much earnestness and even vehemence, that she was forced to give it up."

"It's on'y one of my bad spells," said she. "Some good hot airb drink will soon bring me out of it."

"The herb-tea was soon made, but it did not, according to the patient's account, possess its usual efficacy. She must, she said, make trial of a different and stronger kind. To Anzy it appeared inhuman to leave her in such apparent agony, and with the greatest possible despatch she prepared and administered the more powerful remedy."

"There, I feel kind o' easier now," said the old lady, "and I rather think I can get along now with what my granddarter can do for me."

"I'll speak to Mr. Percival about it," said Anzy, "and he will let Aunt Sibby come over and nurse you."

"No, no," she replied, "there won't be a bit of need of it. These spells come upon me all at once, as 'twere, and they leave me full as sudden. This time I was taken worse than common, and as I knew 'twas your time to be out in the woods with the young squire—I always call him so when speakin' of him, kind of out of respect, you know—and that in a likely way he'd be takin' his afternoon nap, I concluded I'd send for you, for I knew you were too pitiful and kind-hearted to let a poor woman like me suffer, when I've nobody on earth to lift a finger to help me, but this child."

"Anzy impatiently waited to hear her speech out, and then, with all the speed of which she was capable, set out for the place where she had left Edgar. If she exerted herself to the utmost, she knew that the time of her absence would not fall short of three-quarters of an hour, and when she drew near the spot, she half expected to hear the child's voice calling her. She felt relieved when she found that all remained silent, and proceeded a little more slowly, for she was almost out of breath. Two minutes more and she had entered the glade. The first thing that caught her eye was one corner of the shawl in which she had left Edgar sleeping, dragging on the ground."

"How could she have been so careless as to tie it so loosely as to allow the knot to slip, was the question she asked herself as she bounded to the spot, almost without touching the ground. The fall might have killed him, was the thought that struck her, otherwise why should he be so silent? From this fear she was at once relieved, there being no vestige of the child, except the wreath of violets she had suffered to remain round his head, and which now lay on the ground close to the corner of the shawl. His little blue cap, ornamented with a small ostrich plume, which she had left lying close to the spot where they sat, while she wove the wreath of violets, was no longer there. Before wandering away he must have seen it and put it on."

"She went to the entrance of the glade, but he was no where to be seen. She called him by name, but no laughing infantile voice responded to the call. Suddenly a new fear assailed her, as her eyes rested on the bright river flowing near. With wildly throbbing pulses she hastened to the steep embankment which overlooked its waters. She could see nothing there, but at a short distance down the stream she saw something floating, which she thought looked like the child's cap. It was within a short distance of that part of the shore which was low and level. She was soon there, and then all doubt was at an end. She could see plainly that it was the child's cap. It was just possible that he might have thrown it from the embankment. This shadow of a hope, so eagerly welcomed, was the next moment destroyed."

"As she looked to see if anything was at hand with which she could reach the cap and draw it to the shore, she saw a blue sword-knot which had ornamented the handle of a wooden weapon that he delighted to have belted to his side, in imitation of his elders, which was lying close to the water's edge. On stooping down to pick it up she discovered several tiny footprints, which she knew to be Edgar's. A little further on she found others, at more or less distant intervals from each other, the sands, in a general way, being too hard and firm to be susceptible of any impression from the light footsteps of a child. Other and larger-sized footprints were on the shore, but this was nothing uncommon, and did not excite her attention. She followed those of the child, and found they led to a large pine log, which was disposed in such a manner as to reach some distance into the water, and was often used as a seat for those who angled for pickers and other fish with which the river abounded. Here the child's footprints terminated, several larger being intermingled with them, which were still fresh, as if some person had recently stopped at the end of the log for the purpose of adjusting something."

"Though trembling so that she was hardly able to stand, Anzy ventured out on the log, half expecting to see the child lying beside it under the water, which was so transparent that the most minute object on the smooth, hard sand, which, at this place, formed the bed of the river, was distinctly visible. Nothing, however, larger than a pebble or a mussel-shell was to be seen. At the moment she turned to go back to the shore, a distant sail-boat, which she had seen though scarcely noticed, swept round a distant point and was lost to view. As she jumped ashore, almost hidden from view amid the tangles of an old fishing-net which had drifted close to the log, she saw a gleam of something red. It proved to be a red morocco shoe, one of those she herself had put on to the child's feet, when preparing him for his afternoon's excursion."

"With a heavy heart she now turned towards home. She could scarcely doubt that Edgar was drowned, and yet, when she reflected on the manner in which the sand was trampled at the end of the log, she imagined that some one might have discovered him and rescued him from his perilous situation. As there was no one in that vicinity to whom the child was not well known, he would, in that case, have been carried home. The idea, as she indulged in it, appeared more and more plausible, and when the housekeeper met her at the door and inquired what had become of the child—finding that this, her last hope, had proved as fallacious as the rest, all her fortitude gave way, and she sank fainting on the threshold."

"Where is Mr. Withers?" were her first words, when consciousness returned.

"I don't know—I haven't seen him since dinner," was the housekeeper's answer.

"I rather think he's gone to the village," said a girl, who had been assisting to restore Anzy. "I heard him tell Mr. Percival that he had business there, and must go this afternoon or in the morning."

"O, I hoped he was here, so that he could break the news to Mr. Percival. He would bear to hear it from him better than any one else."

"What news?" said several voices, for half a dozen or more of the servants had gathered round, when it was found that Anzy had fainted."

"She told them what had taken place, which spread consternation through the household, for little Edgar was the pet and the favorite of them all. No one dared to tell Mr. Percival, lest, in his enfeebled state of health, the shock might prove fatal. It was finally decided that a number of the servants should go and search the woods, while others should take a boat and row down the river and round the spot where Anzy had seen the cap floating. By the time this could be accomplished, Mr. Withers would have time to return, and then, if unsuccessful in their attempts to trace the child, he could manage the matter as his better judgment might direct. It was growing dark, when, weary and dispirited, they returned from their unavailing search. In a few minutes afterward, Ishmael Withers came. Anzy was sitting alone in the housekeeper's room, with her face buried in her hands, when she heard approaching the door, those stealthy footsteps which she knew to be his. They ceased just inside the threshold, but she neither stirred nor looked up."

"What has happened?" said he.

"You know," she replied, still without looking up.

"Know—how should I?" said he, in such quick and startled accents, that she withdrew her hands from her face and looked at him.

"I supposed they had told you," she replied.

"No, the servants were all gathered together, talking among themselves. They didn't see me."

"At this moment the housekeeper entered the room."

"I'm glad you've come, Mr. Withers," said she. "Who could have thought that anything so dreadful as this would have ever happened! Not one of us has dared to breathe a word of it to Mr. Percival yet. You will have to tell him. Poor gentleman, he will never hold up his head again, I'm afraid."

"You haven't told me what it is yet. I must know before I can tell him."

"I thought Anzy had told you. Well, there's no such thing as concealing it. The child is gone—dead without doubt."

"You don't mean Mr. Percival's grandson?"

"Yes, the boy is gone, and such a handsome, promising child too. If he'd lived he would have made his father's place good, I've no doubt. But you mustn't blame Anzy. She wasn't gone near long enough for him to get his nap out, and to all appearance he was as safe as a bird in its nest."

"There you are mistaken, my good woman. Anzy is to blame. There's no need of her going at the beck and call of every old woman in the neighborhood who happens to have a pain in her little finger."

"How should you know where I was gone?" said Anzy, raising her head, and steadily fixing her dark, keen eyes on his.

"Why, hasn't she just mentioned where you went?" said he, looking towards the housekeeper.

"No, for I've neither told her nor any other person. I mentioned to her that I was absent a short time, but did not say where."

"When Anzy said this, Withers appeared nonplussed and disconcerted, but soon regained his usual self-possession."

"Well, perhaps she didn't mention it," said he, "but I took it for granted that you were off on some such errand. I heard Doctor White say the other day, that he expected it wouldn't be long before you'd take the bigger part of his practice off of his hands."

"Nothing more was said, for at this moment Mr. Percival sent for Mr. Withers to come to his room. What effect the communication had on him at first was never known—no person besides himself and Withers being present. In the morning he gave directions to have the river dragged, that his idolized grandson might, if possible, be found and placed by the side of his parents. He was greatly agitated, yet he gave his orders clearly and with much minuteness."

"Withers, at his request, superintended the exertions of those employed for the recovery of the remains, and when the directions of Mr. Percival had, in every respect, been complied with, he returned. It was near sunset, and he went directly to Mr. Percival's room. Vinna, the nurse, was present, and heard and saw all that passed."

"Is the child found?" said Mr. Percival, in his eagerness half rising from his chair, while an almost purple flush overspread his countenance."

"I am sorry to say, sir," replied Withers, "that though everything has been done that can be, it has all been to no purpose."

"This, according to Vinna, was said in a lugubrious tone of voice, but somehow, she said, there was a light in his eyes which made him look as if he felt glad. Mr. Percival, at the utterance of the first three words, sunk back in his chair as if he had received a heavy blow. He remained silent for the space of several minutes."

"You are certain," he then said, "that the orders I gave have, in every respect, been fully carried out?"

"They have, to the letter."

"'Tis strange," said he. "The river is neither rapid nor very deep."

"'Tis hardly necessary to remind you, sir, that the body might have been washed ashore, and that during the night some beast of prey—"

"Withers had proceeded thus far, when Mr. Percival, raising his hand with an angry gesture, while his eyes seemed absolutely to flash fire, exclaimed:

"Cease, sir!"

"It is difficult to imagine the mingled anger, anguish and horror expressed by these two short words. The startling effect produced by what he had intended should be rather consolatory than otherwise, was to Withers a mystery. There was no chord in his own bosom which would have vibrated painfully at contemplating the picture which his remark would naturally present to the mind. At first he appeared surprised, but when he began to comprehend that Mr. Percival was really angry, he turned pale, and shrank back like a whipped hound. After a while he recovered himself a little and attempted to apologize.

"Not a word, sir, if you please," said Mr. Percival, sharply.

"But I merely wish to explain—"

"Leave me, sir."

"This order was given in a manner too peremptory and emphatic to be disputed, and Withers, turning frightfully pale, left the room. He was muttering something to himself as he passed through the hall. He left the house, and was not seen again until the expiration of twenty-four hours. Where he spent the time of his absence was never known. After his return, however, he appeared to be in the best possible humor. His harsh and arbitrary treatment of all who were subject to his control, had heretofore made them his enemies. His manner towards them, from this time, was entirely changed. He treated them kindly and with all proper indulgence, and their spirits were too light and volatile for the sense of his unkindness to sink so deeply that it could not readily be thrown off. His orders, therefore, which had formerly been obeyed imperfectly and with reluctance, were now cheerfully complied with.

"The star of Withers was in the ascendant. The health of Mr. Percival, from the day he lost his grandson, declined surely though not rapidly. Now that he had no heir to inherit it, he lost all interest in whatever appertained to his fine and valuable estate. Even books, of which he had ever been fond, no longer possessed the power to interest him. It was a long time before Withers was again received into favor. Even the sound of his voice appeared to thrill painfully on Mr. Percival's nerves. All necessary directions were transmitted to and from Withers by a third person.

"Many months had passed since the loss of the little Edgar, when, one evening, Mr. Percival was suddenly taken worse. His personal attendants gathered round him in alarm, and then Withers, for the first time since their estrangement, ventured into the room. At first he crept away into a corner, but when he found no order was given him to leave, he hazarded the experiment of approaching the patient's bedside. From that time he daily went into the room. For more than a week Mr. Percival took no notice of him. As far as could be judged by any indication to the contrary, he was unconscious of his presence. Even this was a point gained, for it had not been long since the bare mention of his name fearfully agitated him.

"It was by many thought strange that Mr. Percival had suffered Withers to retain his situation as steward, but his spirits were broken, his energy gone, and so he suffered him to remain. By degrees, with that kind of martyr-like—or rather brow-beaten—air which he thought it politic to assume in Mr. Percival's presence, he ventured some little attentions, such as are promotive of the comfort of an invalid, and they were not rejected. This gave him courage to offer more, which, from being merely tolerated, were soon received with evident pleasure. His assiduity increased as Mr. Percival grew weaker, so that Vinna's office as nurse soon became nearly a sinecure.

"What method he took to finally achieve the purpose, which, undoubtedly, he had long had in view, was never known. The ignorant and superstitious, though they dared only to whisper it among themselves, were satisfied that it was by the influence of some unhallowed means. It was a matter of astonishment to those who possessed no faith in any such mysterious power, when, at Mr. Percival's decease, it was found—that was before known to the housekeeper, Vinna and Anzy—he had made a will, and that, with the exception of a few small legacies, had given the whole of his property to Ishmael Withers. There was a codicil, however, stating that if Edgar Percival, his grandson, should ever be found alive—no matter how remote the period—that any former will or testament made and signed by him should be revoked, and that all the testator died possessed of, whether lands, household goods or money, should be for his sole use and benefit, except one thousand dollars, which was to be given to Ishmael Withers.

"This addition to the will was not made without considerable opposition on the part of Withers, as happened to be known to Vinna, who, unbeknown to him, was in an adjoining apartment and overheard what was said. He professed to think that it was taking foolish and unnecessary trouble, but Mr. Percival was peremptory, and Withers dared not urge the matter too far.

"Withers took peaceable possession of what had been given him, but when it was fairly within his grasp, the difference between him and the courteous and munificent Mr. Percival was keenly felt. Those who had ranked among the personal friends of the latter, could not help feeling that it was a species of desecration to have one in his place so much his inferior in those qualities which constitute the true gentleman."

"And so that is the way that Mr. Withers became a rich man?" said Bessie, when Dame Anstis had concluded her long story.

"Yes—but he never has been, nor never will be, a happy one."

"Do you think that he had anything to do with the disappearance of the child?"

"It isn't always safe, Bessie, to make known our thoughts. I may say, however, that he didn't escape suspicion."

"And do you think that little Edgar Percival was certainly drowned?"

"I don't say that. Withers, however, thought he was safely disposed of, so that he wouldn't be in his way, and still thinks so."

"What if he is mistaken, and the lost heir should suddenly make his appearance?"

"In that case, Withers will be obliged to give up what he never should have had."

"And what became of Anzy?"

"She lived, though for many years her life was very wretched. She could not cease to blame herself for going away and leaving the child. After a while she became more cheerful."

"It is now so long since the child was lost, that I suppose the remembrance of it is no longer vivid enough to affect her happiness?"

"She never can forget it, nor cease to blame herself. Some day I will tell you why she is now more cheerful."

CHAPTER X.

A DESIRE TO PEEP INTO FUTURITY.

THE party of Indians who had rescued Wilton and the other captive, continued their march under cover of night, rightly apprehending that there would be an attempt to recover them. This might not have been easily prevented, had they not had horses awaiting them on the opposite side of the woods.

Aside from the dreadful fate which had threatened himself, Wilton, owing to the want of sleep and the agitation caused by being obliged to witness the wild and terrible ceremonies initiatory to the horrible tortures of the slow fire, which those who had made cruelty a study could alone have invented, and to which the handsome Indian boy was doomed, the more surely to appease the wrath of the evil spirit, found that his powers of endurance would have proved inadequate to the performance of the journey on foot.

The Indian lad, on the contrary, such was his faith in the happy omen of what he called the Wagon-bird, beheld the savage ceremonies and listened to the wild, discordant chant by which they invoked the invisible presence of the evil spirit, with an indifference amounting to apathy. Even when, with fierce, unearthly yells, the torch was about to be applied to the pyre, which he knew was so prepared as to burn slowly, though surely, and would consequently protract his sufferings to an indefinite period, his countenance was still radiant with hope. A rescue, even then, was confidently looked for. This expectation had so strengthened and renovated his vital energies, that, as in company with the foremost he threaded the woods, he was well entitled to the appellation of Hare-foot, which had been bestowed on him by his associates, who were unconscious that a king of England had borne it before him.

At sunrise they halted by a stream of water, and refreshed themselves with such food as had by the care of Christina Burmann been hastily provided, for it was through her that they had received such directions as to enable them to reach, in season, the spot which half an hour later, as far as the Indian boy was concerned, would have been too late to save him from great suffering, perhaps death. When they were ready to resume their journey, the leader of the band addressed Wilton.

"We are on our way," said he, "to the camp of the great white chief, General Harrison, who is preparing to gather his forces at the head of Lake Erie. If it be our white brother's wish to go with us, we will do what we can to shield him from his enemies should they pursue and overtake us. If he chooses to turn his steps towards the rising sun, where he will find the camp of another of his chiefs, he may take from among our horses the one fleetest of foot, but we cannot go with him."

"I will accompany you to the camp of General Harrison," said he, after a moment's reflection.

He would, on some accounts, have preferred to return and resume the command of his men, but his escape from a cruel death was too recent to make him relish the idea of hazarding the journey alone across a country, which, a great part of the way, was wild and uninhabited, and where at any moment he was liable to incur danger similar to that from which he had been rescued.

"And you," said he who had spoken to Wilton, addressing the Indian lad, "will you remain with us?"

"Why should I go," said he, "to look on the ashes of our wigwags? My mother, if she were here, would say: 'Go and help the pale faces.' She loves them. My father was one."

The chief smiled.

"It is well," said he. "Hare-foot is young and is as handsome as a woman, but he has the heart of a warrior."

In a few minutes more they were again on their way. Wilton noticed that more than one of the Indians looked back on the way they had come, as if half expecting to see the fierce Memattan and his warriors, whom they could not doubt were in pursuit of them. No one was in sight. In the distant solitudes the eye rested on no living thing, save some bird on the wing bathed in the golden beams of the morning. In the course of the day they fell in with a party of upwards of fifty warriors, belonging like themselves to the Seneca nation, and during the rest of the way they had little fear of being molested.

A few days after Wilton, under the protection of the friendly Indians, had arrived near Lake Erie, Ishmael Withers received intelligence which ultimately decided him to leave the neighborhood where he then was, and undertake a journey which would compel him to be absent weeks, if not months. It had been his intention, if his suit for the hand of Bessie should prove prosperous, to make a visit of a week or more to his plantation, and after giving directions relative to certain improvements he wished to have made, to return and claim her hand. The news, however, he had received, interfered very unpleasantly with these plans, and once he almost came to the conclusion to risk remaining where he was, and to send certain instructions in writing to him from whom he had received the communication.

He was on his way to Mr. Hamlen's and turning the subject in his mind, when suddenly, on rounding an abrupt turn of a crooked lane, he encountered Hammett. The boy had passed on twenty paces or more, when he called on him to stop. He obeyed, though with evident reluctance.

"You live with your grandmother, I believe?" said Withers.

"No, sir, I have no grandmother."

"Who is she then, if not your grandmother?"

"My aunt."

"Well, it's all one. I never saw her, and so don't know whether she is old or young. Will she be at home this evening?"

"She is at home always after dark."

"Tell her then I shall drop in for a few minutes this evening, between nine and ten."

"Yes, sir."

And turning on his heel he was once more on his way, when Withers again stopped him.

"I shan't be likely to meet any one there—no one but you and your aunt."

"No, we never have visitors at so late an hour as the one you have named."

"That will do."

Hammett hastened home and told his aunt what had passed between him and Withers. She seemed a little flurried at first, but soon regained her accustomed composure. She then went and looked into the little looking-glass.

"Time has not dealt very rudely with me," said she, "but yet I think he won't recognize me. I mustn't be too confident, however."

And taking from a drawer a stiffly starched cambric cap, suitable for a person much older than herself, she put it on, pulling it well over her forehead and making it fit closely so as to entirely conceal her black, glossy hair. This added at least a dozen years to her apparent age, besides making her look so stiff and prim as to excite the risibility of Hammett, who said that she didn't look like herself.

"That is just what I wish," she replied. "I've seen this Ishmael Withers many a time, but I should be sorry for him to know it."

"When did you see him, Aunt Anstis?"

"Long before you were born. Go now, and employ yourself in any way you like. I wish to be alone."

Hammett did not wait for a second bidding, for there were wild and savage dells whence came the sullen murmur of water, which, except at high noon, never caught a ray of sunlight, where he loved to recall the legends his aunt had told him, as well as green and flowery hollows deep down among the hills, where he often repaired to dream away the sunset hour, or to watch the gathering of the evening shadows.

When he was gone, Anstis took her favorite seat outside the cottage door, to gather up and arrange her thoughts. Though it was more than twenty years since Withers saw her, she had many times, within the last few weeks, seen him wandering over the broad and fair domain of Mr. Hamlen, noting with greedy looks, its richness and fertility. But she had never in all that time heard his voice, nor been near enough to him to mark the changes time might have wrought in his countenance. She looked forward to the proposed meeting with feelings of dread and curiosity. She thought she knew the motive for seeking the interview, and intended to turn it to good account.

ENORMOUS CONDOR.

In the course of the day I had an opportunity of shooting a condor; it was so satiated with its repast on the carcass of a dead horse as to suffer me to approach within pistol shot before it extended its wings to take flight, which to me was the signal to fire; and having loaded with an ample charge of pellets, my aim proved effectual and fatal. What a formidable monster did I behold in the ravine beneath me, screaming and flapping in the last convulsive struggles of life!

It may be difficult to believe that the most gigantic animal that inhabits the earth or the ocean, can be equalled by a tenant of air; and those persons who have never seen a larger bird than our mountain eagle, will probably read with astonishment, of a species of that same bird, in the southern hemisphere, being so large and strong as to seize an ox with its talons and to lift it into the air, whence it lets it fall to the ground in order to kill and prey upon the carcass. But this astonishment must in a great measure subside when the dimensions of the bird are taken into consideration, and which, incredible as they may appear, I now insert verbatim, from a note taken down with my own hand. "When the wings were spread, they measured sixteen paces (forty feet) in extent, from point to point; the feathers are eight paces (twenty feet) in length; and the quill part two palms (eight inches) in circumference. It is said to have power sufficient to carry off a live rhinoceros."—Temple's Travels in Peru.

AREA AND POPULATION OF RUSSIA.

Russia possesses in Europe and Asia a surface of 348,165 square miles, occupied by 65,183,437 inhabitants. France and England present an area of 15,530 square miles, and occupied by 63,407,990 inhabitants. While England has 4839 inhabitants to the square mile, and France 3789, Russia in Europe has only 647, and in the whole of her empire only 63. It is this want of concentration which renders it of the first necessity that Russia should connect her scattered people and provinces by internal communications. Mere extent of surface and numbers are otherwise sources of weakness, especially in defensive warfare. This has only been discovered when she was assailed on diverse parts of her extended empire by the allies in the last campaign of the war. She makes peace to repair this defect.—Westminster Review.

HUNGARIAN WATER-CARRIER.

SCENES IN THE EASTERN HEMISPHERE.

On this page we have grouped together a number of interesting sketches, all of them relating to the old world. The first represents a Hungarian female water-carrier, with her jar slung over her right shoulder, and her staff in her hand. Others are seen in the distance. The costume of all the Hungarian peasants is exceedingly picturesque. That of the Hungarian shepherds and herdsmen, shown in the next picture, is decidedly so. They wear their cloaks and hats with grace, and their attitudes are bold and decided. The third sketch is of a Chinese lantern—a very fanciful and tasty affair. The Chinese are certainly the people, par excellence, for all sorts of illuminations; and in the fabrication of colored lanterns, no nation thinks of competing with them. Their "feast of lanterns" is a show of unequalled splendor. Our next engraving is a view of the island of Malta, in the Mediterranean, a place of some importance, and of great historical interest. It now belongs to Great Britain. It is seventeen miles long, and about nine miles wide, and is situated sixty-two miles south-southwest of Sicily. It is very irregular in form. The capital, Valletta, is sketched in our view. It stands on a remarkable peninsula, which, dividing the waters, forms a double bay. The surface of the island is broken and rugged, and there is very little arable land. The rocks consist of coral limestone, yellow sandstone, and a yellowish white semi-crystalline limestone, which furnishes admirable building material. The climate in winter is mild and agreeable, but in summer the heat is excessive, and the sun's rays, reflected from masses of white limestone, frequently produce ophthalmia. The vine, olive, fig and orange thrive well here, but only a three months' supply of corn is raised. The British government has, by a liberal expenditure of money, made Malta one of the finest naval depots in the world. The docks and fortifications are admirable. Malta is said to have been first peopled by Phoenicians, and was successively possessed by Greeks, Carthaginians and Romans. After the fall of the Roman empire, it was alternately in the hands of Vandals, Goths and Saracens. In 1522, after having been a possession of Sicily, it was granted by Charles V. to the knights of St. John of Jerusalem. In 1798, the then grand master of the order surrendered it to Napoleon, and it was afterwards captured by Lord Nelson. The population is about 100,000. There are many interesting memorials at Valletta of the military order that so long possessed the island. Portraits of the grand masters, the armor worn by them, and their books, are preserved in great numbers. The last picture of the series is a view of Shanghai, a seaport city of China, and one of the five now open for European commerce. It is in the province of Kiang-soo, on the Woo-sung River, fourteen miles from the sea. Like all Chinese cities, it is densely populated, containing nearly 200,000 inhabitants. It is fortified, and the houses, as will be seen by our cut, are very picturesquely grouped on rising ground. The junks, with their clumsy sails, and various other water craft, give an animated aspect to the foreground. The streets of the city are narrow and indescribably filthy. It is a place of considerable manufacture—silks, iron wares, glass, paper and various articles of ivory, gold, silver and bone being made here. It is an important entrepot of the commerce between the north and south provinces of China; the coasting trade is very extensive. In 1853, the total exports amounted to $26,900,000. Shanghai was taken on the 19th of June, 1843, by the British.

THE SOCIETY OF LIMA.

Notwithstanding the wretched universities, the defective system of education, and the anarchy of the state, the cultivation of literature has made decided progress; and, in Peru especially, some works of considerable merit have recently appeared. The South American character, in losing much of the dignity and strict loyalty of the Spaniard, has obtained, through a mixture of Indian blood, which in Peru is almost universal, a vivacity of temper and a rapidity of thought which has gone far to compensate for the loss. The young men, especially, educated at the University of San Marcos, the oldest in the New World, or the College of San Carlos, at Lima, though spending much of their time in cafes and billiard-rooms, and devoted, it must be confessed, to cock-fighting and gambling, are extremely agreeable in conversation, and frequently well read. But, above all, the women of Lima form the most attractive part of Peruvian society. Frequently very beautiful, with brilliant black eyes, graceful figures, and bright, intelligent expressions, they at the same time possess much natural cleverness, exquisite wit, and most pleasing manners. Until a few years ago, they wore, when walking abroad, a very becoming and elegant dress, now only seen at bull-fights, religious processions, and other great occasions, called the sayu y manto. To a full satin skirt was attached a black silk mantle, which passed over the head, was held so as only to expose one brilliant eye to view, and leave the imagination to fill up the enchanting picture. Since the introduction of steamboats and railroads, however, this truly national costume has given way to modern French fashions. But the ladies of Lima, though they have lost their peculiar dress, still retain their lofty qualities, and are infinitely superior to the men in natural talent and intelligence. With such society, a residence in Lima cannot fail to be otherwise than agreeable; and, besides the Italian opera and pleasant dinner parties, a grand ball and fetes of various kinds, yield frequent opportunities of observation. A ball on a large scale is a rare occurrence, and the late president, General Echenique, was particularly sparing in his entertainments. There is an occasional one given at the house of the late Marquis of Torre Tagle, now belonging to his heir, who has married a lawyer named Sevallos. The entrance, through a fine doorway, with stone posts richly carved, and up a handsome staircase, leads to a broad corridor, with a finely carved roof, supported by Moorish arches. The great salon, a spacious room, with latticed balconies looking into the street, containing some very fine cabinets, inlaid with mother-of-pearl and silver, made a very good ball-room. On these occasions the festivities continue until four o'clock in the morning, when there is a hot supper. All the rooms in the house, including bed-rooms, are thrown open, some for dancing, some for gambling, others for refreshments, and the guests wander through the long vistas of apartments, in the intervals of the dance. Balls and gambling are the chief occupations of the people of Lima; the latter especially, which is their besetting sin, and prevalent even among the clergy. The young men but too often lead lives of idleness and frivolity, as is seen in their general want of application, and is exemplified in the scanty periodical literature of the country. Indeed, the general habits of life in Lima, as in all South American cities, are of a very frivolous character, and lack the sterling under-stratum of Anglo-Saxon society.—Southern Traveller.

ISLAND OF MALTA.

FOUNDLING HOSPITALS.

The one located in Paris is situated on the frontier of the city, and is a large and well constructed edifice. The interior is kept exceedingly tidy—the floors of polished oak, and the walls of plaster polished like glass. The babes are kept in cradles covered with white drapery, and arranged in rows along the rooms. A separate apartment is allotted to children affected by eye diseases, and another for sick children, both extremely well arranged. Children are now received into the hospital only when the parents sign a paper resigning them to the care of the state. If healthy, they are allowed to remain in the hospital but a very short time, being sent into the country and placed in the care of nurses, who receive one or two dollars a month. After two years of country-nursing, the children are brought back to Paris, and transferred to the hospital for orphans. There are on the average nine hundred children in the hospital, and as many as thirteen thousand out at nurse in the country. There are one hundred and fifty foundling hospitals in France. Whenever a woman desires to abandon her child, and she appears before a magistrate for that purpose, it is his duty to warn her of the act; but he is, nevertheless, obliged to accept the child, if she demands it. If she will keep it, he is empowered to give her aid. If the child is abandoned, the clothes are saved, or some token is kept, by which to maintain the identity of the child, and to enable the parents to reclaim it, if they wish to do so at any future time. Formerly, it was easy for a mother to rid herself of her child—it being only necessary for her to take the child to the hospital during the night, place it in a box and ring the bell, when it was at once drawn into the institution, and no questions asked; but this arrangement was abolished by the government some years ago.—Hartford Free Press.

ISLAND OF SHANGHAI.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]
 'TIS NIGHT ON LARA'S ISLE.

BY J. M. FLETCHER.

In quiet rolls the azure stream
 By Lara's verdant isle,
 And softly falls the silver beam
 Of Luna's placid smile;
 'Tis night, and o'er the lonely shore
 The linden shadows fall,
 And save the softly dipping oar,
 'Tis silent, dreamlike, all.

My bark is borne upon the tide,
 Like perfumed airs at play,
 Unknowing where they next may glide,
 Nor caring where they stray;
 The waters kiss the lovely shore
 As starbeams kiss the sea.—
 Would I might press with like caress
 The heart that beats for me.

BEATRICE, OR LOVE AND PRIDE.

BY LOUISE T. ZIMMERMAN.

NESTLING beneath overshadowing trees, lay a thatched cot, close beside a steep mountain, whose brow was usually darkened with clouds and mist, but occasionally the brightening rays of the setting sun found their way through the thick gloom, and then

"Each purple peak, each lofty spire, Seemed bathed in floods of living fire."

An open space lay before the cottage, which commanded a view of the distant village, but excepting this, mountains surrounded it on every side.

In the cot dwelt Mabel, the sweet "lily of Hazel Copse," as she was called. And who so good and gentle as Mabel? None in all the village, I ween. Fair Mabel knew no other home but the wild one she now inhabited, and she was content with that. Much did she marvel when she looked upon the careworn face of her widowed mother, and heard her tell of brighter days long since gone by; for to Mabel all days were bright, and her home the sweetest place on earth. She was the youngest of three children. The others were a boy and girl, both different from her in appearance and in character.

Willie was a brown-haired rogue, handsome and wilful, just two years older than Mabel. There was more sympathy between these two than either had for the dark-eyed, thoughtful Beatrice, their elder sister. Yes—Beatrice was alone, and deeply she felt her solitude. She never joined the children in their sports; she did not seem a child.

Much did the mother wonder at her strange child, and many an anxious foreboding had she concerning her. She would sit for hours gazing into the brook, or watching the birds as they soared far out of sight. Sometimes her mother fancied her asleep, she was so quiet; but if she spoke to her, Beatrice would start as if awakened from a reverie, and then seek some hidden spot where she could not be disturbed.

Beatrice had long attended the village school which was about two miles from the cottage; the others were sent with her as soon as they were old enough. Mabel won the love of all by her disinterested kindness. Beatrice won the admiration of all by her brilliant recitations and unequalled talents; but she was cold and reserved, and no one cared for her. Willie soon became the general favorite of both scholars and teacher, and was in a fair way to be spoiled, for no one could resist the fascination of his alluring face, set off with the clustering curls of his chestnut brown hair. Thus were the cottage children during the few short years of childhood, and happy would it have been could they have remained so.

Beatrice was accustomed to seek the shade of an old oak tree at noon, there to meditate alone, far from the noise of the other children. This tree was in the midst of a thick wood directly behind the school-house. A beaten footpath led from the pastor's house through it to the school-house.

One sultry afternoon, Beatrice was stretched as usual beneath her favorite tree, and overcome with the heat, had fallen asleep. It so happened that at this time the pastor had received into his family two young gentlemen, whose parents were abroad, traveling. They were to stay with him, and pursue their studies for two years—the allotted time of the absence of Mr. and Mrs. Louvegne. They were delighted with the scenery about the parsonage, and had just discovered the beautiful path which led through the wood to the school-house. Anxious to find a cool place to rest, after their long walk, they joyfully espied the oak tree whose broad branches formed such a perfect shade.

As they approached the tree, they perceived the graceful figure of Beatrice reclining carelessly on the grass. Both simultaneously exclaimed, "What a beautiful picture!" And certainly a most beautiful picture it presented. The lovely maiden was half sitting, half reclining, her head pillowed on a root of the tree, which was elevated above the ground; her long black hair half veiled her slender figure; the long lashes of her dark eyes proudly swept the richly-tinted cheek, and gave by contrast a purer white to her broad intellectual brow. One small white hand was nearly hidden by her raven hair, while the other carelessly held the strings of a large brown hat which lay beside her.

How long the youths would have stood contemplating this picture we cannot say; for a huge wasp put an end to the romantic scene. He settled on the hand of the maiden, and as Edward Louvegne instinctively brushed him away, Beatrice started up in surprise at finding herself observed by two young men, and one touching her hand. But the dead wasp at her side explained this, and both were profuse in their apologies for having disturbed her pleasant slumbers. They asked her where the path ended, and upon her telling them that its termination was at the village school, and that she was going there, they desired to accompany her.

Permission was granted with some surprise on her part, for she was unaccustomed to any solicitation of her company. To all their questions about the environs of the village, she replied understandingly, and they were much struck with the elegance of her language, and the natural haughtiness of her manner.

She conducted them to the school, presented them to the teacher, and then bowing gracefully, took her accustomed seat. Much whispering was heard round the school-room respecting the strangers, and many were the envious glances cast at the beautiful Beatrice. But she was happily unconscious of them, being wholly absorbed in her lesson. When it came her turn to recite a speech which she had prepared, a thrill of admiration ran through the school, and Edward whispered to his brother, "What a fine actress this girl would make!" But Frederick shook his head, and begged his brother never to suggest the thought to her. After school, the young men walked with Beatrice, as far as the door of her humble dwelling. Both were perfectly enraptured with her, but very differently. Edward looked upon her as a superior person, endowed with beauty and talents, which, if rightly used, would make her a superb woman. Frederick only saw in her a beautiful girl, with fascinating manners.

But where was Mabel all the while? She had held aloof from the strangers, and had gone home, as usual, cheerfully chatting with Willie. The Louvegnes little thought, when they passed the sunny maiden, that she was the sister of this superb beauty.

Beatrice said nothing of the youths, but went to her room to study. Her mother did not know of her adventure till Willie commenced talking about "sister Beatrice's beaux." She was so distant that even her mother hardly dared question her concerning the event which caused Willie to be so loquacious. She did venture to say:

"My daughter, you had company home this evening?"

"Yes, mother," was the reply.

"Who are the gentlemen?"

"Their name is Louvegne," answered Beatrice; and soon after she left the room to avoid further questioning.

"Louvegne!" repeated the widow, to herself,—"Louvegne! Is it possible?" The name seemed to bring up sad recollections, for she sighed and looked troubled.

What mad dreams ran through the young girl's brain that night, and which of the two strangers figured most prominently in them? She could scarcely tell herself. She wondered if she should see them again. She wished she knew their parents. They were the first educated people she had ever met, all in the village being rustics.

And did the young men forget their pretty enchantress? Ay, that they did not. They spoke of nothing else all the evening, and dreamed of nothing else all the night.

The next day Beatrice, as usual, took a book, and went into the woods; but she avoided the path, and went into a thicket of fir trees, where she could be entirely hidden from any who should chance to pass down the path. She had not been there many moments, before she heard voices approaching. Presently she could distinguish what was said, and she was a most unwilling auditor to the following conversation:

"Confound it, I don't believe she'll come to-day."

"I did not expect her. I should think it very strange and improper if she did come."

"You blessed innocent, to talk of propriety! Do you suppose such a preciously given little country beauty ever heard of the article? Besides, she is owner of these woods; she has been here so long, and we are only strangers, and compared to her, have no right even to pass through them; so I think the impropriety (if there is one) is all on our part."

"Well, we can see her this afternoon, at any rate."

"This afternoon! You take matters coolly enough. I shall not quit this place till I catch a glimpse of her beautiful face. I shall go down to the school, and wander round there, if I have to lose my dinner. So Master Faintheart, I shall leave you to return and do double justice to the dinner, and a double injustice to your digestive organs. Good-by."

With that he began whistling an opera air. By-and-by he stopped, and cried as loud as he could:

"Wont you look grim, old fellow, when I come home, and tell you that I have seen the charming Beatrice?"

Thus ended this talk, so confusing to the mind of the fair listener.

"Am I indeed beautiful?" she asked herself; but at the next moment she laughed at the thought. "No—no; Mabel is beautiful, and so is Willie; but I am neither beautiful nor interesting, and I'm sure I don't care. I expect to find my pleasure in study and meditation; but yet he called me beautiful and charming. I guess I'll just run and see for myself."

Beatrice was well acquainted with every part of the wood, and she knew that near her arbor there was a pond clear as crystal, which reflected faithfully the trees and sky; and why should it not reflect her face?

She stopped before she reached it, and thought, "How silly I am! and yet I wish to know how he could think me handsome." So trembling between the fear of being disappointed and the hope that what she had heard might prove true, she peeped into the lake; but she was so agitated that she could see nothing this time. So she tried it again, re-assuring herself with the thought that whichever way it might be, it would be of no consequence to her. There she stood, gazing at herself for several moments. "Well," thought she, "I do not know exactly what to decide. I am certainly not plain. I suppose others might call me handsome; but I don't like my style. I prefer Mabel's infinitely. I look too full of earthly passion. I should do very well to sit for a picture of a voluptuous character—like Cleopatra, for instance."

When she raised her eyes, they met those of Edward Louvegne, intently bent upon her. Mortified at having been seen in so awkward a situation, she felt also piqued at being thus closely watched. Her anger and pride quickly got the better of her mortification, and she drew herself up with great dignity, saying:

"I fear, sir, that I shall be obliged to absent myself from these woods altogether, as I perceive they are not free from spies."

Edward started at these words, as if an adder had stung him. Blushing deeply, he replied:

"Miss Mansdell, I beg your pardon a thousand times. I meant no harm. It was only by accident that I came upon you so suddenly. As to the privacy of these woods, you have it by right of possession, and you have only to say the word, and I will never appear in them again—um—that is, if there is any other from the parsonage to the school-house."

Beatrice said:

"It is now my turn to apologize for my hasty words. Any one has as good a right to these woods as I have, and can avail themselves of it at whatsoever time is most convenient to them."

"That is to say, I can walk here to meet you whenever I choose?"

"I am not the one whom you need consult about coming here. As for me, I shall come whenever I feel like it, without thinking of any one."

"And I shall take good care to learn at what time that is."

"By saying that, you oblige me to say that I can never come here at all, for there is another often inconvenient consideration to be thought of besides right; this is propriety."

"Miss Mansdell, you astonish me. I thought one who had been brought up in the woods like yourself, could have no idea that there was such a word in the English vocabulary, much less an appreciation of its value. Who has taught you?"

"I am nature's student. She is the most refined of all instructors, and I would that I had profited more from her teachings. All that I know, I have learned from the trees, the rocks and yonder lake that lies embosomed in soft heather, and crowned with sweetest flowers. The birds have told me much, and the gossiping brooks have let me into many secrets. Even the honey-bee has whispered me sweet counsel, and taught me industry by his example. Nature and I are great friends. All the dear little wild creatures love me, and they are the only living things I care for. The Bible tells me I should love mankind, but I fear I do not follow its teachings. I could never see anything in man half so lovable as in these rocks and trees, or even in the very ground we tread beneath our feet."

"But in order to appreciate man, you should see him in perfection. You have never been beyond the bounds of your own village?"

"Fifteen miles mark the limits of my earliest remembered and longest journey."

"Have you never thought of what might be beyond—of what the great world might contain?"

"I have thought about it, but I was only filled with confusing perplexities."

"Should you not like to go into the world and try it?"

"I do not know. I should almost be afraid to explore its mysteries—so obscure to me now. But here we are at the school, and I must go in."

"I shall see you again soon. Good-by."

"That is to say, you will walk home with me after school, if you can," thought Beatrice.

Nothing was right that afternoon with our heroine. She made mistakes in her mathematical problems, and hesitated and blundered over her other lessons at such a rate that she fell into deep disgrace. The girls whispered to each other, "She is in love." Was Beatrice in love? Not quite. She was thinking of Mr. Louvegne's suggestion that she should try the world; she was wondering whether it were best for her to venture forth, and how it could be done.

That afternoon she turned from the road which led directly to her home, and took a secret path through the woods. This was done in order to avoid the Louvegnes, who, she knew, would be waiting for her at the end of the lane. As soon as she was hidden from sight by the thick foliage, she ran joyously along, her hair streaming behind her. She had never felt so light-hearted before; she knew not the cause of it. Reader, can you divine the cause? It was that her desolate heart had found one which could sympathize with it. No longer was she alone in the world; no longer need she keep pent within her own bosom the glorious thoughts which sometimes, spite of her reserve, almost burst their prison bounds. Now she could talk freely, and feel that she had an appreciating listener. She stopped, hoping to hear the young men coming behind her. Wholly repenting that she had not taken her usual route home, she turned back—yes, she turned back, and retraced her steps. Ah, proud Beatrice, you have yet to learn what love can do!

She reached the open space again whence the road emerged, and looking cautiously around, saw the two youths just turning down the path to the parsonage. They had waited a long time for her, and finally concluding that she had taken another road home, they also turned their faces homeward. Now, when Beatrice saw that she was about to lose their company, her first impulse was to shout to them, her second to run after them; but neither of these could she do, for it would be so ill-bred. Her last iden was by far the best. She turned away her face, and began singing in a clear, rich voice, a wild air. The sound reached the ears for which it was intended, and produced the desired effect. Both returned quickly on seeing that Beatrice was the singer.

She was, of course, all surprise at seeing them; and Edward said something about "the appointed meetings of fate," which caused a brighter glow to overspread her cheek.

A charming walk they had of it—at least, so the Louvignes said, and I think Miss Mansdell might have recoiled their opinion, if she had chosen. She asked them to come in and see her mother; but they refused, saying that they should hardly be able to get home before the storm, which had been gathering for several hours, should burst upon them. "This was certainly a good excuse; for a big, black cloud was rising on the other side of the mountain, and fitful streaks of lightning played over the heavens; at one moment the scene was dark and angry, and at another it was lighted up as by heavenly torches. Then big drops of rain fell to the earth like bullets; but the rain soon ceased, and a fierce hurricane of wind ensued. The wind-king had it all his own way that night, and most tyrannical was his rule. He struck dead the unyielding trees which would not bend at his touch; he wantonly played with the young birches and maples, and just as they were dancing merrily together at the sound of his voice, he whistled round, and they found themselves torn up by the roots, bereft of life. How fiercely he rushed, howling round the widow's cottage, and what mad pranks he played with the chimney and the cow-house! The poor cow moaned so piteously that they were obliged to bring her into the house, and she spent the night in the kitchen. Whether it was that her new quarters were so agreeable to her mind, or that the remembrance of last night's sufferings made her so obstinate, I know not; but she refused the next day to budge an inch out of the kitchen, and Willie was obliged to pull her by the horns with all his strength, while Mabel pushed her forwards.

But to return to that fearful night. The storm raged till past eleven; then it ceased, and the moon peeped out as placidly from the clouds as if nothing extraordinary had taken place, and this was the time for her to appear. She looked in upon Beatrice, cold and motionless, sitting up alone in her room, vainly endeavoring to pierce the darkness without. She was hailed by the young girl as a messenger from heaven. Wrapping a thick shawl round her, Beatrice stole out of the house, so quietly that she did not even rouse the house-dog slumbering on the mat before the door.

She went to the wood-shed and took down the dark lantern from its rusty nail, lighted the lamp, and shutting out the light so that none might see her, she was about to start, when a large stick of wood fell from the top of the pile to the ground directly on an old piece of tin, making a terrible rattling. Bruin was wide awake now, and began to manifest his displeasure with a low growl. Beatrice knew that this would soon end in a loud bark; so she quickly ran to the door, and let him out, calling, "Hush, Bruin! Come with me. I wonder I did not think of you before, poor fellow! You will be of great use."

They then set out, the dog trotting contentedly along by the side of his mistress. When they reached the wood, Beatrice pushed back the screen of the lantern to let out the light, for it was pitch dark. She advanced slowly now, and called softly but distinctly, "Edward—Frederick!" No one answered. "They must have got further than this," she thought. So she walked on till she reached a space of open ground. Here she could see what ravages the storm had committed. Huge trees lay around, displaying their roots in fantastic spectral shapes, that would have frightened any other but the brave Beatrice. It was evident that the lightning had done its part in the general destruction; for in some places the trees were split open, so that their white interior was visible. The thought of what the lightning might have done almost sickened Beatrice; but she could not rest till she knew all. So she courageously went on. What was it that caused her suddenly to stagger back as if she had received a mortal wound? What was it that blanched her cheek so deadly pale, and made her teeth to chatter in her head? Her foot had stumbled against a human body, stretched at full length across the path. Quick as thought, she knelt down to see the face. It was so bruised she could not recognize it. She took the hand that lay so cold and stiff across the breast. No—that was not Edward's hand; this was a great relief, and in the fullness of her heart, she cried aloud, "Thank Heaven, it is not Edward!"

At that moment, she heard a rustling of the bushes behind her. Casting the rays of her lantern in the direction of the noise, she saw Edward, pale and haggard, coming towards her.

"Beatrice, angel of mercy," he said, "you have revived the last faint ray of hope within me. This is my brother. We lost our way, and he was struck by a falling tree; but life is not yet gone. Could he have assistance within two hours, he might live."

Beatrice said not a word, but putting the lantern in Bruin's mouth, she assisted Edward in raising his brother, and they both carried him slowly and gently along the path, Bruin leading the way with the lantern. It was about two o'clock when they reached the cottage. Mrs. Mansdell and Mabel were quickly roused, and soon the suffering youth was on a comfortable bed, surrounded by kind nurses. Beatrice whispered something to her sister, and then darted out of the door with Bruin and the lantern. She was on her way to the doctor's house, which she reached in about an hour, and in half an hour after, she returned with the doctor. He pronounced the bruises severe but not dangerous; but he said if he had been sent for two hours later, he should have been of no use.

After he had dressed the wounds, and made Frederick as comfortable as possible, he looked for Beatrice. Calling her to him, and counting her pulse, he said:

"My child, you are feverish with excitement. You need rest, and if you do not take it, we shall have you for a patient soon."

The idea of being a troublesome invalid quite frightened Beatrice; so she immediately left the room, and went to lie down.

After she had gone, Edward advanced to Mrs. Mansdell, and said: "Madam, your daughter has saved my brother's life. It is a benefit that can never be repaid on earth; but she shall have whatever wealth can purchase. Ask anything for her, and she shall certainly receive it."

"My daughter did for your brother what I should wish her to do for any one. It is a sufficient reward to me that she has done a good deed. She is such a strange child that we do not understand her; but I believe her heart is all right, for all her oddities."

"That it is, madam; and if she is strange, she is truly noble. I will not say to you now what I have on my mind, for this is not the time; but by-and-by I will manifest my gratitude in something more substantial than words."

Mrs. Mansdell changed color at this, and begged he would think no more about it. She did not understand what he meant, and she had too much pride to allow her to think of accepting money as pay for a mere act of humanity, as she called it.

After a long and painful illness, Frederick recovered. He was almost sorry that he was well enough to be taken home, for it was so pleasant to be surrounded by such kind nurses as Mrs. Mansdell and her beautiful daughters. But the time had come when he must leave the cottage and its inmates. They, too, were sorry to part with the gentle invalid, to whom they had become much attached. There was something peculiarly pure and simple about him. Willie told him, one day, that he would look beautiful in the pulpit. He laughingly said he hoped he should, and preach beautifully, too, for he intended to be a minister. There was one gentle heart in the cottage which felt a strange vacancy, after Frederick had left. This belonged to Mabel.

Edward and his brother were now constant visitors at Mrs. Mansdell's. There was certainly sufficient strong attraction at her house to induce any young man to go there frequently. Many a pleasant evening they passed together; in summer, sitting on the rocks, enjoying the evening breezes, which always reached the cottage; in winter, socially chatting round the wood-fire.

Under such favorable circumstances, love is seldom idle. This time he had successfully disposed of two young ladies; for Beatrice was the affianced bride of Edward, and Mabel was engaged to Frederick. The widow had given her consent reluctantly, for she knew not what the wealthy parents of the young men would think of such poor connections for their accomplished sons. But they were so earnest about it that she finally concluded it was wisest to let them "gang their ain gaes," and to trust in Providence for the rest. Their parents were expected home soon, and they must return to the city to meet them; they, of course, spent the evening before their departure at the cottage. Every one was sad and thoughtful that night, and not much conversation was carried on. Edward was thinking what an awkward thing it would be to announce his engagement to his father. Fred, who was his mother's pet, thought only of the pleasure he should have in presenting to her his lovely Mabel. At last the widow broke silence, saying:

"My children, it is now time that you should know something of my history. I was once a wealthy lady, and lived in the most fashionable part of A—. My husband's death was occasioned by the grief which he suffered in losing his whole fortune by one unfortunate speculation. I was left with a mere pittance, barely sufficient to support my family. I soon left the city, feeling deeply my change of fortune, and settled in the most secluded spot I could find, which was this wild place. No one ever knew what had become of me; I kept it a secret because I would not receive assistance either from my relations or friends, and I was afraid of anonymous remittances, as I had already received several. My most intimate friend wished to adopt one of my daughters, as her own children were away at school. But I would not consent to this, for I wished to keep my family together. Beatrice was the one she fancied, and I have since often regretted that I did not accept her kind offer to educate her; but it was all for the best."

"I am glad you never told me this before, mother," said Beatrice, "for I should have been so discontented."

"That is the very reason that I have never spoken of it," said Mrs. Mansdell. "But I have not yet told you the lady's name."

"Her name would signify nothing to us, for we probably never heard of her," said Beatrice.

"I am not so sure of that," answered her mother. "Did you never hear of any name that begins with L and ends with .?"

"None but Louvigne."

"That is it."

"Then it is our mother!" cried Edward; "for I know she lived in A— about that time, and we were away at school. Is not this good news, Beatrice?"

But Beatrice did not answer, and Edward turned away with a troubled face, wondering what new obstacle she would present to their union. Beatrice sorely felt her poor circumstances, and when she contrasted them with Edward's fine prospects, she could not brook the idea of being raised by him to a station that did not belong to her.

"He shall not marry me—a poor girl," she said to herself. "I will not consent till I have gained a support for myself. But how is that to be accomplished! The stage! He always told me I should make a fine actress, and I will try it."

Thus thought Beatrice, but she concluded not to speak of it to her lover till their next meeting.

It was quite late before the Louvignes could tear themselves away from the cottage; but all things in this world must end, and so their last night drew to a close. There is always a certain sadness connected with the last of anything, whether it be the last leaves of autumn, the last look at a departing friend, the last un-publ bill, the last piece of apple pie, or the last scene of the last opera of the season. Reader, does not each of these illustrations recall to you painful recollections?

Mabel was troubled by no anxious thought concerning her departed lover, but slept peacefully as a child. Not so Beatrice. Something was heavy at her heart, for she walked the room all night, like a restless spirit. She thought of her mother having been the friend of Mrs. Louvigne. "So we are equal in birth to the Louvignes, but alas! not in fortune, and that must be of great importance in the world, for mother's unhappiness was caused by the loss of it. So it is very condescending in the Louvignes, I suppose, to marry two poor village girls; and when we move to the great city and live in splendor there, we shall be constantly reminded of the great favor that has been bestowed upon us, by the contrast with our former humble dwelling. No—I cannot marry him. I will tell him so; I will tell him that I seem to be the possessor of wealth and honors to which I am not entitled; I will tell him that I prefer independence, though with a sad and lonely heart, even to his companionship and servitude; for it is nothing less when a poor girl marries a rich man."

"But I will say nothing to Mabel, for I am sure she has had no misgiving since she was engaged, and I will not be the one to destroy her happy delusion; may it last forever. I must part with Edward; it is like depriving myself of life. From this moment I must live in excitement. The stage—the stage!—that is the place for me. Was I not made for that? Indeed I am sure of it. I must say farewell to peace, for where I go it is not to be good. O, my heart longs for excitement! I wish I were on the stage this moment."

Finally exhausted with her own distress, she sank into a feverish sleep. Phantoms chased each other through her wildered brain. At one moment, she was walking through the woods with Edward, then a demon would come and snatch him from her, bearing him away into darkness; at the next, she was on the stage, acting, and her audience was composed entirely of gentlemen, all of whom bore the face and form of Edward; and to whatever side she turned, she must meet the reproachful eyes of her lover. At last she was being stifled, and she started up to see flames all around her, ready to devour her, and then the dreams were all over, and a long, long calm ensued.

"Why, mother, how could you let me sleep so long? How weak I am! Mother, what is the matter with me? I can't sit up."

"You will soon be stronger, my child," answered Mrs. Mansdell; "but you must be very quiet now."

"Mother, have you heard from the Louvignes?"

"Many times. Edward has watched with us constantly."

"Many times! Mother, what are you thinking of? It was only yesterday that they went to town to meet their parents."

"Beatrice, you have forgotten. That happened three months ago."

"But where have I been all this time?"

"Where you are now—ill, very ill, but you must not talk any more now, for the doctor ordered that you should be kept quiet."

It was true, she had been very ill; they had despaired of her life. She was delirious on the night that the Louvignes left, and continued so for a long time, with intervals of quiet unconsciousness. But at length her reason returned, and as we have seen, great was her astonishment at finding herself three months behind the times.

She recovered rapidly after this, and it was not long before she was allowed to sit up and receive visitors. She was delighted with Mrs. Louvigne, who treated her with the greatest consideration. She told her she must get well quickly, for her house was very lonely, and she wanted a daughter. When Edward appeared, Beatrice was shocked at his haggard face.

"You look more fit to be called the invalid, than I do," she said. "Are you not well?"

"How could I be well with such a prospect before me, as I have had, and when I had to reproach myself as being the cause of it all? You do not love me, then, Beatrice?"

"What makes you think so?"

"Because you raved about me so when you were ill. You vowed you never would marry me; you wanted to be an actress, and you—"

"O, please, please stop!" laughed Beatrice. Then she added, gravely: "No—it was my own wicked pride that nearly killed me; but instead of causing my death, it has received its own death-blow."

"You mean by that, you can now condescend to marry a rich man; but what if I should not deign to marry a rich girl?"

"I am not rich."

"Yes you are. A host of your relations have suddenly started up, all as rich as Croesus."

"Edward, what do you mean? I thought we had no relatives."

"And so you might have thought to your dying day, if a certain young gentleman had not happened to meet with a certain young lady, once upon a time, fast asleep under a tree."

"But do tell me, who are my relations?"

"Well, the principal is, or rather was, your father's brother, an old bachelor, who went to India, and there made an immense fortune, which he left to his brother's children, if they could ever be found. My father was well acquainted with him, and they used often to talk of the mysterious disappearance of Mrs. Mansdell."

"He is dead, then?"

"He died several years ago; but you do not seem overpowered with the fact of being such an heiress."

"I was thinking of my poor mother. How much she has needlessly deprived herself of by remaining concealed in these woods."

In less than a year, Beatrice and her sister were married. Frederick was ordained a minister over a flourishing congregation, by whom he was soon almost idolized. Mabel was also held in high esteem. Mrs. Mansdell and Willie made her house their home.

DEER ISLAND HOSPITAL, BOSTON HARBOR.

DEER ISLAND HOSPITAL, BOSTON HARBOR.

The accompanying engravings, remarkable for their accuracy, were made for us by Mr. Hill, during a recent visit to Deer Island. The first view is a general one, and embraces all the buildings, commencing with the House of Industry on the left, continuing with the doctor's house, with the Alms House and Hospital buildings intermingled on the right. We first visited the Hospital, and were struck with the perfect cleanliness and order that reigned throughout the establishment, an air of almost military strictness reigning throughout. Most of the patients were out at the time of our visit, as the physicians cause all who can do so to go out whenever the weather admits. The windows were mostly open, and the sunlight fell on beds that would be a source of envy to many a poor resident of a city boarding house. All the bedsteads are of iron, the beds of straw, covered by two good blankets, white sheet and a check coverlet. The physicians are very attentive, and take a great deal of interest in the patients, who, on their part, appear to have entire confidence in their position, and the attendants. In the female department of the Hospital, of which we give a sketch, was a most engaging and interesting child, that had lost the use of his lower limbs, otherwise perfectly formed and healthy. He is a general favorite, and his intelligent smile and engaging manners touched us more than anything else we saw. Adjoining the Female Hospital, is a large room, devoted to infants and very young children. We give a correct view of this nursery. It is here the foundlings deserted by their unnatural parents are cared for, and provided with suitable nurses, and here they toddle about and enjoy their infantile existence in happy unconsciousness of their position. In the kitchens (likewise models of cleanliness), supper was being prepared. Euormous healthy-looking loaves of bread, and the pleasant aroma arising from overgrown boilers, on which the coffee was cooking, gave proof that there was no lack of substantiality in this department, which, one of the Celtic cooks gave us to understand, they were very proud of. We cut from the official report the following statement of the daily fare of the inmates at the House of Industry, Deer Island:—Breakfast—bread one-third Indian, chocolate, with milk and molasses. Supper—bread and tea. Dinner, Sunday,—baked pork and beans, or corned meat with vegetables; Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, beef soup with vegetables, or rice and molasses; Friday, fresh or salt fish, with vegetables; Saturday, beef soup, with vegetables, or rice and molasses. Mutton or veal broth every day for the sick. Beef juice for the sick as required. One quart of milk is furnished for the nursing women daily. From the kitchen, we stepped into the Work-room, also depicted in another engraving, where the women are employed, making the clothes worn on the island. They were sitting in rows, quietly making up the coarse blue stuff into garments. One or two were reading, and some walking about, and to us there was an appearance of indulgence we did not look for. In the Dining-room, a long, low apartment, the men of the establishment were quietly discussing the meal we had seen prepared in the kitchen. Our drawing is a correct illustration of this interior. They are employed, some in the shoe-shop, and others in various occupations on the farm, in the garden and bakery, and in whatever necessary work they are capable of performing. Apart from the necessary restriction on their personal liberty, they are much better off than their class in the city, and a great deal better employed than in going about begging of people, who, if they refuse assistance, think they have done wrong, and if they give, feel that they are fostering imposters and loafers. Upon the arrival of a patient or candidate for poor-house accommodations, his clothes are exchanged for a suit of the poor-house manufacture, the old one being packed up and put away, numbered, till they are prepared to leave. The next thing is to give them a good bath and a dose of simple medicine, to relieve the system of the stimulants with which they are mostly supposed to be filled. Then after a rest of a day or two, if not confined to the Hospital, they have some employment apportioned them. Almost the only thing needed to make the institution perfect, is newer and more commodious buildings; those now occupied were never intended for their present use, having been originally erected as temporary hospitals for the yellow fever patients. They are capitally ventilated, but in other respects are rude and unsubstantial. Dr. Moriarty, the quarantine physician, is, in every sense of the word, "the right man in the right place." He has that rare quality of command which fits men for those posts where strict discipline must be enforced, and yet a mild rule is preferable. A martinet in sanitary matters and the regulation of the establishment under his care, yet he has the power of making himself beloved even in the enforcement of the strictest orders. Of a generous and benevolent disposition, it is a pity he has not greater means at his command for the improvements necessary, notwithstanding that he keeps each department at the highest point of perfection in his power. The report of the Directors of the Houses of Industry and Reformation for the year 1855-56, states, in regard to the farming operations, that "the product of the farm this year has much exceeded that of the past, and though presenting no tangible result in a pecuniary form, has, nevertheless, been turned to profitable account in the support of the inmates of the institution, and the feeding of the stock of animals. The condition of the island has, also, been much improved, and its productive power increased, by the judicious culture of the soil by the officer in charge; the beneficial results of which may be looked for in future years." The location of the institutions on Deer Island is admirable for quarantine and hospital purposes, for no spot within the vicinity of Boston is more salubrious; and if not quite as accessible as some other sites that might have been selected, still, for the purpose of some of the institutions, its very isolation is a recommendation. There is no question of the fact stated in the official report that the condition of the island is very rapidly improving, and a visit there will satisfy any one of the care and attention bestowed on the patients.

NAVAL HEROISM.

In Cooper's Naval History, we find the following sketches of desperate battles, hand-to-hand affairs, which occurred during the battle of the gun boats, in the war between the United States and Tripoli: "No sooner had Mr. Decatur got possession of the boat first assailed, than he took her in tow, and bore down on the one next to leeward. Running the enemy aboard, as before, he went into him, with most of his officers and men. The captain of the Tripolitan vessel was a large, powerful man, and Mr. Decatur personally charged him with a pike. The weapon, however, was seized by the Turk, wrested from the hands of the assailant, and turned against its owner. The latter parried a thrust, and made a blow with his sword at the pike, with a view to cut off its head. The sword hit the iron, and broke at the hilt, and at the next instant the Turk made another thrust. Nothing was left to the gallant Decatur, but his arm, with which he so far averted the blow, as to receive the pike only through the flesh of his breast. Pushing the iron from the wound, flesh and all, he sprang within the weapon, and grappled his antagonist. The pike fell between the two, and a short trial of strength succeeded, in which the Turk prevailed. As the combatants fell, however, Mr. Decatur so far released himself as to lie side by side with his foe on the deck. The Tripolitan now endeavored to reach his poniard, while his hand was firmly held by that of his enemy. At this critical instant, when life or death depended on a moment well employed, or a moment lost, Mr. Decatur drew a small pistol from the pocket of his vest, passed the arm that was free round the body of the Turk, pointed the muzzle in, and then fired. The ball passed entirely through the body of the Mussulman, and lodged in the clothes of his foe. At the same instant, Mr. Decatur felt the grasp that had almost smothered him relax, and he was liberated. He sprang up, and the Tripolitan lay dead at his feet. In such a melee, it cannot be supposed that the struggle of the two leaders would go unnoticed. An enemy raised his sabre to cleave the skull of Mr. Decatur, while he was occupied by his enemy, and a young man of the Enterprise's crew interposed an arm to save him. The blow was intercepted, but the limb was severed to a bit of skin. A fresh rush was now made upon the enemy, who was overcome without much further resistance. In the meantime Mr. Trippe, in No. 6, the last of the three boats that was able to reach the weather division, was not idle. Reserving his fire, like the others, he delivered it with deadly effect, when closing, and went aboard of his enemy in the smoke. In this instance, the boats also separated by the shock of the collision, leaving Mr. Trippe, with Mr. J. D. Henlay, and nine men only, on board the Tripolitan. Here, too, the commanders singled each other out, and a severe personal combat occurred, while the work of death was going on around them. The Turk was young, and of a large, athletic form, and he soon compelled his slighter but more active foe to fight with caution. Advancing on Mr. Trippe, he would strike a blow, and receive a thrust in return. In this manner, he gave the American commander no less than eight sabre wounds in the head and two in the breast; when making a sudden rush, he struck a ninth blow on the head, which brought Mr. Trippe upon a knee. Rallying all his forces, in a desperate effort, the latter, who still retained the short pike with which he fought, made a thrust that passed the weapon through his gigantic adversary, and tumbled him on his back. As soon as the Tripolitan officer fell, the remainder of his people submitted. The boat taken by Mr. Trippe, was one of the largest belonging to the Bashaw. The number of her men is not positively known, but living and dead, thirty-six were found, of whom twenty-one were either killed or wounded. When it is recollected that but eleven Americans boarded her, the achievement must pass for one of the most gallant on record."

AMERICAN MECHANICS IN ENGLAND.

It is a curious fact that American mechanics excel all others in the manufacture of fire-arms, and are at the present time filling large contracts for parties in England representing the English government. Sharp's arms, particularly, are in high favor, both the carbine and the rifle being in large demand. They are claimed to combine simplicity of construction, rapidity of firing and extraordinary range, with perfect accuracy and unequalled safety. An order for 25,000 American rifles, with the Minnie sight and knob for the "lock bayonet," is in course of execution at the extensive works at Windsor, Vt., and is now probably nearly completed. Another order for 10,000 Sharp's rifles, also on account of parties in England, is in course of fulfilment at Colt's factory in Hartford. In order to avoid any collusion or mistake as to the construction of the arms, English gunners personally inspect and stamp them as completed. Sharp's arms are peculiarly well adapted for cavalry service. The remarkable success which has been gained in this country in the manufacture of fire-arms is further illustrated by the fact that machinery, to the value of $220,000, such as is used in some of the large American establishments in this department of mechanics, has been made at Windsor, Vt., and sent to England, and is now, probably, very nearly in readiness for operation. To insure its excellence, it was particularly directed that it must not only be made by Americans, but must be taken out and set up by Americans, and finally, Americans must be employed to control and superintend its operation. Accordingly, some of our most accomplished artisans are now employed in the English workshops. It was proved that the same arm, made in England, at a cost of $9, was made at the Springfield armory for only a trifle over $3. The success of American mechanics here noticed is a matter of congratulation.—New York Journal of Commerce.

AMBITION.

BY WILLIAM LEIGHTON, JR.

I saw the eagle with undazzled eye
Gaze on the sun, as soaring through the sky
On mighty wing the kingly bird of Jove
To reach that burning beacon proudly strove;
I watched his lofty course, till from my sight
He vanished mid the blazing beams of light;
Still on he soared, though lost to human view,
While naught of fear his lonely bosom knew,
Till in the region of the thiaoor skies
More slowly now the airy monarch flies;
But in those realms through which no clouds may sail,
He sinks at last, and all his efforts fail—
And hurled from heaven upon the flinty rock,
His form lies mangled with the fearful shock.

I saw the lion in his lordly pride
The forest monarch, through its thickets stride—
His majesty of strength is awe revered,
By man admired, by brute creation feared.
But not content his kingly power should span
The lesser brutes, he turns his strength on man;
This vain ambition makes him darkly blind,
He dares to war upon the power of wind—
The lord of earth asserts his birthright here;
The lord of forests falls beneath his spear.
Ambition! thus thy course is ever run,
And like the eagle soaring to the sun,
Or the fierce lion in his brutal strength,
Man vainly strives, and thus he falls at length.

As on the coast, by wreckers' hands supplied,
The burning pile the mariner does guide,
When mid the darkness and the storm he lies,
And o'er the waves with joy the beacon spies;
How bursts the truth in horror on his soul,
When drawing near his brightly blazing goal,
Amid the rocks he sees his vessel cast,
And every hope of life and safety past.
Thus, fatal passion, do you cast your spell,
More deadly far than wreckers' luring light,
O'er the mind's darkness—like a spirit fell
Onward you guide the soul to deeper night.
Ofttimes you choose earth's noblest and her best,
(More pleased to lead a lofty mind astray),
And bid them boldly seek thy doubtful guest;
With tempting bait you lure them on the way,
And pointing upward to the shirring prize,
Bid their lost souls all obstacles despise.

CLEMENTINA THE ACTRESS.

BY WILLIAM D. OLIVER.

"FAREWELL, dearest Florence!" I exclaimed, passionately, as I pressed the lips of the being who alone of all the world was beloved by my youthful heart. "If I live and prosper, and can do aught that will exalt me in your thoughts, or bid me nearer to your love, I will return; if not, then farewell!"

She could not answer me; but as I turned to give her a parting look, I saw that in her eloquent eye, which told a deeper tale than a thousand words could have done. Sweet Florence! At this distance of time, I see it still! Again do I feel thy warm tears trickling over my hand, and see the speaking glance that entreated me to forbear those cruel words, "forever!"

I was twenty-one years old when this parting scene occurred. Florence was but sixteen. She was a very child in simplicity, in singleness of purpose, in straightforward, almost blunt truthfulness—but in strength of mind, in maturity of judgment, in real dignity, she was a woman.

The mother of Florence Hope had been dead two years; but even at the early age of fourteen, Florence had assumed the cares and responsibilities of a housekeeper to her father, and of a mother to the two younger children. Charlotte Hope was a wild, gay, wayward child, whom no one but Florence could manage. Louis was a fine, manly boy, eager to aid and assist his sister by everything in his power, and making everything smooth and light with his father, when he returned weary and listless from his counting-house duties. At his mother's death he was but ten years old, and Charlotte twelve. All the children were more than usually mature; and perhaps this may be accounted for by the fact that their mother's long illness, and their father's strenuous devotion to business details, had laid upon them a more than ordinary share of care, at a season when children are usually unmindful of anything but pleasure. Charlotte managed to get along with less than her share, which, of course, only imposed upon Florence a little more than her own. When the time of my departure arrived, Charlotte was of course fourteen, and Louis twelve. I had been acquainted with the family from a child, and knew their whole life intimately.

I parted from Charlotte Hope as one parts from a gay, happy child, unconscious of any influence that she could ever have over my fortunes or life. On her part, she declared it would be her happiest day when I was gone—poor, dear Florence could have some rest when that teasing Aubrey St. John had once sailed for South America. She hoped his uncle would find business enough to employ him just nineteen years. He might come back in welcome the day he was forty—then she and Florence (she first!) would both be married to the most splendid men, to whom Aubrey St. John could not hold a candle—not he, indeed!

I had heard the silly little one talk away in this manner before, when it had only excited my laughter. This night my spirits were attuned to another key, and I had an indefinite sense of a real distress. She saw that it annoyed me, and kept on. I grew almost wicked towards her; but she suddenly changed her tone, and I saw tears come into her eyes. She did not know that I saw them, and presently she regained her usual lively, happy humor; and when I came out of the gate with Florence on my arm, for a last ramble in the woods at twilight, Charlotte was challenging Louis to get the little wherry out of the boat-house, and take her out on the pond to have a moonlight sail home.

The next day saw me on board ship, and sailing for South America, where Mr. Phillips, my mother's brother, had offered me a situation as confidential clerk in his mercantile house at Lima. I bore in my heart the image of Florence Hope; and near my heart I wore her pictured resemblance, painted by one of the first artists in the city. It was my study and my recreation during our tedious voyage. It never left me night nor day; and often in the deep watches of the night I lay gazing, by the faint starlight shining into my small window, upon the features that were so graven upon my soul, that I fancied I was looking at them by that pale light, when I was only remembering how they had looked by the more generous light of day. Sweet Florence! not even yet are those sweet lips faded upon the ivory, while thine!—but let me not anticipate.

For months—nay, even for two years—Florence and myself corresponded constantly. Not a mail went to America that did not bear from me the impassioned words that only lovers dare to use. Not one arrived in Lima that did not bring me the gentle love of Florence, embalmed in touching language—the accents of a sentiment unfeigned by her for any human being save myself.

I had become acquainted with a set of young men in Lima, whose habits were social, and whose inclinations led them frequently to parties, and very often to the theatre. I was always urged to go with them; but feeling that it would separate me in some way from the idea of Florence, I refused always, and up to the fifth year of my stay, I had never once visited any place of public resort.

After that—whether that, as I grew older my sensibilities grew blunter, I did not stop to analyze—I began to take pleasure in going, and frequently staid out until a late hour at night. The gentle monitor that lay so near my heart would sometimes reproach me with its mild eyes, when I looked at it after returning home; but I was again and again entreated to go, and I as often consented, until at length, no night saw me anywhere except at a party or play. I was handsome then—reader, forgive the vanity which says it! You should see me now, and you would pardon the brief reference to that which comes back no more to human faces! I was handsome then—and no one marks a handsome man sooner than the loving and spirited women of Lima.

Released wholly from business after the noontide hour, I had leisure, after the invariable siesta, to ride, drive or walk with them. Horses, which in some countries would be of immense value, were here offered me to ride as a favor to the owner—often the owner being the lady who accompanied me. On one of these, richly caparisoned—for taste in Lima is gorgeous enough—I would spend hours by the side of some fair rider, equipped still more gaily, until night came down upon the orange groves, and I would almost forget Florence in the charm of the radiant being beside me, until the rare splendor of the Southern Cross would perhaps waken me to the remembrance that she might be walking alone by the cold, pale moonlight of our Northern home.

Then I would part from my charming companion at the door of her father's villa, and resolve never to wrong my own Florence again, by spending my hours with these beautiful girls;—never again to be through the long twilight on the piazza, listening to their guitars or the witching melody of the songs which came from their lips in those thrilling Spanish words;—never again to admire the magnificent long black hair which they spend so much time in combing and arranging, nor the eyes that flash so gloriously upon our sight. No! henceforth Juliana D'Estrees nor Dolores de Montane should never again compete in my heart with the image of sweet Florence Hope. And as I uttered these words, I pressed the dear resemblance to my lips, wondering how I could ever have been drawn from her for a moment.

Strangely enough, I was forced year after year against my will to stay in South America. I longed to go home; to feel at rest once more; to build my cage for the sweet bird that I knew would fly to it with me—but Mr. Phillips ever interposed with his eternal—"Stay another year, Aubrey, and I will give you the business of the house at New York, and then your fortune is made forever."

I was sick at heart, and I felt that Florence was wearing away her young life for me. Sometimes I grew desperate, and said to myself, I would bear it no longer. I had now been at Lima a little more than nine years, and was consequently past thirty. I started one day, while looking at the miniature, to think that Florence herself was past twenty-five. "Does she look like this now?" I found myself asking—and I could only question; but lover-like, I did not fear the answer.

I had been terribly dull and distract for some weeks, for my young companions had mentally consigned me to oblivion, because I would no longer join them in their favorite diversions. I was reading Don Quixote—caring as little for it as one would for a spelling-book—when young Jose de Lopez came in and challenged me for a walk.

Jose de Lopez was a much younger man than myself, but he was altogether a noble little fellow, and I liked him much. He was more generous and yielding in his conduct towards our countrymen, than any man I had known in Lima—very courteous in his manners, without that appearance of condescension which sometimes marks their intercourse with foreigners. After we got out, he begged me to go to the theatre. I demurred at first, but the boy—for he was scarce more than that—was so earnest, that I could not refuse him. I went. On our way he told me that a new star had appeared, who was winning great applause. She was very handsome and talented, and a spirited performer. He added that she went by the name of Signora Clementina—believed she was an Italian; he had not seen her, but Benito had, and pronounced her superb. "Benito" was his eldest brother, and his criterion.

This was all fastian to me, for, after five years' abstinence from theatrical performances, I felt that I could not get up much enthusiasm for my actress, however distinguished. I went merely to oblige my friend, and endorse, if I could, his brother's statement. She was deep in the first act of a fiery Spanish romanza when we entered. She was large, finely developed, with all the good points of a "taking" actress—commanding figure, voice, action and countenance, and with a singular empressment in her manner at every love passage that occurred in her part, as though it came home to her very soul. I looked once or twice at my friend. He was enjoying it as only very young play-goers ever do—eyes and ears were all fully occupied. I smiled at the enthusiasm I could not imitate—and yet there was something, I could not divine what, that singularly interested me in "La Clementina."

She brought home to my thoughts some person (I could not imagine whom), that I had known. The contour of her head and face—so superb in its repose, so bewildering in motion—all impressed me as something I had seen before. I watched her through the whole play—through the afterpiece, in which she only sang—and what singing! In that crowded, suffocating theatre, you might have heard the faintest flutter of a humming-bird's wing, so deep was the silence, so breathless the hush; and there—cool, quiet, unimpassioned, looking as if she was surrounded by icebergs, instead of excited, passionate Spaniards, men and women who delight only in deeply-laid and highly-wrought scenes—Clementina sang! She came forward in the same cool way, after being called for several times, bowed gracefully, placed her hand upon her heart, and in a moment was almost buried beneath the rich flowers that literally covered the stage.

Fool that I was!—in imitation of my younger and richer friend, I loaded the eud of my rich bouquet with golden coins, and threw it, as I intended, directly at her feet. Those magnificent eyes of hers saw everything, knew every hand that thus sacrificed to her, and she marked my gift also. There was a shutting down quickly of the large white lids, and then a sudden flash, as if they knew a secret, and could keep it, too; and amidst the deafening applause, the loudly expressed resolves of the young men to harness themselves to her carriage, she disappeared. The disgraceful spectacle was not enacted—thanks to her good sense, and the commands of those in present authority at the theatre—otherwise, the youth of Lima would have inevitably made donkeys of themselves.

I sat in a stupor. The very roof seemed falling to crush me. In vain de Lopez and his brother tried to rouse me from my stunned state. I had seen Clementina's last parting glance at the audience. It had lingered latest upon my face, and—how could I think or believe it!—it shone from the eyes of Charlotte Hope! I was blind not to see it before. That haunting, mocking likeness to some one, that had baffled me so curiously all the evening! Should I recognize her, or wait until I could see her elsewhere?

I would not see her here—that was decided. I would not swell the crowd of fools that were ready to throw themselves beneath the carriage wheels of a new actress, and as ready to trample her in the dust when her short-lived popularity was over. I would wait. If it was indeed Charlotte Hope, she would see me somewhere; and my cool Northern blood came to my aid, and said, "whenever and wherever it suits her."

I was at the very head of our mercantile house now, for Mr. Phillips, old, sick and weary of business, had retired. I was, therefore, a rich and independent merchant—a merchant prince. I had been endeavoring to arrange matters so that I could take advantage of my new position to go home. Home! yes, where Florence was would ever be home to me. My object was to make as brief stay there as possible consistent with the arrangements of the marriage.

Our correspondence had not latterly progressed with the spirit with which it commenced. Something in the letters of Florence had struck me as sad and strange. It was my long absence I had thought; and I had tried to re-assure her in mine, and to soothe her anxious fears. I had written her of my new position, and that I would see her as soon as possible. Dear girl! I longed to look upon that sweet face again!

The next forenoon a handsome page brought me a note. It was gilded and perfumed with one of those rare scents that the Spanish ladies delight in. To this day, that odor sends me back to my couch faint, sick and quivering like a frightened girl. The note desired me to come to her at the Colombian, and following the page into her presence, I stood face to face with the actress of the previous night. She was a thousand times more self-possessed than I was. She took my hand, and began to talk volubly about the events of the last night; spoke of my costly gift, and of South American audiences, and such chit chat—while I was dying for news from Florence. When at length I questioned her, she answered that she had not seen her for a year!

"To tell you the plain truth, Aubrey," she said, "I do not much relish our plain, prosy old home. Do not look so shocked—it is not even what you left it. Louis is gone, and Florence—I wish you could see her! I saw a procession of nuns yesterday in the convent garden just below this window, and in one I traced a resemblance to poor dear Florence—so thin were her features, so sharp her nose and lips. Ah, you were a sad fellow, Aubrey, to let Florence fall into the sere and yellow leaf!"

I involuntarily drew the miniature from my bosom, and touched the spring. She leaned over to see it.

"Do you suppose that Florence looks like that now, Aubrey?"

"I do not suppose that the sweet expression of Florence has altered more than the lively one of her sister. Charlotte seems to retain her youthful look."

She made a mocking curtsy. The interview was growing painful to me. I could elicit nothing respecting Florence, except the badinage about her looks; and I did not relish that from the handsome and graceful—nay, the dashing and brilliant creature before me, whom I knew to be only two years the junior of Florence.

"Come again," she said, as I took up my gloves to go.

I almost decided not to go again, so painful was it to see her. I had not learned what she had been doing for the last year, but concluded that she had been studying her profession away from home. And my Florence was the sister of an actress! Hatful idea! And if I married Florence, and brought her hither, all Lima would know the fact.

I found myself strangely drawn towards the theatre on the nights when La Clementina was going to appear. I hid myself as much as possible from her view, but she knew well enough when I was there, and I could not resist the fascination of her presence and her acting.

Again I visited her—visited her after the play was over in her luxurious, nay, princely rooms. Benito de Lopez was there, too. The youth of Lima were chained—enslaved by the new actress. She turned from all to me, making me conspicuous in spite of myself. It was a distinction that wore two aspects, and one I did not like.

One day she told me that Florence was married. She had seen it, she said, in an American paper—which, however, she could not produce. There might be some color to this, for three mails had brought me no single line from Florence. Charlotte's preference of me became so marked, as to leave me the only alternatives of leaving her entirely or marrying her. The former she would not listen to for a moment; the latter she half suggested. I was grieved on the thought of being given up so coolly by her sister; and perhaps by the attentions of Benito de Lopez to herself. I had resolved that he, at least, should not come between me and this radiant creature.

We were married, in short, publicly in the Church of San Juan, and all Lima was ringing with the news. As I opened my vest for air on the noon of the marriage day—for, truth to tell, I was half frantic with the stupendous falsehood I had committed towards my early love—the miniature, once so cherished, fell out, and the half-unfolded spring invited another look. In those clear, truthful eyes, lighted by the very radiance of that beautiful faith which she had placed in me at the time when it was painted, I read my punishment. At that moment it came upon me, like the light of heaven, that Florence Hope was still true to me!

The glitter and gorgeness of a wedding in Lima blinded me for a few days—nay, there were weeks in which revelry and show disputed my attention with the grief that was actually lying deep in my heart. My beautiful bride reproached me for my dulness; and once or twice laughingly remarked that she had better have taken de Lopez. The first time she said this, I was fierce and angry; but as she continued to annoy me with it, I grew provokingly cool and self-possessed. Once I agreed with her, that it was a pity she had not. She gave me the look of a beautiful tigress, but was soon subdued by the overmastering passion which she saw in my face, and which, in habitually mild persons like myself, is sometimes terrible.

We were constantly enacting these scenes; for, after the first glare and glitter of her beauty had ceased to interest me, she had not the intellect nor the soul to preserve my love. Her literature was merely that of the green-room and the stage. She could put on tragedy airs, and mouth her passionate speeches, learned by rote, and rehearsed for my benefit when she chose to get up a domestic romance. And it was for this false, heartless woman that I had bargained away the pure, and truthful, and patient affection of Florence Hope! O, wise Aubrey St. John! the verdancy of your youth was as nothing beside the deeper green of your advancing years!

Once, in a singularly soft mood, my tigress told me that she had loved me dearly when I left America; that she envied Florence even then; that she had often invented hints of my probable unfaithfulness, although she had not ventured upon an actual falsehood, in the rebuking consciousness of her sister's truthfulness. She demanded that I should give up wearing the miniature, but this I resisted. I told her that I needed the image of a saint upon my person, to protect me from the demon who was ever by my side. She actually laughed at the conceit, forgiving the application to herself, for the sake of the wit she believed to have found in it.

To get rid of time, I passed most of my days now in my counting-house. Our quarrels seemed to have all the more zest when we only saw each other at intervals. Meantime she was drawing attention to herself, by joining the numerous riding parties which are so frequent in Lima, and that, too, under the escort of Benito de Lopez. My friend Jose still remained true to me and my interests.

She had thus disposed of her time one day, while Lopez and myself were seated together in our usual corner, when a young man entered the counting-room, approached me and called me by name. It was not strange that I did not recognize him, for when I left America Louis Hope was a boy—and I was little prepared to see the fine, handsome and noble-looking man who now pressed my hand. It was with a joyful sadness that I welcomed him—and long before the party passed the windows on their return, he had told me every incident of Charlotte's wild career. I was dying to ask him of Florence, but I felt myself unworthy. He told me at length, that she, too, had been deceived some months before by Charlotte's written statement of my marriage with a Spanish lady, and, in consequence, had discontinued writing to me. Louis did not seem to blame me as I blamed myself.

"She has none as all unhappy," he said, mournfully. "My poor father is in a sad way, requiring all my sister's affectionate care to preserve his life. His peace has long since left him."

"Do you wish to see Charlotte?" I asked him.

"By no means. I came hither expressly to learn the right statement of what we had heard, and to enlighten you, if need be—and also to tell you of the lofty faith and noble reliance which Florence still holds in your love." I groaned aloud.

I found a pleasant home for Louis, begging him to stay with me awhile, unknown to Charlotte, and to watch our domestic happiness!—of which he saw, by my management, several rare specimens. One star only gleamed upon my pathway of ruined hopes. It was the birth of my little Isabella. I did not call her ours, for Charlotte had no maternal principle nor feeling; and I hastily carried out her wish that the child should be sent away to nurse. For once there was unity of purpose between us; for she was determined not to be sacrificed, as she called it, and I was equally determined that my child's temper should not be poisoned at the source of life. I visited it daily; she once a month, perhaps, to load its little neck and wrists with jewels, but never to caress it.

Louis remained several months. She passed and re-passed him in her rides, but his broad hat concealed his face. He predicted, and I believed, that she would some time lose her life in one of her reckless and daring feats of horsemanship; but not so. It was evident, however, that she had some disease preying upon her. Her cough and hectic were frightful. I pitied her, even when the cough was brought on by her excitement in talking to me.

"Charlotte's troubled spirit is at rest," said Louis to me one evening as I entered the house. Latterly he had made himself known to her, and had never left her in his absence. As I had come up the garden walk, she had been seized more suddenly than usual, although she had been uncommonly passive and quiet through the day; and when he drew me to the room, she lay covered with blood from a ruptured blood-vessel. She had died, and made no sign.

To say that I lamented Charlotte's death would be affectation, as well as falsehood. But death brings its solemn accessories, happen where it will; and the funeral of Clementina the actress was remembered long by the people of Lima, as well as that of the wife of the rich merchant, St. John.

Sick at heart, and shattered deeply in health by the events of the last year, I arranged my business, and with Louis, little Isabella and her nurse, and two other trusty servants, we set sail for the rocky cliffs of America. The voyage restored my health, but not my spirits; and even with the sweet presence of my beautiful child, whose looks recalled, not Charlotte's, but those of Florence, I could not raise myself to the desired tone. We arrived in June; and even the orange and myrtle groves we had left, seemed fainter in perfume than the roses of our dear native land. It was just the reception for my glorious Isabella, herself the sweetest flower of all.

I pass over the landing—impatient now as then to come to the meeting with Florence. She was at the door, down the long gravel walk, outside the little gate, and pressed in the arms of Louis and myself, before we had time to think of the reception she would give me after all that had passed.

And why not? Was she not my own Florence?— betrothed to me in childhood, and only separated from me by falsehood and wrong, and not by any real fault of either? And would not little Isabella always believe that she was her own dear mother? And to this day little Hope St. John—for so we baptized our first born—does not dream that Isabella is not her own dear, beautiful sister.

Months of anxiety had faded the roses on the cheek of Florence, and paled the light in those sweet eyes; but they are not less dear to me than when at midnight's starry hours I tried to trace their serene depths, as I lay in the little cabin of the good ship Susquehanna.

PARIS BY NIGHT.

"The day for work, and the night for pleasure," is the motto and practice of the Parisians. During working hours but a few people are to be seen on the promenades, and in the public gardens, except strangers and visitors; the coffee rooms are vacant, and the large number of chairs and small tables with which they abound are piled up on the sidewalks in front, and the waiters are lounging listlessly around. But as evening approaches, the busy scene begins, and by 9 o'clock in the evening, Paris seems a perfect beehive. All the public houses are crowded, the coffee rooms and the sidewalks of whole streets occupied by persons taking their coffee and their roll. And this bustle is kept up until midnight, when all the omnibuses in the city cease to run; by half an hour after midnight the city becomes quiet, and for three or four hours the stillness is only broken by the occasional sound of carriage wheels. If persons are wandering out after this time, they are obliged to give a satisfactory account of themselves to the police, who are always on the alert. Notwithstanding all the vice and wickedness which is to be found here, as in all other large cities, the police arrangements are admirable, and life and property are safe.—Christian Witness.

A GOOD WIFE.

In the eighty-fourth year of his age, Dr. Calvin Chapin wrote of his wife:—"My domestic enjoyments have been, perhaps, as near perfection as the human condition permits. She made my home the pleasantest spot to me on earth. And now that she is gone, my worldly loss is perfect." How many a poor fellow would be saved from suicide, from the penitentiary and the gallows every year, had he been blessed with such a wife. "She made my home the pleasantest spot to me on earth." What a grand tribute to that woman's love, and piety, and common sense! Rather different was the testimony of an old man a few years ago, just before he was hung in the Tombs' yard, in New York. "I didn't intend to kill my wife, but she was a very aggravating woman." Let each wife inquire, "Which am I?"—Hull's Journal of Health.

CHEERFULNESS.

There are some persons who are constantly making themselves unhappy, and without reason. They see nothing but the dark side of life, and close their eyes and their hearts to the bright. They get up in the morning out of humor, not only with themselves, but with all mankind; and wherever they appear, or in whatever circle they have power and influence, they chill, discourage and repulse. They permit themselves to indulge in idle jealousies, foolish fears, and vague apprehensions, and even if prosperous for the present, they predict some sad calamity in the future, and thus prove themselves morbidly misinformed, and, in fact, inseparable to the blessings of Providence. The effect is not only to distress themselves, but to annoy and disquiet others. They are in the moral world, what a passing cloud is in the physical. They cast a gloom over everything for the moment, and serve to drive away the sunny influences which are so admirably calculated to brighten the pathway of life. In what happy contrast is the cheerful spirit—the individual whose heart is full of kindness and generosity, who is ever ready to say a good word, or to do a benevolent act, and whose daily life may be likened to a constant beam of sunshine! He may be disturbed and depressed for the moment, but it will only be for the moment. A shadow may pass over his brow, and silence may seal his lips, but his natural buoyancy will soon acquire the ascendant, and his joyous laugh and cheerful smile will soon be heard and seen again. If he cannot say anything kindly or complimentary, he has the good sense and manly feeling to keep his peace. If he cannot praise, he will not blame. Scandal has no charms for him, and malignity is utterly foreign to his disposition. He constantly tries to gladden and encourage, to cheer the desponding and unfortunate, to assist and relieve to the extent of his ability. The head of a household, or the master-spirit of an extensive establishment, possesses, to a considerable extent, the means of making or marring the comfort and happiness of all who look up to, depend upon, or feel the exercise of his influence. Imagine a peevish, fretful and dissatisfied individual under these circumstances! This appearance creates a shudder, for he is certain to say something harsh, cold, or unkind, and thus to irritate feelings, trample upon sensibilities, or stimulate prejudices and passions. He is miserable himself, and, according to the old adage, misery loves company. He moves about like a troubled spirit, and instead of a smile, a cheering word and an encouraging look, a frown, a rebuke or a grumble are certain to characterize his progress. How much better the gentler, the milder, the more generous policy! How beautiful are cheerfulness, benevolence and appreciation under these circumstances! In the one case, the heart shrinks back, the feelings revolt, and the sympathies turn away; while in the other, the cheek glows with pleasure, the fountains of emotion are filled to overflowing, and a cordial welcome and an involuntary blessing are sure to attend, like invisible angels, the coming and the presence of the cheerful, the kind-hearted, the appreciating and the good.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

HOUSE OF MICHAEL ANGELO.

The house where Michael Angelo resided is still occupied by one of the descendants of the great artist, and opened once a week to visitors. The arrangement of the rooms, the furniture and ornaments, and everything, remains much the same as it was three hundred years ago. The visitor is conducted to the cabinet, and is shown the table upon which he did his correspondence, and the inkstand and writing implements which he used. He is led to the little oratory, with its crucifix and picture of the virgin, where the poet-painter prayed. He sees his sword and cane, vessels in which he kept his paints, bottles for oil, and many other valued memorials. Each appointment and ornament is such as might be designed or ordered by an artist of perfect skill and taste. Everything is upon a scale of liberality and elegance. Rich and quaint oak carvings, marble and gilded ornaments are displayed in the different apartments. The walls and ceiling of the principal room are decorated with about twenty large pictures in panels, painted by the hands of his pupils and brother artists. One of the rooms is filled with portraits of different members of the Buonarroti family.—Florence Correspondent of the Providence Journal.

BEARDS.

During hundreds of years it was the custom in England to wear beards. It became, in course of time, one of our insularities to shave close, whereas in almost all the other countries of Europe more or less of moustache and beard was habitually worn. It came to be established in this speck of an island, as an insularity from which there was no appeal, that an Englishman, whether he liked it or not, must bow, back and rasp his chin and upper lip daily. The inconvenience of this inflexible rest of British respectability was so widely felt, that fortunes were made by razors, razor straps, bones, pastes, shaving soaps, emollients for the soothing of the tortured skin, all sorts of contrivances to lessen the misery of the shaving process, and diminish the amount of time it occupied. This particular insularity even went miles further on the broad highway of nonsense than other insularities; for it not only tabooed unshorn civilians, but claimed for one particular and very limited military class the sole right to dispense with razors as to their upper lips.—Household Words.

ALBERT W. LADD.

ALBERT W. LADD.

Herewith we present our readers with an excellent likeness of Mr. Albert W. Ladd, of the firm of Albert W. Ladd & Co., pianoforte manufacturers of this city. The circumstance of a piano from his house having received a first class medal at the great Paris exhibition, as the best square pianoforte exhibited, and the recent admission of Mr. Ladd as a brother member of the Grand Imperial Society of Piano Makers of Paris, adding an honorably won European to an honorably won American reputation, has naturally stimulated public curiosity, and all classes are anxious to learn something respecting the Boston mechanic who has risen to such eminence. To gratify this very laudable curiosity, and also to hold up to the young and struggling an honorable example of tireless industry and energy finally attaining the meed of success, we have thrown together the principal incidents in his career. Albert W. Ladd was born at London, N. H., April 2, 1816, and is consequently but forty years of age. His father, Gideon Ladd, was an industrious and ingenious mechanic, but with no worldly fortune to bestow on his sons. He gave them, however, a good moral training and the best education his circumstances would afford. At the age of seventeen the subject of our sketch left home for the purpose of learning a trade with a relative in Raymond, about thirty miles distant. The journey was performed on foot, the young adventurer starting with all his worldly goods in a pack at his back, as many a successful adventurer of the old Granite State has done before him. He reached his new home by night-fall, and was greeted with a warm welcome. The assiduity and intelligence he manifested led to happy auguries for his future success. At the age of twenty he commenced business for himself in a neighboring town. But feeling the necessity of a more thorough education than he possessed, he determined to pursue a course of study at Gilmanton Academy, then and now an institution of high repute. No student makes more rapid progress than the mature man, who has had some experience of the world, who knows what branches are required by his position, and who voluntarily devotes himself to mental culture. The spur of necessity stimulates his energies to the utmost. This was the case with Mr. Ladd, and after completing the course of studies he had marked out for himself, he felt emboldened to seek a broader and higher field for the exercise of his abilities. Accordingly in the autumn of 1838 he came to this city, and immediately looked about for employment suited to his capacity and his ambition. The pianoforte business then being in its infancy, he determined to embark in it, and found no difficulty in obtaining employment in one of the oldest and most respectable establishments, in which he had a fair opportunity of manifesting his ability. His talent was recognized and appreciated, and in a short time he was entrusted with the more responsible and delicate departments of the business. He designed and wrought out many improvements in pianofortes, which were received with general favor. He was offered a partnership in the firm that employed him, but an honorable ambition urged him to achieve a reputation under his own name, and he boldly resolved to risk his all in founding a new house and raising it to distinction. Just ten years (in 1848) after he arrived in Boston, he commenced his enterprise with the limited capital furnished by the savings of years of honorable toil. But his genius, industry and manual dexterity supplied the want of funds. Having effected an arrangement with Chief Justice Shaw, by which a large and noble granite building on Washington Street was erected for his manufactory and sales-room, under the superintendence of Jonathan Preston, Esq., the architect, Mr. Ladd went to work with resolute will. His talent and perseverance were crowned with success, and his business has increased so rapidly that successive enlargements and additions to his premises have been necessary, until his establishment is now one of the largest in the great metropolis of New England. Besides this establishment, which is one of the most attractive architectural ornaments of Washington Street, Ladd & Co. have three other manufactories, in which different parts of their instruments are prepared, for the reception of the finer work and finish of the central house. Mr. Ladd is fortunate in his partner—Mr. W. K. Batchelder, a gentleman of varied accomplishments, agreeable manners and great energy. Mr. B. has travelled extensively in Europe, and profited by his intelligent observation of the mechanic arts in the old world. He had been connected with the establishment since 1853, and was admitted partner January, 1856. It will be thus seen that the subject of our sketch occupies a high vantage ground, and at a period of life which promises a long career of usefulness, commands every element of success in his business. We accordingly find that the instruments which he produces are eagerly sought after, not only in New England but in the South and West. For power, purity and beauty of tone the pianos that bear his name are unsurpassed, while as specimens of scientific combination and mechanical skill they are unsurpassed. No imperfect instrument ever leaves the establishment—none that do not completely satisfy the fastidious requirements of the cultivated eye and ear of Mr. Ladd. We were acquainted with the merit of his work long before the jury of the exhibition at Paris, the fountain head of fashion and taste, had stamped it with their approving fiat. The house of A. W. Ladd & Co. was the only Boston one to which a prize medal was awarded for excellence at the New York World's Fair in 1853. This notice would be incomplete, were we not to allude to the fact that Ladd & Co. have commenced the manufacture of grand pianos, until very recently, with the exception of a single Boston house, a speciality of the London and Paris makers. We had the pleasure of examining the first of grand pianos manufactured by A. W. Ladd & Co., and were delighted with the absolute perfection of the instrument. It was remarkable for the ease and elasticity of the action and touch—points of the most difficult achievement. Among the numerous improvements made by Messrs. Ladd & Co., in their instruments, is the perfection of their grand diagonal scale, which is constructed on an entirely new principle, the base strings being elevated above the others, and running diagonally over the sounding-board, the length of string increasing the volume and purity of tone, thus giving to the smaller instruments the peculiar qualities of the grand piano. We record the success of Mr. Ladd and his house with great pleasure, for it is a success honorably achieved, and based upon individual ability and energy, coupled with integrity and honorable dealing. A fortune and a fame acquired by such means command universal respect and esteem.

GLADIATORIAL TABLE.

The accompanying engraving represents a very ingenious and novel piece of furniture, in which a fine work of sculpture in the antique style is made to serve the purpose of a table. It was designed by Mr. J. Fletcher. The "full-orbed shield" of the kneeling gladiator forms the table. The figure is perfectly well poised and balanced, and the stand upon which it rests is furnished with castors. The introduction of sculpture in various forms into our drawing-rooms is a revival of the ancient classic taste, and the extent to which it is carried evinces a very general culture. Beautifully carved book-cases and buffets are now very common in our fashionable houses. Not many years since all such articles were imported from abroad, but now, in all our great cities there are manufacturers of these articles, and our American forests furnish an inexhaustible supply of material for them.

WEBSTER'S MANSION AT MARSHFIELD.

We present below an interesting and accurate view of the house and a portion of the estate of the late Daniel Webster, at Marshfield, Mass. Here he indulged to the full those agricultural tastes for which he was so noted, bringing his teeming acres up to that point of culture which stamped him emphatically as a model farmer. Mr. Webster, while yet a young man, craved a great predilection for the town of Marshfield, and years before he possessed any property there was in the habit of spending a portion of every summer there, enjoying those invigorating field sports to which he was so much attached. The retirement of the place, the abundance of game in the marshes, and fish in the waters, and the salubrity of the climate, induced him finally to pitch his tent there. Some of the happiest moments of his life were passed on his Marshfield farm, and there he finally received the summons of the death-angel.

KILBUCK'S LAST PRAYER.

BY JAMES J. SWEENEY.

'Twas night, for evening's solemn shades had closed
Within the vale where Kilbuck's band reposed;
A weary chase they held the live-long day,
From early dawn till Sol's departing ray
Had faded in the gloom of cheerless night,
Nor left a single ray of heaven-born light
To guide man's trembling steps from danger free,
Or joy, or fall tell of life's eternity.
Exhausted had the wearied Indian brave
Sank to his rest, lulled by the restless wave,
Which in the pale moonlight with glittering crest
Shone o'er the Alleghany's placid breast.
But mid the wearied throng of Kilbuck's band
Was one on whom fate laid a heavy band,
Had poisoned every spring within his heart,
And ever pricked him with a vengeful dart,
Which pierced his trembling flesh with envious pain,
And gave each action of his life its hue;
No longer could he bear the weight of woe,
Which in a flooded stream ne'er ceased to flow;
Worn out at length by trouble, toil and care,
He looked to Heaven for aid, and thus his prayer:

"Great Manitou, thy servant bear,
And to his prayer lend gracious ear.
'Tis now fourscore of springs and more
Since first I heard the cascade roar,
The song of birds, the sighing breeze,
The rustling branches of the trees,
Beheld the sun with glorious light
Dispel the paling shades of night,
Or saw the stars begin the skies;
Or Luna from her day-couch rise;
Since then much trouble have I known;
I have through youth to dotage grown.
For eighty years I've sniffed perfume,
In spring-time when the bright flowers bloom,
Have felt the winter's fiercest cold,
Have borne me in the battle bold,
Struck down my foe as warriors do,
Who ever have their God in view;
I've listened to the warrior's tale,
Have musing trod the silent vale,
Have looked from nature up to God,
And loved the ground on which I trod,
And never in these woods among Gave countenance to dastard wrong.
And yet borne down with weight of years,
My bosom racked with childish fears,
My palsied hands with powerless grasp
Can scarce the bow and arrow clasp—
Which gains amid this solitude
The warrior's fame and daily food.
O Manitou, thy servant hear,
And list his prayer with gracious ear."

So singing, sat the warrior down awhile,
And gracious Heaven put on a pitying smile,
For soon she clasps the pale moon's purest ray,
And bore brave Kilbuck's noble soul away.

THE FALSE RHYME.

BY E. S. SMITH.

On a fine July day, the fair Margaret, queen of Navarre, then on a visit to her royal brother, had arranged a rural feast for the morning following, which Francis declined attending. He was melancholy, and the cause was said to be some lover's quarrel with a favorite dame. The morrow came, and dark rain and murky clouds destroyed at once the schemes of the courtly throng. Margaret was angry, and she grew weary; her only hope for amusement was in Francis, and he had shut himself up—an excellent reason why she should the more desire to see him.

She entered his apartment. He was standing at the casement, against which the noisy shower beat, writing with a diamond on the glass. Two beautiful dogs were his sole companions. As Queen Margaret entered, he hastily let down the silken curtain before the window, and looked a little confused.

"What treason is this, my liege," said the queen, "which criminals your check? I must see the same."

"It is treason," replied the king, "and therefore, sweet sister, thou mayest not see it."

This the more excited Margaret's curiosity, and a playful contest ensued. Francis at last yielded. He threw himself on a huge, high-backed settee; and as the lady drew back the curtain with an arch smile, he grew grave and sentimental, as he reflected on the cause which had inspired his libel against all womankind.

"What have we here?" cried Margaret. "Nay—this is treason:

"Sourent femme varie,
Bien fou qui s'y fie!"

Very little change would greatly amend your couplet. Would it not run better thus:

"Sourent homme varie,
Bien folle qui s'y fie!"

I could tell you twenty stories of man's inconstancy."

"I will be content with true tale of woman's fidelity," said Francis, drily; "but do not provoke me. I would fain be at peace with the soft mutabilities, for thy dear sake."

"I defy your grace," replied Margaret, rashly, "to instance the falsehood of one noble and well reputed dame."

"Not even Emilie de Laguy?" asked the king.

This was a sore subject for the queen. Emilie had been brought up in her own household, the most beautiful and the most virtuous of her maids of honor. She had long loved the Sire de Laguy, and their nuptials were celebrated with rejoicings little ominous of the result. De Laguy was accused but a year afterward of traitorously yielding to the emperor a fortress under his command, and he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. For some time Emilie seemed inconsolable, often visiting the miserable dungeon of her husband, and suffering on her return, from witnessing his wretchedness, such paroxysms of grief as threatened her life. Suddenly, in the midst of her sorrow, she disappeared, and inquiry only revealed the disgraceful fact that she had escaped from France, bearing her jewels with her, and accompanied by her page, Robinet Leroux. It was whispered that, during the journey, the lady and stripling often occupied one chamber; and Margaret, enraged at these discoveries, commanded that no further quest should be made for her lost favorite.

Taunted now by her brother, she defended Emilie, declaring that she believed her to be guiltless, even going so far as to boast that within a month she would bring proof of her innocence.

"Robinet was a pretty boy," said Francis, laughing.

"Let us make a bet," cried Margaret. "If I lose, I will bear this vile rhyme of thine as a motto to my shame to my grave; if I win—"

"I will break my window and grant thee whatever thou askest."

The result of this bet was long sung by troubadour and minstrel. The queen employed a hundred emissaries, published rewards for any intelligence of Emilie—all in vain. The month was expiring, and Margaret would have given many bright jewels to redeem her word.

On the eve of the fatal day, the jailor of the prison in which the Sire de Laguy was confined, sought an audience of the queen. He brought her a message from the knight to say that if the Lady Margaret would ask his pardon as her boon, and obtain from her royal brother that he might be brought before him, her bet was won. Fair Margaret was very joyful, and readily made the desired promise. Francis was unwilling to see his false servant, but he was in high good humor, for a cavalier had that morning brought intelligence of a victory over the imperialists. The messenger himself was lauded in the despatches as the most fearless and bravest knight in France. The king loaded him with presents, only regretting that a vow prevented the soldier from raising his vizor or declaring his name.

The same evening, as the setting sun shone on the lattice on which the ungallant rhyme was traced, Francis reposed on the same settee, and the beautiful Queen of Navarre, with triumph in her bright eyes, sat beside him. Attended by guards, the prisoner was brought in. His frame was attenuated by privation, and he walked with tottering steps. He knelt at the feet of Francis, and uncovered his head; a quantity of rich golden hair then escaping, fell over the sunken cheeks and pallid brow of the suppliant.

"We have treason here!" cried the king. "Sir jailor, where is your prisoner?"

"Sire, blame him not," said the soft, faltering voice of Emilie. "Wiser men than he have been deceived by woman. My dear lord was guiltless of the crime for which he suffered. There was but one mode to save him. I assumed his chains; he escaped with poor Robinet Leroux in my attire; he joined your army. The young and gallant cavalier who delivered the despatches to your grace, whom you overwhelmed with honors and reward, is my own Enguerrand de Laguy. I waited but for his arrival with testimonials of his innocence, to declare myself to my lady the queen. Has she not won her bet? And the boon she asks—"

"Is De Laguy's pardon," said Margaret, as she also knelt to the king. "Spare your faithful vassal, sire, and reward this lady's truth."

Francis first broke the false speaking-window, then he raised the ladies from their suppliant posture.

In the tournament given to celebrate this "Triumph of Ladies," the Sire de Laguy bore off every prize; and surely there was more loveliness in Emilie's faded cheek—more grace in her emaciated form, type as they were of truest affection, than in the prouder bearing and fresher complexion of the most brilliant beauty in attendance on the courtly festival.

DOUGLAS JERROLD.

After enduring years of drudgery at the mechanical duties of a compositor, which, to one of so imaginative and powerful a mind, must have been almost unbearable, Mr. Douglas Jerrold determined on making his first essay as an author. The opera of "Der Frieschutz" was produced for the first time in London, and the two friends went to witness the performance. The grand and mysterious music which illustrates the wild German story made so deep an impression on Jerrold's mind, that on reaching his humble lodgings, he sat up half the night writing an essay on the opera. As morning was breaking, he stepped out and dropped his first article into the editor's box of the newspaper on which he was engaged as workman. In the morning, as he was wondering over the fate of his anonymous composition, he was joyfully surprised at having his own writing placed in his hands to be set up for the next number. The essay soon caused a sensation; but amidst all the praise, the young author preserved his incognito; until at last, finding himself earnestly inquired after in the "Notices to Correspondents," he presented himself to the editor, who instantly employed him upon work more suited to his abilities and more congenial to his taste than that of setting up type.—London Globe.

KEEPING A DEAD HUSBAND COOL.

When an Arab woman intends to marry again, after the death of her husband, she comes, on the night before her second marriage, to the grave of her dead husband. Here she kneels and prays to him, and entreats him "not to be offended—not to be jealous." As, however, she fears he will be jealous and angry, the widow brings with her a donkey, laden with two goat-skins of water. Her prayers and entreaties done, she proceeds to pour on the grave the water, to keep the first husband cool under the irritating circumstances about to take place, and, having well saturated him, she departs.—Taylor.

LIFE IN A DROP OF WATER.

Clear and transparent it lies before us, vainly our eye endeavors to discover the least evidence of life, or the smallest creature, in that which seems in itself too small to contain any living object; the breath of our mouth is strong enough to agitate it, and a few rays of the sun are sufficient to convert it into vapor. But we place this drop of water between two clean squares of glass, beneath the microscope, and lo! what life suddenly presents itself; we scarcely trust our senses. The little drop has expanded into a large plain, wonderful shapes rush backwards and forwards, drawing towards and repelling each other, or resting placidly and rocking themselves, as if they were cradled on the waves on an extensive sea. These are no delusions; they are real living creatures, for they play with each other, they rush violently upon one another, they whirl round each other, they free and propel themselves, and run from one place in order to renew the same game with some other little creature, or madly they precipitate themselves upon one another, combat and struggle, until the one conquers and the other is subdued, or carelessly they swim, side by side, until playfulness and rapacity is awakened anew. One sees that these little creatures, which the sharpest eye cannot detect without the aid of a microscope, are susceptible of enjoyment and pain; in them lives an instinct which induces them to seek and enables them to find sustenance, which points out and leads them to avoid and to escape the enemy stronger than themselves. Here one tumbles about in mad career and drunken lust, it stretches out its feelers, heats about with its tail, tears its fellows, and is as frolicsome as if perfectly happy. It is gay, cheerful, hops and dances, rocks and bends about upon the little waves of the water-drop. There is another creature; it does not swim about, remains upon the same spot, but contracts itself convulsively, and then stretches itself palpatingly out again. Who could not detect in these motions the throes of agony? And so it is; for only just now it has freed itself from the jaws of a stronger enemy. The utmost power has it exerted in order to get away, but he must have had a tight hold, severely wounded it, for only a few more throes, each becoming weaker and more faint, it draws itself together, stretches out its whole length once more, and sinks slowly to the bottom. It was a death-struggle—it has expired. On one spot a great creature lies apparently quiet and indifferent. A smaller one passes carelessly by, and like a flash of lightning the first dashes upon it. Vainly does the weaker seek to escape its more powerful enemy; he has already caught it, embraces it; the throes of the vanquished cease—it has become a prey. This is only a general glance at the life in a water-drop; but how great does even this already show the small! how wondrously does everything shape itself within that of which we had formerly not the least conception!—Troy Budget.

ALMOST SUNDOWN.

When in college, a professing Christian, who subsequently became a missionary, deemed himself ill-treated by a fellow-student, and in consequence, got very angry. To the surprise and grief of his brethren, he gave somewhat free expression to his feelings. No one ventured to rebuke him, or to remonstrate with him, while he was uttering things very little adapted to promote the edification of the hearer.

Towards the close of the day, a judicious friend was passing his room. Pausing before the open door, he said in a significant tone, "It is almost sundown." The reproof, so kindly and delicately administered, was felt by his erring brother. The divine commandment, "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath," was called to remembrance. The perturbation of passion was exchanged for that of conscious guilt. The latter was calmed by prayer, and was followed by confession before those who had been witnesses of his sin.

It is our duty to rebuke sin, to endeavor to arouse the conscience to a perception of wrong doing, and to a sense of guilt. To do this successfully, and so as to secure beneficial results, requires wisdom. Wisdom seldom prompts the direct and stern rebuke. It never assumes the attitude of a prosecuting attorney; it never allows the rebuker to assume an air of superiority. In the example given above, the rebuke was indirect, and by means of an allusion to a passage of Scripture. There is nothing comparable to Scripture in power to convince of sin, and yet much depends on the skill with which it is applied. When bluntly or boisterously presented, it is more likely to repel and harden than to convince. When the conscience is thus directly addressed, it puts itself on its guard, and endeavors to steel itself against impressions. An indirect mode of address throws the conscience off its guard, and allows the light of truth to enter and reveal the sin.—Christian Watchman.

THE WOMEN OF JAPAN.

Captain Whittingham, writing of the general appearance of the women he was permitted to see in the empire of Japan, says:—"I arrived from the tropics, the ruddy—too ruddy cheeks, red lips, and eyes bright with health, struck me most; the face and features are too Mongolian; their forms are full and tall, the skin fair; small, uncompressed, stockingless feet, and luxuriant hair, and white and even teeth, complete the number of the charms of the young and unmarried; the married blacken their teeth, and destroy other charms most ruthlessly, which I at first imagined proceeded from the jealousy of their lords; but subsequently hearing that a man's momentary dislike permits him to send away his wife, and that Japanese ladies may vie in renown with the buried matrons of republican Rome, I was at a loss to guess a cause, until I incidentally heard that any official seeing a pretty woman married to an inferior, and wishing it, may take her to his home as an additional wife. I hope that neither of these causes of divorce are common; indeed, my walks in the country led me eventually to think that they are not usual, as I saw rosy, blooming children rushing out of almost every cottage door."—N. Y. Despatch.

KIND WORDS.

They never blister the tongue or lips; and we have never heard of one mental trouble arising from this quarter. Though they do not cost much, yet they accomplish much. They help one's good nature and good will. Soft words soften our own souls; angry words are fuel to the flame of wrath, and make the blaze more fiercely. Kind words make other people good natured; cold words freeze people, and hot words scorch them, and bitter words make them wrathful. There is such a rush of all other kinds of words in our days that it seems desirable to give kind words a chance among them. There are vain words, and idle words, and hasty words, and spiteful words, and silly words, and empty words, and profane words, and boisterous words, and warlike words. Kind words also produce their own image on men's souls; and a beautiful image it is. They soothe, and quiet, and comfort the hearer. They shame him out of his sour, morose, unkind feelings. We have not yet begun to use kind words in such abundance as they ought to be used.—Pascal.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

Mr. Bayard Taylor is now in London. He will pass a short time in Switzerland prior to going to Denmark and Sweden for the winter. — It is stated that a company has been formed for the purpose of inviting some 80,000 Germans to immigrate to California, and settle upon certain valley lands, which will be offered to them for this purpose. The terms are to be more favorable than the minimum prices of the public lands at the East, and they are to migrate for the sole purpose of cultivating the soil. — Next season there will probably be two boats running between Boston and Nahant, leaving every hour. The number of transient visitors this season has been very large. — Another explorer of Central Africa has fallen a victim to the terrible climate—M. Couturier, a young Frenchman. He died, it appears, some months back, at Brezina, an oasis in the Sahara, where he was stopping to learn some of the native languages. — In South India the wages of the natives are but five cents per day! — One of the oldest books in the world was recently sold in a book-sale at Paris. It is a Chinese encyclopedia, called "When him thoung khau" (General exanoination of Writings and of Sages) in ninety-six volumes, which was printed so far back as 1322—a century before Gutenberg flourished! — In Lubec, Me., not far from 500,000 boxes of herring are annually put up for market. Those engaged in the business are said to be getting rich. — Locust, or "St. John's Bread," such as St. John lived upon in the wilderness, has been imported into England to feed cattle. It is a fruit about the size of a large bean, and is said to contain a great deal of saccharine matter. — The Scotch dialect is never more expressive than when a hot forenoon is spoken of as a "summer morn." — The shells of the cocoa-nut, in a finely reduced state, are now combined with gutta percha, by which the latter article is rendered more durable, and the cost of the same is considerably lessened—the shells not being considered of much value, and are easily obtained. The gutta percha thus prepared, is rendered more elastic, and will sustain a greater degree of heat. — The New York Mirror says that a "fast woman" is one that "you can say anything to." — The Chinese are said to have conceived a horror and antipathy for the steamboat which nothing can conquer—they contend that it is a most "indecent and disgusting" invention. — Flour of sulphur, dredged plentifully on chickens that are affected with vermin, will cleanse them in a twinkling. — Swift used to say that, universal as was the practice of lying, he did not remember to have heard three good lies in all his life. A good reason why—all lies are bad. — It may not be as generally known as it should be that great danger may be incurred by the reckless handling of gnamo. We understand that cases have occurred of persons having cuts upon their fingers who, in handling this manure, have received a deadly poison into the system. — The mirrors in the St. Nicholas Hotel cost $40,000; the whole building furnished and in operation, represents an invested capital of one million nine hundred thousand dollars! — The United States own upwards of 1,000,000,000 acres of land, worth $2,000,000,000! It requires no reasoning powers to show the importance of wisely economizing and prudently using this prodigious national domain. — The same iron ore furnishes the sword, the ploughshare, the pruning-hook, the needle, the graving-tool, the spring of a watch, the chisel, the chain, the anchor, the compass, and the cannon-ball.

ELECTRICAL CLOCKS.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Commercial says the municipal administration has raised, at regular distances on the Boulevard de Sebastopol, columns surmounted with candelabras of a particular form, lighted with gas. On the candelabras clock dials have been ingeniously placed, marking the hour, the minute and the second, for the day as well as the night, by means of electricity. This is the first application at Paris, on a grand scale, of electricity as a regulator of public clocks. The experiment succeeds perfectly.

FEMALE GAMBLERS IN PARIS.—The temptation to gambling offered by the Bourse (Exchange) of Paris, is ruining thousands. The wives of hard-working tradesmen throw away the money given them for the supply of their families in gambling speculations. It is no uncommon thing for women to go to the great noisy, exciting scene, in men's clothes, and there shamelessly and shamefully to bet or speculate away the very means of their children's lives.

ALL GREEK.—The local terms used in some of the outlandish newspapers are a perfect puzzle to the uninitiated. Take, for instance, the following paragraph from the Calcutta Englishman: "At Sreekond some 4000 or 5000 Santhals have collected for a re-adjustment of their Jumnals; and the Aniah, to the detriment of all other business, are busy writing out new pottahs."

WAS HAMLET A BUTCHER?—This query has been suggested by a portion of one of the philosophic prince's speeches:

"My tablets—meet it is, I set it down."

From which it has been inferred that Hamlet drove his own cart, carried round mutton, and charged it in his book to reliable customers.

FEMALE DELICACY.—A quaint writer of sentences says: "I have seen women so delicate, that they were afraid to ride, for fear of the horse running away; afraid to sail, for fear the boat might upset; afraid to walk, for fear that the dew might fall; but I never knew one afraid to be married!"

RAILROAD.—The first railroad in the Roman States, that from Rome to Frascati, was opened for travel this summer.

Some people think the best way to cook tomatoes is to bake them on a flat dish, as apples are baked, and butter, pepper and salt to your liking.

Nineteen steamers are advertised to leave American ports for Europe during the present month, and seventeen will leave European ports for America.

Miss Catherine Hayes recently gave a concert at Melbourne, Australia, in aid of the funds of an hospital. A committee of citizens, headed by the mayor, subsequently presented her with a magnificent gold bracelet.

The gold fields of Australia are yielding at the rate of nearly $100,000,000 per annum, and the produce of the first three months of 1856 is nearly double that of the corresponding months of 1855, being close upon 700,000 ounces.

A German named Riechberg was recently executed at Bidwell for murder. As he was being conducted to the place of execution, a friend approached and shook him by the hand, with the feeling advice—"Take care of yourself, old fellow!"

A Missouri editor announces that the publication of his paper will be suspended for six weeks, in order that he may visit St. Louis with a load of bear skins, hoop poles, shingles, oak bark, and pickled cat-fish, which he has taken for subscription.

The walls of the new custom-house in Providence are completed. The structure has been a year in building. The appropriation for the purpose was $290,000. When finished, it will contain a post-office, custom-house, and United States court room.

A letter from a bank, containing a genuine bill for a thousand dollars, was lately returned to the dead letter office at Washington, the prepayment having been omitted. This act of carelessness has probably thrown more or less blame upon city post-offices.

The naval appropriation bill, which has just passed Congress, sets apart the sum of $11,348,800 for the uses of the navy. Among the items are $121,300 for the Charlestown Navy Yard, $16,700 for the hospitals in Chelsea, and $78,200 for the Portsmouth Navy Yard.

It is now said that Jenny Lind has netted £80,000 during her farewell London and provincial season, and that the public, in consequence of the system of buying up tickets by the music-sellers, must have paid at least £100,000 for the privilege of hearing her.

Capital punishment, which was abolished in Prussia, in 1848, has been recently re-established. The mode of execution is to be by the axe, within prison walls, and in the presence of a certain number of magistrates and officials expressly appointed for the purpose.

A woman in Rochester has been detected in the strange habit of stealing such children as pleased her taste, getting them baptized at different churches, and thus fancying they became her own. It is not charged against her that she treated them unkindly, or used them as charitable decoys.

Six years ago, says the Norfolk (Va.) Argus, a gentleman with a capital of $1500 bought a farm in this county for $5000; in four years he paid for the farm with hired help, and bought $1300 worth of land besides. He has recently sold it for $20,000, and the property is now worth $35,000.

A cordage and oakum factory has been nearly completed at Potrero, California, which it is estimated can turn out 10,000 pounds of rope per day. The ropewalk is 1200 feet long. Connected with the factory are two buildings for the manufacture of oakum, which can supply 3000 pounds per day.

A Mississippi paper informs us that, on one night a short time since, some 15,000 white fish were caught in one seine on Presque Isle Point, and the night before about 7000. The 15,000 were large, fine fish, worth about $1200 as they were taken out of the water. Pretty good work for eight or ten men.

A saw-fish has been caught near Mobile whose length was 19 feet nine inches, breadth from fin to fin across the back three feet, weight about 3000 pounds. The liver weighed 400 pounds, and furnished a barrel of oil. A thousand eggs, from the size of a marble to twelve inches in circumference, were taken from the fish.

It being necessary, lately, to perform an operation upon a favorite horse belonging to Rev. A. W. Barnham, of Rindge, N. H., chloroform was given with complete success. The horse laid down quietly in a sound sleep, and did not wake till fifteen minutes after the operation was over, having apparently suffered not a particle of pain.

Wire rope is coming into extensive use for the standing rigging of vessels. It is asserted to be only one quarter as bulky as hemp rigging of the same strength, consequently offering much less resistance in sailing by the wind, or in steaming against a gale. It is also but two-thirds as heavy as hemp, and therefore adds materially to the stability of a vessel.

It is stated that one thousand men are at work on the mammoth steamer now building in England, and that she may be expected at Portland in May next. Mr. Betts, one of the directors of the Steamship Company, has completed the arrangements for the building of the wharf for her accommodation at Portland, which is to be furnished at the expense of that city.

The complete plan of the extended Capitol shows that it will be one of the most beautiful and magnificent edifices in the world. Its length will be over 300 feet, its breadth more than 220, and its height from the foundation to the pinnacle of the dome will be 300 feet. The original estimate for the two wings was $2,000,000. More than $3,500,000 have been already appropriated.

Albert and Victoria receive one million of dollars annually. By strict economy they are able to support life on this small amount. It is proposed to settle three hundred and fifty thousand dollars on the Princess Royal of England, as her annuity after her marriage with the Prussian prince. Having been trained to frugal habits, it is hoped that the young housekeepers will avoid all unnecessary expenses, and thus be enabled to make the two ends of the year meet.

M. Brache, of the mineralogical school of Prussia, has published, at Melbourne, the result of an inquiry as to the quality and extent of the gold fields in California and Australia, with both of which he is acquainted. He considers the Victoria gold fields at least twice as rich as those of California, and still more inexhaustible.

ELMIRA, NEW YORK.

The village of which we present an accurate sketch is one of the prettiest places in the Empire State. It is situated on the Chemung River, about twenty miles above its junction with the Susquehanna, in a valley of several miles in extent, bordering the river, and branching off northward, along a stream known as Newtown Creek. These combined vales seem to have been intended for the site of a flourishing town, and here has Elmira, hitherto comparatively unknown, but probably destined to be known and admired in the approaching future, grown up within the shadows of her picturesque hills and dense forests, to a size and importance not easily to be overlooked, and with strong indications of increasing greatness. This locality was called, by the aborigines, Coneyawah (a head on a pole), and is the scene of some interesting reminiscences in the early history of our country. It was in the vicinity of the foreground of our picture that a battle was fought, in 1779, between General Sullivan's army and a force of about 800 Indians and Tories, under the Butlers and Brant. In the year 1790, the place was visited by ten or twelve hundred Indians, with the chiefs of all the Six Nations, including the celebrated Red Jacket, at which time, it is said, he made one of his most eloquent speeches. The object of this visit was to negotiate a treaty with the United States. The stump of an immense oak, under whose shade the convention assembled, is still to be seen but a short distance from the village court-house. In 1778, the first log cabin was erected, and some others soon followed, constituting a settlement. In 1792, the first frame house, and from that time the progress of the village was gradual and steady, though the want of convenient and even safe thoroughfares prevented strangers making acquaintance with the place and its peculiar beauties and advantages. But since the completion of the New York and Erie Railroad, its increase in population and business has been almost unprecedented. It now contains about 10,000 inhabitants, one half of which number has been added within the last four or five years, and "the cry is still they come!" It is believed that the completion of the Williamsport and Elmira Railroad and the Junction Canal, both now in progress, will give additional impetus to the growth of the place. The degree of activity in business enterprises which is here met with, would do credit to places of much greater pretensions. During the first few years of its existence, the village was called Newtown, but in 1828, through the partiality of a gentleman of the legislature, it was designated Elmira, in compliment to a young lady of that name, and we can well believe, while gazing on the exquisite beauty of this charmingly-situated town, that a mantle of loveliness has indeed descended upon it from its fair namesake. In the beauty of its location and the natural scenery that surrounds it, Elmira is not surpassed, if indeed equalled, by any place in our country. The nearly level valley in which it lies, comprises not less than thirty or forty thousand acres, whose general fertility may be inferred from the statement that one hundred bushels of corn have been produced from a single acre, and this, we are told, is a fair specimen of the whole. Through the centre of this beautiful vale glides the Chemung River, over whose surface, in seasons of high water, are floated immense quantities of valuable lumber from the still extensive forests of the neighboring counties. It is also intersected and watered by the Newtown, South and Seely Creeks, which have each their peaceful dells, leading far away to quiet and secluded rural homes. Clinton Island, so called in honor of General James Clinton, a former owner, lies directly opposite the village, and, in summer, offers to the tread of feet, weary and heated by contact with dusty pavements, the most tempting carpet of verdure, overhung by the richest foliage of a lofty growth of elms, maples and sycamores, whose coramingling boughs afford the most delightful shades. Sullivan's camping ground, near Sullivan's Mill, which stands at the foot of Mount Sullivan, from a point of which the view is taken, is about three quarters of a mile below the village, near a large elm tree in the centre of a meadow, at the left of the road. The remains of a fortress might have been seen there until a very few years since. But the admirer of nature will find more to interest him in the views presented from the summits of the range of hills encircling this luxuriant valley. Before him lies the cheerful and busy village, gleaming in the sunlight, and stretched all around against the horizon, rise the massy curves of an amphitheatre of hills, contrasting their purple shadows with golden summits fading away in the hazy distance. Among these hills are many spots of interest, clines upon his oaken couch, with the voluptuous satisfaction of a Turkish pacha. The ladies are very industrious, and devoted to their embroidery. Their costume is graceful and rich, and their head-gear very picturesque. It is a scaffolding of plaits, mingled with red flowers; at some distance the whole arrangement looks like a bright-plumed bird. It is not without instinctive repugnance that they show amateurs their little feet, cruelly tortured out of shape, but a mark of their high rank (Mr. Chang Atai being a tea-merchant). The youngest of the two married ladies, a girl of twenty, whom the London fog has rendered a little phlysisick, sings, accompanying herself on the pay-pa (a sort of three-stringed mandoline), while her husband patters away industriously with a pair of sticks upon a bit of tortoise-shell. Their religion is Budhism, an easy mode of worship, which dispenses with all external observances. Their favorite game is domino, and their other diversions playing on the pay-pa and amoking opium. They sleep en famille reclined upon matting. They are curious specimens of a curious people. But a Chinese family, with all its social belongings, is a very different thing from the same fraternity in civilized countries. Few of the immunities and rights accorded to the female members of that relation in Christian countries, are regarded there. There is one custom common in China, as well as other Eastern countries, which subjects woman to the utmost degradation,—that of infant betrothal, which shuts her out from all recognition as a being having thought, passions or will, and views her only as transferable property. Among the aborigines of New Holland, and in Western Australia, this custom extensively prevails; the female children being always betrothed a few days after birth, and, from the moment of the betrothal, the parents cease to have any control over the future settlement of their child. Should the husband die during the infancy of the girl, she then belongs to his heir. This custom is also common among the Society and Sandwich Islands, the islands of the Kingsmill group, and in New Zealand. But of all methods of at once obtaining a wife and a slave, that of purchase is the most universal. It prevailed over the vast continent of North and South America, and many of the isles of the Pacific; to this day it is carried on in Africa, and practiced by both black and brown races of the Indian Archipelago, and by nearly all the nations of Asia. The Tamboukie women are marked at one ox or two cows, while at New Guinea a wife is worth ten slaves, and is, therefore, a costly article; but in the Arru islands she may be had much cheaper.

VIEW OF LOWELL ISLAND, SALEM HARBOR.

We present on this page an accurate view of this noted island, for many years known as a favorite watering place, with a well-kept public house, the chosen resort of the citizens of Lowell during the summer season. The characteristic features of this scene are well depicted in the view, which was drawn expressly for our paper. The island has an area of about nine acres, and is a lovely spot, far off the shore, where the sea breezes may be enjoyed in all their freshness. The island was once the property of John Endicott, the staunch old Puritan, to whom it was granted by the general court in 1665. In 1684, an heir of the governor bequeathed it to his daughter, under the name of Cotta Island, soon corrupted into Cat Island. It received the name of Lowell Island on the occasion of its purchase by certain citizens of Lowell and Salem, a few years since. The property has recently again changed hands. In the years 1773 and 1774, it was the site of the Essex Small Pox Hospital, an institution established by the authority of the State, where patients might be inoculated with the small pox, and thus have the disease in a mild form, the practice previous to Jenner's discovery. The buildings were finished and ready for occupancy about the middle of October, 1773, and the name of "Essex Hospital" was given to the establishment. The main building contained ten rooms, with four beds, etc., in each, calculated for eight patients. There were also apartments for the family, besides a smoke house, clean room, etc. An Island Guard was established, and careful rules adopted by the selectmen of Salem and Marblehead, to prevent communication of disease between those on and those off the island. Patients went and returned in the hospital boat, which landed at a certain wharf in Marblehead. On Monday, October 17, 1773, the first detachment of patients, 103 in number, went down to the island; they were very respectable people, of both sexes, accompanied during the first day by many friends, so that the hospital was thronged, and all were in high spirits. The physicians were Dr. Hall Jackson, of Portsmouth, and Dr. Ananias Randall, of Long Island, both eminent physicians. The first lot or class of patients having passed through the process and the disease with success, a second class went down, and were "put through" in the same manner; and subsequently a third class,—each class numbering about one hundred. On the 4th of November, the patients indulged in a little merriment amidst the thoughts of death, by celebrating, in the evening, the anniversary of the Gunpowder Plot. Tar barrels were burned upon the middle of the island, rockets were ordered from Boston, the hospital was brilliantly illuminated, and everything passed off in the spirit of hilarity and joy. The people of Marblehead, however, disliked the location of the hospital, at the mouth of their harbor, and came to the conclusion that the small pox had been introduced into their town from it. This feeling produced intense excitement. January 11, 1774, when the hospital boat attempted to land some discharged patients, it was beaten off by the crowd, and the next day the boat was burned. The intense excitement continued, until the proprietors gave notice that the hospital would be immediately closed. On the 17th of the same month, four of the employes of the hospital went down to the island to steal some clothing; but they had been watched, and on their return, were seized, tarred and feathered by the people, placed in a cart, and paraded through the streets of Marblehead, and afterwards Salem. On the 21st, another man was tarred and feathered in Marblehead, and the proprietors of the hospital threatened with public vengeance. While a committee, chosen by the town, were attending to their designated duties of cleansing and closing the hospital, the buildings were assailed by a mob, and burned to the ground, during the night of January 26, 1774. Thirteen persons, some of them females, were asleep in the building when it was fired, without notice, and on rushing forth, were assaulted by the rioters. Subsequently, two persons were arrested and lodged in Salem jail, as participants in these outrages. Upon this an armed assemblage proceeded to the jail and rescued the prisoners, parading them in triumph. They declared their intention of marching to the rescue of any others who might, in a similar manner, fall into the clutches of the law, and such were their numbers and the determined spirit which animated them, that no doubt was entertained by law and order loving citizens that they would carry out their threats to the extent of their ability. The greatest consternation was excited. An armed collision was feared. Terrible scenes would doubtless have been enacted had not the proprietors of the hospital pledged themselves to institute no further proceedings against offenders.

CHAPTER X.—[CONTINUED.]

The evening was clear and the stars were shining when Hammett returned. Soon afterward footsteps which sounded cautious and stealthily were near the door.

"He is coming," said Hammett.

"Yes—and you must retire to your little room. He won't, I suspect, like to have a third person present."

Hammett withdrew and the next minute there came a rap against the door. Anstis opened it and invited Withers to enter. He lingered a little on the threshold, and with looks of curiosity peered into the room. If he expected to see any such professional insignia as those, it is said, who pretend to possess the skill of looking into futurity sometimes think it necessary to gather round them, he was disappointed. There were no parchments presenting a view of the heavenly bodies or inscribed with mystical characters, such as might be displayed by the more ambitious charlatan, while far from there being a dozen black cats sitting in a row on a high shelf and looking grimly down, as was once seen, or pretended to be, in the miserable hut of one of the fortune-tellers of the period, there was not even one. He saw nothing except an apartment of medium size, simply though tastefully furnished.

"I take it you are the person I have heard called Dame Anstis?" said he.

"Yes—and your name, I believe, is Withers. I was expecting you."

"I hardly know why, but I have a curiosity—a kind of fancy, to ask you a few questions. Not that I have any faith in that kind of thing."

"Then you may as well spare yourself and me the trouble."

"Perhaps so—and yet, as I am here, I may as well ask you one or two questions, and if I think that you answer me truly, I will cross your palm, not with silver but gold."

"I shall take neither your silver nor your gold."

"But the knowledge I seek to obtain is worth paying for. I am afraid I cannot depend on your discretion, or rather your silence, unless you will accept a recompense."

"If you think I've not discretion enough to know when to keep silence, better not trust me."

"Is any one within ear-shot? You have a grandson—a nephew, I mean."

"He is probably asleep by this time. If he isn't, he is at a safe distance."

Withers sat silent for several minutes, apparently doubtful how he might best introduce the subject.

"If you can tell what is to come," he at length said, "you can, of course, tell what has been?"

"Sometimes. Let me look at your hand."

She shrank back as he held it out to her, as if she felt a dread of taking it in hers.

"Rest it on the table," said she, "if you please, so the rays of the lamp will fall directly on the palm."

She traced the lines with her eye, apparently with much attention.

"Well," said he, becoming a little impatient, "what kind of a life has mine been?"

"None too good."

"That is what may be said of every one. What important incidents have marked it, I mean?"

Once more she made a show of following the lines of his hand with much care.

"The most important event of your life," she then said, "took place twenty-two years ago."

"What was it?"

"One that prepared the way for your stepping into a rich man's shoes. Am I not right?"

"I must confess that it so turned out."

"Should you like to have me tell you what that event was?"

"Yes, the question I wish to ask you has a bearing upon it."

"Twenty-two years ago, then, the heir of the rich man alluded to was lost. Is not that the truth?"

"It is. He was drowned."

"Are you certain of that?"

"There was every reason to suppose he was."

"You answer evasively. Unless my skill is at fault, you don't suppose so."

"How could he have been made way with, then?"

"That is a question you don't need to ask of me."

"I may have been deceived—he may still live. I have, at least, received intimation that he is alive, and my object in seeking you is to find if there's any truth in it."

"By what name is he known?"

"That, he who warned me couldn't tell. Can you tell me?"

"My art doesn't permit entering into particulars like that."

"I was afraid it didn't, yet that is of more importance than all else, for how can I take measures to escape the impending evil, if I don't know who I am to deal with?"

"Very true. Yet surely, if he is alive, you can obtain some clue to him. You know whom you employed, and you can judge whether he was one who would be likely to perform his task faithfully."

"What task?"

"It may not be altogether pleasant for you, or me either, to enter into particulars."

"To confess the truth, the man I trusted the matter to, is dead. He died only a few weeks since. Couldn't die in peace, he said, till he had disclosed something which bore heavily on his mind."

"And didn't he tell his name?"

This was said with an earnestness which a man cautious as Mr. Withers found it necessary to be, should have known was induced by some motive foreign to what concerned him personally. But his thoughts were so much engrossed by what he was saying, that he did not notice her manner.

"Unfortunately," said he, in reply to her question, "the man found out, before getting as far as his name, that the person who was listening to him was a friend of mine."

"And what else did he tell him?"

"After he found out that he wouldn't say another word. But to come back to the starting-point, is he living or is he not? Might not the man's story be the offspring of a diseased brain, for he died of a contusion on the head, which at times made him delirious?"

"His story was true."

"You are certain of this?"

"I am."

"I wish I understood by what means you arrive at such a conclusion."

"Nothing can be more simple or easier to the initiated."

And she proceeded with great volubility in the technical language of palmistry, to show why certain meetings and crossings of the lines of his hand formed that peculiar combination which indicated that danger might threaten him about twenty-two years subsequent to the event which had paved the way to his worldly prosperity.

"Does it not appear perfectly plain to you?" she asked, when she had gone through with the explanation.

Withers shook his head with a look of bewilderment.

"Why not let the matter rest?" said she. "He neither knows his name nor his lineage, and is consequently ignorant of his right to the property now in your possession."

"That is true, but there is no knowing how long he may remain in ignorance. After all, your jargon is of little use to me as long as you are unable to tell me his name."

"And if you knew it—what then?"

"Why, if I chose, I could let him have what belongs to him."

"Yes, and you may, some day, be compelled to."

"One more question, and I will leave you. I am attached to a young lady, and have a rival."

"And you wish to know which will be successful?"

"Yes."

"Have you ever seen him?"

"No, though perhaps you have. He has been in this neighborhood."

"I didn't see him. 'Twas before I lived here."

"Will you tell me what I wish to know?"

She looked at his hand attentively, the same as she had done before.

"He is young and handsome."

"You know this, and yet you say you never saw him."

"If I didn't see him when he was here, I see him now."

"Where?" said Withers, with a startled air.

"You needn't be afraid—he isn't here bodily, and will remain invisible to you."

Notwithstanding this assurance, Withers looked round the room uneasily, as if he expected to see a phantom form glide from among the shadows in some remote part of the room. Anstis smiled. She saw that what she had said conveyed to his mind the impression that she had summoned up the form of his rival, which, though impalpable, was to her sight visible, and she did not seek to remove it.

"If," said he, after some hesitation, "you have the power to call my rival before you, why not call the other—he whom we have been speaking of?"

"I can do it. You may see him yourself—do you wish it?"

"Yes."

"You had better not ask it. A pale, anxious face would rise up beside his, which you would not care to look upon. The old gentleman need not have been hastened. He would have died soon enough."

"What do you mean?"

"I can hardly think that you wish for an explanation. You know better than I."

"I didn't come here to listen to such nonsense," said he, rising and taking hold of the door-latch. "Once for all, I demand a definite answer to my question. Shall I or my rival be successful?"

"Your rival."

"It isn't true—I don't believe it."

"Your incredulity will neither advance your own suit, nor injure his."

"I have the father on my side."

"And he, the young lady herself. No, Ishmael Withers—Bessie Hamlen will never be your wife. The dove is no mate for the vulture."

"She shall be my wife in spite of fate. You refused to take my gold—now, I refuse to give it, for it is easy to see that you are an impostor."

"Your good or ill opinion is a matter of indifference to me. You had better look to yourself, or something worse than failing to obtain a rich bride may befall you. It will be well for you if you are not anxious to obtain either a rich or a poor one. The hand that helped rid the Percival estate of its lawful heir, will never clasp the hand of his own heir in peace."

"Surely I have seen the flash of those dark eyes before. Who are you?"

"A poor woman who has no wish to be longer disturbed by your presence."

"You, at least, have no reason to fear you will again be disturbed by it."

And without the ceremony of bidding her good night, he left the cottage.

Although Anstis, as she told Withers, did not see Wilton Richmond when he was in that neighborhood, she being, at that time, many miles distant—she had seen him several times a few months previously. It struck her when she first saw him, that there was something in his features and in his air that had once been familiar to her, but it was impossible for her to decide whether she had at some former period met with him, or whether he merely resembled some person she had, at some time, been acquainted with.

One day, when she was thinking the matter over by herself, striving in vain to assign some reason for his appearing so familiar—all at once, sudden as an electric flash, it became all plain to her. It was Thomas Percival, the father of Edgar Percival who was thought to be drowned, that he so closely resembled. His size, figure and air were almost identical, as well as the general cast of his features, though in this last respect he still more closely resembled Mr. Edgar Percival, the child's grandfather, for whom he was named. It might be one of those accidental resemblances sometimes met with, which it is impossible to account for, though Anstis, or Anzy, as she had always been designated in the Percival family, having never believed that Edgar was drowned, at once undertook to ascertain the origin of Wilton Richmond. This she did with great caution, lest some rumor should get afloat which would reach Ishmael Withers, who might, she feared, by putting into requisition the baseness and cunning which characterized him, defeat her purpose.

The result of the investigation, though not entirely satisfactory, was far from causing her to feel discouraged. She finally sought and obtained an interview with the young man himself, but his recollections of the first three or four years of his childhood were too vague to serve her purpose, except in one or two instances, which, as isolated facts, were not very important, though they might, in connection with others, have been of considerable moment.

In answer to some questions she asked him relative to his parentage, he replied that his father's name was Hendrick Richmond, who had always since his remembrance, until the time of his decease, owned a small fishing schooner of which he was the master. He had intended that Wilton should be his successor, and for several years had always taken him with him. After his father died, having little predilection for a fisherman's life, and a strong desire to acquire an education, his guardian disposed of the little fishing schooner and some other property, the proceeds of which, being well invested, afforded Wilton the means for a comfortable subsistence and of going through college.

Of his mother he had little or no recollection. He had heard his father say that at the time she died he was too young to remember anything about her. He was certain, however, that a young woman, with large dark eyes and a soft, pleasant voice, used to bend over him and hush him to sleep, and sometimes sing to him. He had a dim remembrance, too, of a gentleman who occasionally let him have his gold-headed cane for a horse.

Anstis, if he had not been so certain that Hendrick Richmond was his father, would have thought it might have been herself who hushed him to sleep, and Mr. Edgar Percival who let him have the cane for a horse, as she could distinctly remember that that gentleman never walked abroad without a walking-stick with a gold head. She made many suggestions in the hope to elicit something more definite, but without success. When Withers asked her if he was still alive and she replied without hesitation that he was, she had no doubt that she answered truly, though she was aware that proof stronger and more explicit would be required before he could be recognized as the heir of the late Mr. Percival. In her recent interview with Withers, she had, as she intended, gained more information than she had given.

She was glad to find that, personally, he and Wilton Richmond were strangers, she having previously entertained the idea that the resemblance he bore to the Percival family had excited suspicions which influenced him quite as much in his desire to have him got rid of, as his being in his way as a rival. Now, while he was in pursuit of the heir, she hoped Wilton would remain unmolested, till at least she could find means to communicate with him, and by warning him that he had a secret enemy, put him on his guard.

Withers did not mention to her that at the same time he received information that Edgar Percival was living, he learned that Wilton Richmond, who had been in danger, was now safe, though she suspected he had, from the earnest manner he had questioned her as respected his rival.

When Withers, after leaving the cottage of Anstis, was in his own room and the door made fast, he drew from its secret receptacle a dingy piece of paper, folded in the form of a letter, for since he lost the missive which Hammett had the fortune to find, he had not trusted to his pockets. He unfolded it and read it for the third or fourth time. Judging from the style and chirography, it was indited by the same hand and written by the same hand as the one he had lost. After detailing, though more circumstantially what Withers had told Anstis, it concluded with several suggestions in the way of advice.

"Now what I say is this. You had better let that other chap rest a while, for it isn't in the nature of man to keep a sharp look-out on two different trails at the same time. A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush, and for that reason the wisest thing you can do is to look after what you have got and let the other alone. The estate you are on the lookout for, is a fair one I know, if what I have heard is true, and I dare say the girl is well enough; but as you had set your heart on her father's house and broad lands before you had seen her, and as you are not the man to break your heart about red cheeks and a pair of bright eyes, I advise you to give it up for a bad bargain. Whether you do or not, you must come this way as soon as you can. You ought to have been here before now." My opinion is that the man that died at my house told Christina more than he did me, but I can never find out anything by her. You are more cunning than I am, and perhaps can find out some round-about way to put her off her guard and make her tell. That other business—you know what—I shall say nothing about till I see you. J. D."

Withers was in a state of most miserable indecision. In the morning he had a long—and what he intended should pass for a confidential—conversation with Mr. Hamlen.

"Remember, I hold you to your promise," said he, when about to take leave, he having finally decided to go.

"Certainly, certainly, sir," was Mr. Hamlen's reply. "When may we expect to see you again?"

"In five or six weeks, I think, though I'm afraid I shall be detained much longer."

In his secret heart Mr. Hamlen hoped that he would be, for he began to tire of an influence which every day seemed to gain over him a greater ascendancy, and from which, such was his indolent and quiescent nature, he could not bring into requisition sufficient energy to free himself. Withers, while these thoughts were passing in Mr. Hamlen's mind, had risen and gone to the door.

"Is your daughter at home?" he inquired.

"I presume so, though I'm not certain."

"I should like to say a few words to her, before I go."

A servant was summoned, who was sent to tell Miss Hamlen that Mr. Withers would like to see her in the parlor. It was not until after a somewhat protracted absence that the servant returned.

"I speak," said he, "that Miss Hamlen has gone off somewhere, for I've been all over the house and can see nothing of her."

Bessie had indeed made her escape, for she knew that Withers had come to make her father his farewell call, a ceremony which she expected would be extended to herself, unless she took the precaution to be absent. She took care not to return, till through the embowering foliage of the sylvan recess to which she had retired, she saw Withers leave the house. Something like half an hour afterwards she heard the distant rumbling of the stage-coach which was to convey him many miles distant. A weight seemed to be lifted from her spirits when the sound of the wheels could no longer be heard.

CHAPTER XI.

A GLANCE AT WARLIKE ACHIEVEMENTS.

As is well known to the reader of history, the military achievements during the former part of the war were unfavorable for the most part to the American land forces, while, at the same time, the navy, by a series of brilliant victories, enhanced the national renown—instead of being, as was boasted by the British, swept from the ocean.

During this time, among others, was the battle of Frenchtown, where, after the English commander had pledged his honor that the lives and honor of those who surrendered should be held sacred, left the wounded without a guard, who, after fire had been set to the buildings, were killed and scalped by his Indian allies. Many of these were young men who belonged to the first families of Kentucky.

An event less disastrous in its results to the Americans was the attack of York (now Toronto) the capital of Upper Canada. It was here that the brave Pike, who would not suffer in comparison with the heroes of ancient romance, was mortally wounded by the blowing up of a magazine. The spirit of a soldier and a commander remained with him to the last.

"Move on, my brave fellows," he exclaimed, "and avenge your general."

Inspired by the affecting appeal, they pressed on. The enemy fled from their entrenchments, and they gained possession of the town. When the flag was brought him with the red cross of St. George displayed on its broad field, which, as he led on his men a few minutes before, he had beheld waving over the British fort, with a look of triumph, almost of rapture, lighting up his countenance, he made a sign for it to be placed under his head. A few moments more, and the look of transport had faded away and given place to the deep and calm repose of death.

Wilton Richmond having volunteered his services to the army commanded by General Harrison, the rank of captain was conferred on him, the same as he had formerly held in the army of the north. He was present at the unsuccessful siege of Fort Meigs by General Proctor, assisted by the Indians under Tecumseh. Not long afterwards was the battle of Lake Erie, where the gallant Perry immortalized his name. This splendid achievement, by giving the Americans the mastery of the lake, opened the way to Malden. The troops of General Harrison were embarked and transported across the lake. On reaching Malden, however, they found that General Proctor and his forces had left, and that the fortress and public store-houses were burnt.

Night had already fallen, when, under the command of General Harrison, three thousand five hundred men, selected for the purpose, arrived within a short distance of General Proctor's encampment on the Thames. Though the air was keen and frosty, with his knapsack for a pillow and the blue vault of heaven above him, the sleep of the weary soldier was sweet and unbroken.

Wilton Richmond, as has been said, after his fortunate escape from his captors, received an appointment under General Harrison. Having seen that those under his immediate command were as well cared for as the nature of the circumstances would permit, and that, like the rest, they were enjoying the sweets of repose, he wrapped himself in his cloak and endeavored to follow their example. But sleep, as far as he was concerned, was not to be propitiated, whatever drowsiness he might have felt being soon dispelled by a faint roll of the drum and the shrill life, the notes of which were sometimes broken or entirely hushed, and then again, when the wind freshened, clear and distinct. He knew the enemy were setting their watch—and now, in the evening stillness, when each footstep was stayed and every voice was hushed, thoughts of the coming conflict awakened a train of mournful reflections which he cared not to indulge.

The better to shake them off, he rose and ascended a slight eminence near at hand. The Thames was at his feet, but the gleam of its waters was now hidden by a cloud of snow white vapor. Scattered in picturesque groups along its banks, slept those who on the morrow were to engage in mortal conflict.

"Many of them, at this moment," thought Wilton, "may be hlest with some golden dream of home which they are destined no more to see."

As the distant roll of the drum and the last note of the life ceased, a wild, prolonged cry, which died away into a low and sullen wail, was borne on the wind. It was repeated a second and a third time, and was then heard no more. Wilton well knew it was intended to call to their past those Indian allies of the British, who might not choose to obey a signal unrecognized by the usages of their own wild and irregular modes of warfare.

It was late, almost midnight, when Wilton returned to the spot occupied by his men, and once more sought to lose himself in sleep. Contrary to his expectations, he was this time successful, and when he was finally roused from sleep he found that some of the men near him were already astir. Slight as were the preparations necessary for him to make, by the time they were completed he found the commander-in-chief was ready to give the requisite orders.

On reaching the Moravian village on the Thames, where the enemy were encamped, the American troops were at once formed in the order of battle, and the engagement between the hostile armies commenced. The forces of the enemy were drawn up in a piece of woodland, and as Wilton, who had been placed in the van, led on his men to the conflict, a red warrior darted from behind a tree and confronted him. At the same instant he saw the flash of his tomahawk as he raised it to strike. But Wilton's eye was not quicker than his arm, and the weapon was struck from the uplifted hand ere it had time to descend. The next moment the Indian lay at his feet mortally wounded, and then Wilton recognized in him Memattan.

The battle of the Thames was an event, which, whether we consider the skill which conceived, or the bravery which achieved it, that calls up many and startling reminiscences. The victory was complete. Though the English early gave way, the Indians continued the fight with an obstinacy of which only the Indian is capable. The fall of their leader was alone the signal of their retreat.

The army was destroyed and the league dissolved. The result was equally important to the nation and honorable to the army. The Indian confederacy was broken, the loss of Hull restored, and the western frontier relieved from the ravages of war. Here Tecumseh, long the head who had pointed out the victim and the arm which directed the scalping-knife, fell. Here Johnson won the wreath which elevated him to the vice-presidency, and here, too, Harrison fought his last field.

If we cannot award him the qualities of a great commander, we can hardly deny him the meed of an able officer. If his military abilities are to be measured by his success, he will occupy no unenviable position in the annals of the times. In contrast with the revolutionary officers appointed at the commencement of the war, he shines a bright, particular star in that galaxy of worthies whom the war called into action.

CHAPTER XII.

ALARMING INTELLIGENCE.

SEVERAL American officers, among whom was Wilton Richmond, were sitting together in the apartment assigned them, which was rendered comfortable and cheerful by a bright wood fire. They had just finished their evening meal, and were discussing among themselves the favorable influence which the victory that had been gained must necessarily have on the American cause, when a handsome, dark-eyed youth appeared at the half-open door, and inquired if Captain Richmond was there.

"My name is Richmond," said Wilton, rising and approaching the door.

The boy handed him a slip of paper.

"Will you please to read what is written on it now?" said he. Wilton went to a table where candles were burning and read as follows:

"The bearer of this can answer certain questions which you may like to ask."

"Will you come with me?" said the boy, when he had read it.

"Yes—but won't you first have something to eat?" said Wilton, seeing him cast a wistful glance towards the table, on which were some biscuits, cold ham and other edibles, the remains of their recent meal.

"Thank you, I do need something, for I've eaten nothing since the morning."

"Sit to the table, then, and eat whatever may suit you best."

"No, a biscuit and slice of ham is all I need, which I will take in my hand."

He and Wilton left the house together, and finding the air too keen to be comfortable, they turned their steps towards an old, half-dilapidated building, which was at a considerable distance from any other, and would afford them a partial shelter from the cold. On their way what few words had passed between them had been on indifferent subjects. It was not till they had entered the half-roofless building and were fairly seated on a fallen rafters, that Wilton permitted himself to gratify his curiosity, which it had cost him no small effort to suppress.

"According to this slip of paper you gave me," he then said, "you can answer certain inquiries the writer thinks I should like to make."

"You can judge for yourself, when I tell you my name is Hammett."

"I've heard of you. You have an aunt who is generally called Dame Anstis?"

"Yes—her name is Anstis Fay."

"You can tell me something about a gentleman by the name of Hamlen?"

"He is dead."

"Dead?" repeated Wilton, interrogatively, and almost starting from his seat at the unexpected intelligence.

"Yes—he died suddenly a number of months ago."

"And do Mrs. Hamlen and her daughter remain at the mansion house?"

"Mrs. Hamlen does—Miss Bessie is gone."

"Where?"

"She left home with the intention of spending a few weeks with some of her mother's relations, who live in Virginia. Her principal object in going was to avoid meeting Ishmael Withers, who had sent word that she might soon expect to see him."

"You say that when she left home it was her intention to visit some of her mother's relatives—did she alter her mind?"

"All that is known is, she has never been there—so Mrs. Hamlen's friends sent word, in answer to the letter she wrote them when she failed to receive a letter from Miss Bessie, according to promise."

"It is very strange," said Wilton, speaking to himself rather than to Hammett. "Did Withers make the promised visit, which Miss Hamlen was so anxious to shun?"

"Yes—and appeared very much surprised when he found Miss Bessie was gone."

"You speak as if you thought his surprise was only pretended."

"Aunt Anstis thinks it was. It is her opinion he knew very well where Miss Hamlen was."

"Do you know what reason she had for thinking so?"

"One reason was, he didn't even ask where Miss Bessie thought of going when she left home. He was in a great hurry to get away—didn't stop more than fifteen minutes—and instead of coming by the public conveyance, as he is always in the habit of travelling, he came horseback, just as if he didn't expect to stay long. But what made my aunt think so more than everything else, was because he was in such high spirits. She happened to be at Mrs. Hamlen's, and was on the lawn in front of the house at the time he took leave. He took pains to turn aside from the path that he might speak to her."

"What do you think now, Dame Anstis?" said he. "Shall I, or Wilton Richmond, win the heiress?"

"What did she tell him?"

"She answered him by repeating these four lines:

"When the heir of Percival
Shall for an heiress sue,
He will surely prosper,
If his title's true."

"One would think that she doubted his title."

"And so she does."

"Why should she?"

"It is a long story—one that my aunt intends to tell you some day."

"What did Withers say to the rhyme?"

"That he should win her then, as his title to the Percival estate was true, as any one who would take the trouble to examine the records, might see, and then with a low, disagreeable laugh, he turned back into the path and rode away."

"I believe your aunt was right in thinking that he knew where Miss Hamlen was."

"At any rate she said that it would be well for you to know that she was missing, and as I was obliged to come this way for other reasons, she thought I had better try to hunt you up and tell you."

"I owe many thanks, both to you and her. Won't you return to the place where you found me, and spend the night?"

Hammett declined the invitation, saying that he had promised a friend who lived some miles distant, that he might expect him back.

Wilton was about to rise, when Hammett with a quick movement prevented him. There was no need of asking the reason of this, for at the same moment the frozen ground gave back the echo of approaching footsteps, and soon after voices were heard. It was not a time nor a place to venture abroad after dark unarmed, and Wilton did not forget to take his pistols with him. Hammett was similarly armed, and even if those they heard were enemies, they imagined there was little cause for fear.

It was a bright, starlight evening, and soon, through an aperture they could see two men advancing leisurely towards the building where they had taken shelter. They were talking in earnest though suppressed voices, and bent their course directly to the front of the building. Wilton and Hammett drew back into a corner so as to be completely shrouded by the darkness, for they imagined the men, the same as they had done, intended to enter as a protection against the cold air. In this, however, they were mistaken. Instead of entering, they seated themselves on a log a little distance from the door-way.

By their voices, which they could now distinguish more plainly, they were certain, as they had already suspected, that one of them was an Indian. They went on with a conversation already commenced.

"I thought that voice was his when I first heard it," said Hammett, in a whisper scarce above his breath.

"Whose?" said Wilton.

"Jake Dorson's. Let us listen."

"How do you know that he was here?" said Dorson.

"I saw him—it was by his hand that Mematanon was slain," was the Indian's reply.

"Where can he be? I've looked into every window where there was a light, after we had made ourselves sure that he was neither among the dead nor wounded. If Withers wasn't a fool he would know that the girl would never consent to be tied to him for life, even if the young chap was dead."

"But he's got her now where he'll scare her—make her afraid of him. She won't dare to refuse any longer."

"You don't know what a spirit these white girls have. She isn't a squaw."

"Well, it's nothing to me, whether she listens to him or not. Send me Wilton Richmond's scalp, and as many broad pieces of gold as you have fingers, shall he yours," were the words he said to me."

"Well, earn the gold if you can. I will have nothing to do with it. Come, let us go."

As they turned away, faint and imperfect as was the light, Wilton was certain that the Indian was one of the party who had formerly taken him prisoner. What had passed between him and Dorson left no doubt that it was through the agency of Withers that Bessie Hamlen had been prevented from arriving at the place intended. Wilton was not long in deciding in his own mind what course to take. He knew that the victory just gained over the enemy must, in all probability, put an end to the war on the western frontier, and as his services had for a long time been devoted to his country, he felt justified in resigning his commission and taking a few weeks to himself.

"I have long," he said, when after parting with Hammett, he rejoined his brother officers, "been desirous to visit my old home in Virginia; and, in truth, I need a little relaxation, as I have never fully recovered from the effects of the wound I received at the siege of Fort Meigs."

He mentioned re-visiting his home as a motive for travelling in Virginia, though a possibility of discovering Bessie Hamlen's retreat was a much more powerful one, which, had there existed no other reason, prudence would have prevented him from disclosing. Aside from this, the consciousness that a search which must be wholly dependent on chance for its success, might be thought to bear a family resemblance to the expeditions of those errant knights of the olden time whose object was the relief of the distressed, might in some degree influence him, though he was by no means over-sensitive on the score of ridicule.

He was not one of that class who are troubled with infirmity of purpose, and having made every necessary arrangement, at an early hour in the morning and in company with a number of others whose homes were in that direction, he was on his way to Virginia. One by one the companions of Wilton, at the time of starting forming a cavalcade of a dozen or more, fell off on reaching some intersecting road, or their homes on that they were travelling, so that by the time he found himself in Virginia, there were, besides himself only three left. At another time he would have been vividly alive to the different aspects of the scenery, in which the wild and the beautiful often formed fine and striking contrasts. Now, his mind was too ill at ease to allow himself to share the keen delight expressed by his companions.

CHAPTER XIII.

UNEXPECTED MEETING.

It was near sunset on the second day after they had crossed the boundary which admitted Wilton to his native State, that, having attained the last of a series of hills which overlooked a broad, deep valley, they saw approaching from the opposite direction two men and a lady. The men were roughly clad, and rode large, heavy horses, which seemed formed for endurance rather than speed.

The lady's horse, on the contrary, was a clean-limbed, spirited animal, yet to appearance perfectly manageable. The fair rider, as was almost universally the case with the Virginian ladies, was evidently at home in the saddle, though her appearance now was negligent and drooping, as if much fatigued or suffering from great mental depression. They were advancing slowly, and soon after Wilton and his friends came in sight, they stopped as if for consultation.

"I suspect they have some thoughts of turning back," said a young man whose name was Braynard, and who rode by the side of Wilton.

"We will make the better speed then," was Wilton's reply; "for there is something in the appearance of the young lady which gives me the impression that she is not over-pleased with her escort."

"No, they are not going to turn back," said Braynard, "they think of crossing that marsh to the left. See, the burly-looking fellow, nearest the lady, is pointing towards it with his riding-whip."

"They surely nint going to trust themselves to such treacherous footing," said Wilton. "The horses, before proceeding a dozen paces, would sink to their saddle-girths."

"So one would think, yet many of these hogs or marshes may be crossed in safety by those who know how to choose their ground. To the practised eye of that man the way, no doubt, is perfectly plain. Every inequality or diversity of surface, however slight, forms a land-mark."

"The lady don't seem willing to trust to it."

"Or she may have thoughts of seeking to exchange her escort."

"It may be so. The men with her certainly don't look like persons whom a lady would be likely to choose for protectors."

Wilton, the moment it was perceived that they intended to cross the marsh, had put his horse to a smart trot, the others following his example. He now broke into a gallop, but before he reached them one of the men turned aside into the path crossing the morass. He who remained directed the lady to follow.

"Keep as near Hans as you can," said he, "for if you vary a hand's breadth from the path, you'd keep on sinkin' and sinkin' till you come out 'tother side of the airth for all anybody knows to the contrary."

She cast a despairing look towards Wilton, who in half a minute more would reach the spot, but she dared not refuse to obey. Turning her horse, she prepared to enter upon the narrow track. An unexpected obstacle presented itself. The high spirited animal she rode had not, like the two others, been trained to venture where the footing appeared so insecure, and stopped the moment he reached the morass.

"Wait," said the man, "and I will get off my horse and put him before me, and lead yours."

As he said this she again looked at the young officer who was still in advance of the others. She then saw it was Wilton Richmond, who had already recognized in her, Bessie Hamlen. As the man jumped from his horse her resolution was formed. Wheeling hers round, she put him to his speed in the direction Wilton was going, just at the moment he came up. The man, whose feet touched the ground at the same instant she turned her horse, threw himself towards her and made a frantic attempt to catch hold of her bridle, but failing, stumbled and fell, at the moment Braynard and the two others dashed by. In the same breath Wilton and Bessie were with them, and by the time the man had fairly risen to his feet, the whole party were several rods distant, though this did not prevent him from sending a pistol-ball after them.

"Sposio! we should try to overhaal 'em?" said Hans.

"'Twould be a wild goose chase, if we should. We might as well try to overtake the wind. Besides, two to one is al'ays one too many."

Wilton and his party did not imagine they were in much danger of being pursued, and as soon as they were fairly out of sight of the two men, rode at a more moderate speed.

"Where were those men taking you to?" inquired Wilton of Bessie, as soon as they checked their horses so as to permit conversation.

"That is what I am unable to tell you."

"You don't imagine they were acting on their own responsibility?"

"No—from what I heard them say, I know very well they had received directions from Ishmael Withers."

"Where is he?"

"Of that, too, I am ignorant. Did you know, before you saw me, that I was from home?"

In answer to this question, Wilton related those particulars concerning her absence, which he had learned from Hammett.

"I have reason to believe," said Bessie, when he had finished, "that Withers sent word that I might expect to see him soon, on purpose to induce me to leave home—for he knew that if possible, I should avoid seeing him."

"That is what I think. It was merely a ruse to withdraw you from the protection of your friends, when he hoped he should be able to frighten you into accepting him for a husband."

"I couldn't go by stage within half a dozen miles of the place where my friends lived, and thus far a faithful servant accompanied me. He would have gone the whole of the way, but I found a carriage in waiting for me, and kind messages from Mrs. Woodhull and her daughters—at least, I was made to believe so—whom I was going to visit. I therefore dismissed the servant, as he was needed at home. The distance appeared to me much greater than I expected, and it was nearly dark when the carriage stopped at a house which the darkness prevented me from seeing plainly, and which, as I found in the morning, was in a lonely, secluded spot—no other dwelling being in sight. I was met at the door by a woman, who, in answer to my inquiries for my friends, told me they were absent. The moment I entered, from the entire absence of everything which denotes wealth or refinement, I knew it could not be the residence of the family I intended to visit. The woman, in answer to my questions, said she didn't know those I called my friends, but that I should soon either see or hear from a person who called himself mine."

"She meant Withers?"

"Yes—but thank Heaven, I didn't see him."

"And did you hear from him?"

"I did. The next day, towards night, I received a note from him, in which he confessed that he had taken advantage of my being from home, to have me conveyed to a place where I should be free from influences which he knew to be inimical to his wishes. It was his intention, he said, to make me his wife, and what he undertook, he generally accomplished. He concluded by expressing his regret that an unforeseen occurrence would oblige him to take a journey which would prevent his having the supreme felicity of seeing me for a number of weeks."

"And you have never seen him since you left home?"

"No. I believe I should have died had it not been for the note he sent me, as then I should have been in hourly dread of seeing him."

The road now, which followed the course of the Potomac, was overhung by frowning crags which deepened the gloom of twilight, and seemed to threaten, every moment, to fall and overwhelm them. Not a single human habitation was in sight, and Wilton began to feel some anxiety on Bessie's account. For her own part, the sense of safety experienced by her was so great, that as yet, she had not spent a thought on what, under different circumstances, might have appeared the rather alarming prospect of being obliged to pass the night without a shelter.

After riding several miles beneath the dark shadows of the overhanging precipices, the road, on sweeping round the base of a steep cliff which stood boldly out from the rest, gradually diverged in the direction of a high, open plain, whence the prospect was less confined.

They now found that night was not so near as they had apprehended. Vestiges of a brilliant sunset still lingered in the west, and mantled with burnished gold a distant reach of the river, which finally seemed to lose itself and blend with the sky. At a little distance a road, or rather a lane, turned to the right, and from behind a thick grove of pines ascended a slender column of smoke.

"There must be a house back of those pines," said Wilton. "That wreath of smoke, slowly curling upwards, has a look of hospitality. It is the sign of a good fire, which would be very comfortable after our long ride, for the air, as night comes on, begins to be cool."

Bessie, while he was speaking, had been looking at those thick, gloomy pines, and thought they appeared familiar. By the time he had finished, she felt certain that the dark outline they formed against the twilight sky, its monotony broken here and there by one, which, like some lofty spire rose high above the rest, was the same her eye had often traced from the window of the house where, for a number of weeks, she had been watched and guarded the same as a prisoner.

"O, no!" said she, "we mustn't go there! It is the prison from which I've just made my escape."

"I will try," said Wilton, "not to forget where it is. Hereafter, I may like to make it a visit."

"I hardly know what the lady can do," said Braynard. "As for the rest of us, we might do as we have many times done before, make a good bed of some pine boughs."

"We won't give up yet," said one of the others. "The road, as you see, will soon again wind among the hills, and from the summit of one of them we may have the good fortune to descry some roof large enough to cover us."

The hills, though more distant than they appeared to be, were at length attained. By the time they had reached the top of one of the highest, the last line of light had faded from the western horizon, and all was wrapped in the gloom of night.

"Yonder is a star, the loveliest that can greet the eye of weary traveller," said Braynard.

"It must be a ground-star, then," said Wilton.

"It is."

All eyes were directed to a light which, at a distance, shone through a break in some rocky, wild-looking hills, and whose long and tremulous rays, caught by the ripples of a rivulet, were broken into thousands of sparkles. They were all inspired with new courage. Even the weary horses seemed to be aware that a place of rest was at hand, and voluntarily quickened their pace.

FECUNDITY OF CORN.

A single plant of corn, either wheat, barley, or oats, by being allowed proper time and ample space for the full development of its roots, leaves and branches, is naturally capable of producing eighty ears or four thousand-fold. Anomalous, however, as this may appear, yet it is certain and as strictly true, that not fifty-fold, or one perfect ear is obtained from each grain planted throughout the entire breadth of the United Kingdom: and it would require a countless number of ifs, ands, and buts, to prove the contrary, though but few words to substantiate the truth of this assertion, namely:—"That were it so, as a necessary consequence, one hundred bushels per acre would be an average crop! viz., fifty times as much as is sown, say at two bushels only per acre as seed for wheat, barley and oats; but it is a fact not too much to affirm, that scarcely half this much (incredible as it may appear at first sight) is actually obtained; about thirty-two to fifty bushels per acre being a fair average crop of all kinds of grain, so estimated by the most able and trustworthy statisticians of the present day."—Hardy's Essay on the Cultivation of Corn.

RUSSIAN MUSIC.

The Russians are very fond of music; and this natural musical talent makes private orchestras quite a cheap luxury—as they can be employed at ordinary times as servants or workmen. The "horn music" of Russia, peculiar to that country, is said to be one of the most remarkable kinds of music in the world. The band must be composed of as many persons as there are notes in the compass of the horn. Each performer has but a single note to play, and his duty consists in bringing that note into the performance at exactly the right time. This, of course, requires the utmost accuracy and precision. The individuality of the musicians is so completely annihilated that they are ordinarily designated by the notes which they play. Thus one is called B flat, another F, and a third G.—Musical World.

HEMP.

On this page we have grouped together accurate representations of various vegetable productions of the earth, of value in commerce and manufactures. The first is the hemp-plant (Cannabis Sativa), the fibres of which are employed particularly in the manufacture of cordage. The next engraving represents a group of Indians of the Caribbee Islands, preparing a kind of bread called cassava. It is made from a very poisonous root called Jatropha Manihot, rendered wholesome by the extraction of its acrid juice. The root, after being washed, scraped clean and grated in

The sap flows abundantly from the wounded branches about the period of fruiting; a bamboo bottle is tied to the extremity of an amputated limb, and removed morning and evening. The sap thus extracted, at first transparent, becomes in time yellowish in color, powerfully odorous, very astringent and intoxicating. The to-

Cotton, an object of gigantic manufacture, yielding vast wealth to the world, is a delicate fibrous substance found in the seed-bed of a tropical plant of which the varieties are numerous. The blossoms are either yellow or dull purple. The seed-vessel is a capsule opening into three, four, or five lobes, exposing many seeds enveloped in cotton that sometimes adheres so firmly as to be separated with difficulty, but in other cases it parts freely. The fibre is, in some species, much longer than in others, giving rise to the terms of "long-staple" and "short-staple" cotton. Turmeric, used for dyeing yellow, is the

A heavy vessel at the bottom of the sack is so contrived as to press the juice out of the roots. When this is done it becomes a sort of starch, which, when well dried, is passed through a sieve. The cassava, as the root is called when in this state, is baked into cakes by laying it on hot plates of iron, or on hot earth. The substance so extensively used by us under the name of tapio-ca, is a finer kind of cassava. The Areng Saccharifera, delineated in the next engraving, is employed by the inhabitants of the Indian bacco plant, Nicotiana Tabacum, next represented, is a tropical, herbaceous plant, rising with a strong, erect stem to the height of six or eight feet, with a fine, handsome foliage. When full grown, the stalk near the root frequently attains a diameter of more than an inch. The leaves, of light green, grow alternately at intervals of two or three inches on the stalk. They are oblong and spear-shaped; those lowest on the stalk being about twenty inches long, decreasing in size as they ascend. They are smooth at first, but assume a rougher surface as they approach to maturity and become ready for cutting. The Carneuba, next delineated, produces root of an Asiatic plant, the Cucurbita Longa, delineated in the next picture. The color is prepared from the roots which are internally of a deep yellow. They readily yield their coloring matter to water and alcohol, communicating to the former a deep yellow, and to the latter a yellowish-red hue. The roots are reduced to powder before being used. The next picture shows an Indian engaged in the culture of the yam, one of the numerous roots used by the natives of tropical countries. It is a native of the East, and it is highly nutritious. The last sketch shows a branch of the Coffea Arabica, or coffee tree, with the flower and the berry. It is a tropical plant, and grows to the height of eight or ten feet. The berry encloses two hard, oval seeds. The left hand part of the engraving shows the entire berry—a berry half extricated from its pulp—the separate seeds and the flower.

I THINK OF THEE.

BY WILLIAM A. T. SILENCUS.

I think of thee when dawn of day
First changes darkness into light,
And the larks sing as they pass by,
To dissipate the gloom of night.

I think of thee at early morn,
When solar rays shine forth so bright,
When all around is still and calm,
And dewdrops sparkle in the light.

I think of thee at evening tide,
When day is fading from the sight,
And floating clouds so gently glide,
All tinged with golden rays of light.

I think of thee at midnight hour,
When moon and stars shine forth so bright,
While seated in some pleasant bower,
All lighted by the queen of night.

I think of thee while on the deep,
When moving onward to the goal;
Thine image I will always keep,
'Tis stamped upon my inmost soul.

O yes, I always think of thee,
When youth and brightest joys are fled,
When naught but musings cheer the heart,
And care and sorrow deck thy head.

THE HISTORY OF TWO LIVES.

BY MRS. MARY MAYNARD.

HUSH! Tread lightly over the velvet carpet; close the heavy oaken doors with a gentle touch, and draw the rich damask around couch and easement. Speak your joy in low tones and whispered accents; shut out the sound of the storm, the raging of the wind and the lightning's flash, and let naught disturb the silence of this stately chamber; for lo! to-day a child is born,—to-day an heiress is given to the proud house of G——, and in all fair England, there is not this hour a happier household than gather within the walls of S—— House.

The fair young mother (the very flower of the English aristocracy) is slumbering beneath silken curtains, on downy pillows, watched by careful, loving eyes, and blessed by a score of loving hearts. The tender infant, all unconscious of the magnificence that attends its appearance in this world of trouble, is reposing peacefully in its nurse's arms, unmiadful of the fact that its tiny form is enveloped in robes of priceless value,—that each quarter of the earth has been searched to procure fitting adornments for its frail body.

Fair child, the unnecessary ornaments on your fairy-like couch would be a fortune for many a poor infant, helpless and innocent as you are, but unlike you, born to penury and want. But Providence has seen fit to place the little lady in a home of regal magnificence; to make her the descendant of one of her country's oldest and wealthiest families, and there are none to dispute her right to so much magnificence.

See in yon gallery one who walks with unsteady tread, with clasped hands, and joy-flushed countenance. He is very young; scarcely thirty winters can have passed over his head, and yet he enters into the councils of his sovereign, and even now he has left the walls of a palace to follow the messenger sent to summon him home. He is handsome—exceedingly handsome, not merely possessing the physical beauty that attracts the eye, but that greater beauty which wins the heart, that is read in those clear dark eyes, in the form of that beautifully-shaped head, and the small, almost womanly mouth, and which has all his life distinguished him among his fellow-men.

He is evidently in a state of joyous excitement, and we see his countenance change as his happiness comes before in every new light in which he views it. One moment he stands beneath the heavy arches of an old-fashioned window, and we feel, as he lifts his eyes to the stormy clouds above, that words of thanksgiving are in his heart and trembling on his lips,—that he is acknowledging the bounty and mercy of the Great Giver. Again his thoughts have wandered back to her, the beloved one—she who might have been taken from him, and who is so mercifully spared; and now, if we look in those dark eyes, we see them dim with tears—tears of love and tenderness.

But see! a messenger approaches, and whispers a few words. They leave the long dark gallery together, and with light and careful step, they seek the door of the mysterious room, where the obsequious domestic bows low, and leaves his lord to enter alone. All is silent and peaceful; not a sound breaks the repose of this delightful chamber, until softly drawing aside the curtains, he kneels beside the couch, and clasping the fair hand extended to him, kisses the pale cheek of his young wife, murmuring, "Louise—my Louise! God bless you, my own wife!"

Reader, we may not linger on such scenes as this. Happiness, pure, unmingled happiness, comes rarely to mortals, and still more rarely remains with them long. Think not, because we leave the two we have here introduced, at the very summit of human happiness, that we shall find them the same when we again resume their history.

We leave them rejoicing at the birth of a child; and we may yet find them lamenting that that child ever saw the light. We leave them in the enjoyment of boundless riches, the possessors of all that rank and wealth can give to man; we may yet see them turn with loathing from their hollow magnificence, with disgust from the deceitful splendor, which has failed to give them peace.

Turn we now to a similar, yet far different scene—a scene of misery, of sorrow, such as the favored occupants of S—— House could hardly have imagined, certainly never realized.

In a wretched cottage, a few miles from an ancient and partly ruined castle belonging to the owner of S—— House, on the same day that our story opens, a little babe had been welcomed to the world amid want and wretchedness, the tears of a heart-broken mother, and the mournful wailings of an aged, sorrow-stricken and fast dying grand-parent. No husband was there to cheer the sinking heart of the young mother,—to press a father's kiss on the brow of the innocent little being, so helpless in its weakness, so strongly claiming love and kindness. No; the husband and father is far away. While his wife is weeping bitter tears over their first born, he is singing a wild song to amuse his choice companions, the idle, drunken loungers of a village tavern.

His money was spent long ago, even to the last farthing, but they who delight to listen to his fine voice, who love his witty conversation and pleasant company, take care that he shall not want for inducements to remain with them. They give him plenty of the liquor he loves, and he drinks again and again, until his voice grows thick and his step uneven; and still he quaffs the delightful poison, and cares not that his wife is suffering for the very necessities of life,—that she is fainting with hunger and thirst, that she is ill and worse than alone; for her babe needs the care there is none to bestow, and she looks helplessly from the poor infant in her arms to the shivering old grandmother cowering over the few dying embers on the hearth, and in despairing accents she prays aloud for help.

The fierce storm is carefully shut out from the chamber of one mother; it sweeps through the unglazed windows of the other, while the lightnings flash blindingly in her face, and the heavy rain drops fall on her miserable and scanty bed. All through the long hours of that dismal night, a careful watch is kept at the bedside of the patrician lady; her lady mother, her husband, even the old dowager herself, are near her, and their fond glances ever and anon seek her sweet slumbering countenance. The morning sun disclosed a scene of horror in the drunkard's cottage.

In the darkness and cold, amid the horrors of the tempest and the sufferings of poverty, the spirit of the aged woman had departed. Cold and motionless she sat in her chair, deaf to the screams of her terrified daughter, deaf to the pleadings of her conscience-stricken son.

Hark! how he calls her! how he implores her to speak once more, to listen to his words of repentance, and not to say he murdered her! Vain—vain are sorrowful words now, addressed to her. The wretched son feels that it is too late; his mind is absorbed in his own misery. He leaves his wife to the care of strangers, and hastens to his favorite resort to drown his remorse in repeated draughts of the deadly liquor. The recollections of his childhood half madden him. It is destruction to remember the happy home of his youth, the dying charge of his father, the patient love of his mother, her self-denial and anxiety to procure him an education, to minister to his boyish wants. Little wonder is it that he almost shrieks aloud in his misery, and strives to fly from his tormentor. And his wife—the poor loving girl he made his wife two short years ago,—she, also, is looking back to the past, when he, the degraded and lost one, was innocent and good,—when he took her from a happy home, a fond mother's side, and proudly called her "his own."

But now, all is changed. Cold, hunger and sorrow have long leen her portion, and even this her first-born (so welcome under other circumstances) is wept over with bitter forebodings for her future.

Fifteen years—they pass rapidly, and they bring great changes. They have made a material difference in him whom we last saw rejoicing at the birth of his daughter. Then he was young, impulsive and warm-hearted; now he is cool, calculating and worldly. The bright smile and the joyous light have left his handsome countenance, and in their stead we find deep care lines, anxiety, weariness.

Riches have multiplied with him; honors have been heaped on his head; more than once has he been honored with the most marked evidences of his sovereign's esteem and favor; he has become the sole representative of his family honors, and yet the Duke of S—— is not as happy as, when a young man, he had been sole master of his own time and pleasure.

And the fair young duchess—she, also, sighs over the past. No more retirement, no more quiet happiness; they belong to the public. Her husband has become deeply entangled in his country's politics, and henceforth she finds her place in his heart occupied. They meet but seldom now, and then the eyes of the world are upon them.

The "dual coronet" presses painfully on that fair brow. Her grace has vainly implored a boon from heaven; it has not granted her a son. She tries to be resigned now, but well she knows that her only daughter, her beautiful Constance, will never be allowed to exercise her own right of choosing a partner; even now a contract is making in which neither of the parties most interested is allowed to have a voice.

The Lady Constance is self-willed and obstinate; her mother has sad fears for the future, and more than once has striven to change her lord's determination. An unusual display of temper on her daughter's part has tempted her once more to interfere. Her husband is in his study, deeply immersed in business, and surrounded with papers; he answers his wife's knock with impatience, and hands her to a seat with ill-concealed vexation. Feeling that she is an intruder, the lady hastens to explain the cause of her visit, and states the source of her uneasiness.

"I am astonished, Louise, that you should again annoy me with such nonsense. I have more than once told you that the affair is settled, or very nearly so, and Constance has nothing whatever to do with it. This is no affair of boy and girl love, but a serious matter, embracing the interests of both families. Had I but had a son, our daughter's marriage would have been of secondary importance; but now, when it is evident that the title and principal estates must pass away, it is equally certain that my only child must go with them, and I am convinced she herself will view it in the proper light before the time comes for the celebration of their marriage."

"But her dislike of her cousin is so great, she will not allow his name to be mentioned before her."

"All girlish fancies, Louise, and, moreover, such whims do not speak very well for your method of training. I hope I shall not have cause to repent of having gratified your wishes, in allowing Constance to remain under your care, instead of pursuing my first intention of having her educated with her cousins. But I desire this may be the last I shall hear of such childish objections, and also that she prepare for her betrothal in a few weeks, as my nephew and future son-in-law will then start on his travels."

And thus it was that the Lady Constance G—— became the promised bride of her cousin, and short-sighted friends spoke admiringly of her "stately beauty," her "lofty magnificence," all the qualities so rarely seen in a girl of fifteen, and did not dream of the smothered passions hidden beneath that calm outside. They saw not the agony, the uncontrolled passion, when all was concluded, and the fair betrothed was alone in her magnificent apartments. They heard not the moans of impotent anger, the rash resolves of the thwarted girl; and they were unanimous in declaring that the match was in all respects most desirable, for "did it not unite the two fortunes of the family, and keep together all the ancient estates?"

"Maggie!"

"I am here, dear mother."

"Maggie, child, I am sinking fast; come closer to me and listen, for I have much to say, and little time to say it in."

"Mother—dear mother! you will not die and leave me—leave the little baby, and Charley, and Jamie? O, mother, I cannot let you die!"

"Maggie, dear child, don't say that. It is very hard to leave you all, but I must go; and Maggie, my little daughter, it is to you I leave my precious babes, to your care and your guidance. Be always kind to your poor father, and never cease to lead him from his evil ways; he will one day acknowledge his faults, and then you will be rewarded. Do all you can for the boys, but never desert your little sister if she lives. Take her yourself to the minister, and ask him to baptize her; keep her always with you, and never forget her in your own happiness. And now, dear child, kiss me once more. God bless you and my other darlings, and may he cause my dear husband to forsake the evil and turn to the good."

Poor Alice Brown! hers was a short and unhappy life, and in her dying request she bequeathed to her gentle child a burden of care and sorrow far too heavy for the poor young creature. But Maggie Brown, frail and delicate as she appeared, in reality possessed an untiring and energetic spirit.

Born in sorrow, despair and poverty, she had all her short life been accustomed to the hardest trials and troubles, and thus at her mother's death she assumed the control of their cottage with a courageous determination to conquer every difficulty, to fulfil to the letter that dear mother's request.

Maggie's neighbors, as poor as herself, yet found opportunities to do little offices of kindness for the children of drunken John Brown.

"Send little Charley over to our house, Maggie, and I will always give you some milk for the babe," said one kind-hearted matron, who, with tearful eyes, had watched the poor girl's efforts to induce the half-starved infant to eat the only food she had to give it.

"Don't try to do that, my lassie; you are not strong enough for such work. I will send some one from the house to help you, you poor child." And true to his word, Farmer Harris despatched his son Willie to the cot, to provide fuel for the suffering children.

Maggie blushed deeply as young Harris came to her side and relieved her of the hard task she had undertaken. He was a stranger to her, having only just arrived home from school; and being a very good-looking youth, and also displaying considerable admiration for his new acquaintance, there was little wonder that poor Maggie felt somewhat shy and ashamed in his presence.

After that morning, it became an everyday occurrence for Willie Harris to call at John Brown's cottage on his way to the post town, and old Farmer Harris frequently had his patience tried to the utmost by the length of time he had to wait for his letters and daily paper. But Willie always found means to pacify his father, and not unfrequently succeeded in obtaining a small sum of money from him, after patiently listening to a reprimand.

Next to his son, Farmer Harris loved money, and Willie had hitherto showed a disinclination to spend, that delighted his father's heart. Now, however, the case was different, and many were the discussions the good man held with his dame, as to the possible use their boy could make of his cash. One thing was certain: Mrs. Harris could never be made to believe that her darling made any improper use of it, and she always ended the argument when the old gentleman with a solemn shake of his head would say, "Dunno, dame,—dunno; boys are boys, and Willie's one of them."

It is quite probable that both Willie's parents would have been angry had they seen the number of little presents bestowed on Maggie Brown's little orphan charges (he never offered Maggie anything for herself); but as they never knew it, it never grieved them, and poor Maggie felt herself encouraged to hope on through many a dark and dreary hour by the knowledge of how firm a friend she had in rich Farmer Harris's gentle-hearted son.

But these happy days did not last forever. Willie Harris had a grand uncle in the Indies, old, rich and unmarried. He wrote to his English agent, learned that Willie was his nearest of kin, sent for him to come out to him without delay, and Maggie Brown lost her friend. True, Willie had promised to come home some day and make her rich; but then Willie was only seventeen, and India was such a long way off. Poor Maggie took the infant on her lap, and shed the bitterest tears she had wept since her mother died.

"Constance—dearest Constance, you are not offended with me? You will pardon my rashness, for you know how much I love you."

"I know you love me, Sidney, but think of the consequences of an elopement now. I dare not think of Norman's anger, for he, too, loves me, Sidney."

"Not as I do—never as I do, my own—my beloved!" And the impassioned words were rendered more earnest by the caresses which accompanied them. And the guilty wife—for she was a wife—listened to his wicked pleadings, and scarcely by word or look attempted to discourage his libertine hopes.

We left Lady Constance, at fifteen, the betrothed wife of her cousin. One short year after, she fled from her magnificent home, her affectionate parents, and the husband then had destined for her, to become the wife of a captain in a foot regiment.

Captain Norman was handsome, jealous, ambitious and poor. He had won his beautiful young bride by the exercise of his exceedingly fascinating qualities, and he carefully guarded her, now she was his own, very much to her annoyance. To maintain her in elegance, he deprived himself of a thousand accustomed pleasures, asking but a word or look of approbation in return.

One thing alone he denied her, and that the artful beauty found means to obtain without his consent; viz., the society of gentlemen, as her position, both past and present, little fitted her to enjoy without danger.

Among the most objectionable of her acquaintances was Sidney L., a brother officer of her husband's, and a wild, careless person as ever left college with a disgraced name. Heedless of consequences, he had always been accustomed to indulge his taste for flirtation to the utmost; but in Lady Constance, he met with one so different from those he had hitherto honored with his notice that the usual transient passion became something more serious, and he at last persuaded both her and himself that he was the victim of violent love. Careless of the danger, he continually implored her to elope with him, and her evasions (on the ground of Captain Norman's unfailing vengeance) but added fuel to the flame.

To him, bold and reckless in iniquity, "the danger's self was here alone," and on the evening we have introduced them to the reader, he had determined to win her consent to fly. Favored by the supposed absence of her husband (whom they believed to be on duty), the guilty pair remained together until long past their usual hour of parting, and it was not until Captain Norman himself burst into the room that they realized the consequences of their imprudence. For hours the enraged man had been on the watch, and now he came to demand instant vengeance on him who had destroyed all his hopes of happiness. The events of that fearful night were never known.

At day dawn, the startling tidings was carried to the garrison that Captain Norman had died in a fit during the night.

Many were deceived, and sincerely sympathized with the young widow, whose affliction was so overwhelming that even her most intimate friends were refused admittance. But others were not to be blinded by such deceptive appearances; and when the unfortunate officer was borne to his last resting-place in silence and without the customary honors, the whole city mourned his unhappy fate and sad end. Captain L.—immediately left the army, and for many years was unheard of by his friends; while of the future fate of the guilty wife, little or nothing was ever known with certainty.

Such was the career of one, born to inherit riches, honors and an untarnished name. Of her parents, we dare say no more; death has taken them from this troublesome world, and their hopes, their disappointments, their sorrows and their disgrace are alike sacred. The present winner of the family honors is now an old man. He mixes much in public life; he has for long years been a husband and father, and his stately wife and noble sons might well make glad his heart; but friends will tell you that his grace's temper suffered from an early disappointment, and not all the years since passed can efface the remembrance of the fair and deceitful cousin who disdained his youthful love, and left him to battle his way through life, with the firm conviction that truth does not exist here. The lady, whom for political reasons he made his wife, is a true "woman of the world," and her influence has strengthened her husband's error.

"Maggie, I have returned no richer than I left you, but unchanged in regard to my love. You must be mine now, Maggie; I cannot see you slaving forever for your father and brothers without a hope of change for the better. My home is at least comfortable, and my parents will welcome you for my sake."

The young couple were seated under the shade of the green trees, and Willie Harris had passed his arm around the slender waist of his companion, and drawn her close to his side. Very beautiful the cottage girl looked, despite the poverty-stricken appearance of her dress and the careworn expression of her countenance.

And Willie, as he passed his hand over her smooth, glossy hair, and watched the rosy flush rise in her fair cheek, heeded not that her faded old dress was worn and patched, that the bonnet lying on the ground was old and shabby, or that her feet were covered with shoes of the coarsest material.

It was for herself alone that Willie Harris loved Maggie, for her sweet temper, her beauty and her untiring devotion to her family; for these he had refused the wealthy bride selected for him by his rich old uncle, thereby incurring said uncle's displeasure, and returning in disgrace to his home. And Maggie knew all this, and yet when Willie asked her to become his bride, she slowly drew herself away from the clasping arm, and looking in his face with tearful eyes, exclaimed:

"It cannot be, Willie—dear Willie! I never can be your wife."

"Maggie! What is this?—what has come over you, Maggie, my own, to speak such words as these?"

"Hard words they are, Willie, God only knows how hard to me; but they must be spoken, and again I say I cannot be your wife."

With unmingled astonishment, the young man saw the great tears falling down her cheeks, as these words passed the lips of her he loved so well; and catching her to his bosom, he exclaimed, passionately:

"This is all nonsense, Maggie! Mine you are, and mine you must be. It is too late now to try to make me believe you do not love me. You must promise me now at once that you will be my wife immediately."

But Willie Harris was not prepared to find his gentle Maggie firm and unyielding in her strange determination, and not all his love could prevent his feeling angry, on hearing that her refusal arose from her determination to obey her mother's dying injunction, and never to forsake her father and his poor neglected children.

The little girl Maggie had so carefully attended since its birth, was merrily playing beside them, and Willie reading some of Maggie's thoughts, hastened to assure her that for little Bella his home was always open,—that he never dreamed of parting her from her sister, and consequently there could be no further objection to his plan.

"But what will become of the boys? and father, too, grown old with poverty and dissipation! No, no, Willie; urge me no more. It never, never can be!" And catching her little sister up in her arms, Maggie fled away from her lover as if fearful of listening any longer to his arguments.

Willie's first resolve was instantly to banish Maggie from his mind forever, but a few hours convinced him that it was no longer in his power to do so.

Maggie's noble renunciation of happiness made her dearer than ever to him, and evening saw him at the cottage, where, after another fruitless attempt to change her purpose, he bade her farewell, convinced that to remain near her was only additional misery.

"If he could only have stayed here!" sobbed poor Maggie, as, standing in the moonlight, she watched her lover slowly retracing his steps,—"only remained where I might sometimes see him, I could have borne my misery; but now—now he has gone, and I am all alone."

Scarcely less unhappy was the young lover, who went home to astonish his parents with the announcement of his intended departure for the "Great West."

"There is no room in this country for a man to live, father," was his answer to the old farmer's objections. "I must go where I can roam freely over the wilderness,—where no one shall say, 'this is mine; you cannot come here.' I have been east, I will now go west. Perchance, when wearied of wandering, I may come home and settle quietly in the dear old place, but at present it is impossible."

And Willie actually went away, in spite of the lingering hope in Maggie's heart, that he would change his plans; and once more the poor cottage girl pursued her weary course uncheered by anything save the voice of an approving conscience, and the love of little darling baby Bella.

But Maggie had not yet passed through all her trials. It was not until she stood beside the little pauper coffin and looked her last on the fair little image sleeping in it, that she realized how many and how agonizing are earth's trials.

But Maggie passed through the ordeal unflinchingly. Her father, shocked at the death of the little one, suddenly left off his bad habits; but long use had rendered him powerless to overcome their evil effect. He pined, sickened and died; and Maggie, after proving herself a "ministering angel," sincerely mourned for him whose mistaken ways had shadowed her whole life.

As soon as John Brown's death became known, friends gathered round the orphans, and an old sailor uncle of their mother's fitted out the two boys, and took them with him to sea. Maggie refused all offers of a home, persisting in remaining in the little old cottage and supporting herself by knitting and sewing for her neighbors.

Several months passed thus, until Dame Harris was taken severely ill, and then in his perplexity the farmer could think of no one so likely to make a good nurse as "orphan Maggie." True, he had treated her very coldly of late days, for he more than half-suspected the agency she had had in sending his boy away; but the case was urgent, so he smothered his vexation, went himself, told her his troubles, and took her home with him at once.

And then such a change as took place in the old farm house!

Nobody could have convinced the old gentleman that by any possibility any other woman could do what his dame could do, and he almost believed in magic art when he witnessed the improvements the young girl made in his disordered household. And the sick dame, too, almost doubted the evidence of her senses when told by her husband that instead of being all wrong, every part of their house was in excellent order.

The prejudice once removed, and confidence felt in her, the old couple soon began to love Maggie dearly, and before Willie's return, she had become necessary to their comfortable existence. Of course, after that she never left them, and her future life amply repaid her for the trials of her youth.

Five years after their marriage, Willie's uncle in India died, and left Willie a large fortune. The old house was pulled down, and a handsome and convenient new one replaced it. Their garden (always a good one) was enlarged and improved, and gradually the old place assumed a look of elegant comfort, in accordance with the young master's taste.

When I saw Maggie last, it was at the christening of her third child; and as it was the first son, the occasion was one of exceeding joy. The young mother looked very well and very happy, and if a slight shade of remembered sorrow was at times visible, it did not detract from her beauty. Her pretty lavender silk dress, delicate lace collar and most becoming cap (the matron's badge in England), looked just as they ought to have looked, and I could freely pardon her handsome young husband's adoring glances. Her two little girls (born to a happier childhood than their mother enjoyed) were very pretty, rosy, English children, and evidently great pets with their grand-parents and all their father's family connections, half a dozen old maid aunts inclusive, said aunts allowing them to disarrange the prim propriety of their ringlets and ribbons with most admirable patience and good humor.

THE AFRICAN WOODS.

The most formidable of all animals in the woods of Africa is the famous but recently discovered Triglophus Gorilla, called in the language of the Gabon, Njema. It belongs to the orang-outang or chimpanzee family, but is larger and much more powerful than any other known species. It is almost impossible to give a correct idea, either of the hideousness of its looks, or the amazing muscular power it possesses. Its intensely black face not only reveals features greatly exaggerated, but the whole countenance is but one expression of savage ferocity. Large eyeballs, a cross of long hair, which falls over the forehead when it is angry, a mouth of immense capacity, revealing a set of terrible teeth, and large protruding ears, make it one of the most frightful animals in the world. It is not surprising that the natives are afraid to encounter them even when armed. The skeleton of one, in possession of the Natural History Society of Boston, is supposed to be five feet and a half high, and with its flesh, thick skin and the long shaggy hair with which it is covered, must have been nearly four feet across the shoulders. The natives say it is ferocious, and invariably gives battle when it meets a single person. It is said they will wrest a musket from the hands of a man and crush the barrel between their jaws, and there is nothing, judging from the muscles of the jaws, or the size of their teeth, that renders such a thing improbable. The common African chimpanzee abounds in all parts of Western Africa. Those of Southern Guinea are not so large as those higher up the coast. It is the nearest approximation to the human species of any of the monkey family. It is easily domesticated, is mild and sociable in disposition, and gives unmistakable evidence of strong personal attachments. Its character and habits are so well known that we do not feel it important to give it a more extended account.—New York Star.

The extracts from this work which we had seen in foreign papers, excited a curiosity which a perusal of this version has fully gratified. It is a lively, graphic and dashing narrative, not without a touch of blague, giving a perfect picture of that unique corps, the world-renowned French Zouaves. It is thoroughly readable, from title-page to colophon. For sale by Whittemore, Niles & Hall.

ROBERT GRAYMAN. A sequel to "Linda," by Mrs. CAROLINE LEE HENST. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson. 1856. 12mo. pp. 259.

The readers of "Linda, or the Young Pilot of the Belle Pelee," one of the most graceful productions of a pen that will delight them no more, will be gratified to peruse the continuation of that charming story, which is concluded in the same spirit, and which is quite as interesting. WESTERN BORDER LIFE, OR, What Funny Hunter one and heard in Kansas and Missouri. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1856. 12mo. pp. 408.

The title of this book is enough to draw attention to it. How faithfully life on the frontier and in the new territory is depicted, we are incompetent to tell. The book undertakes to delineate the "efforts of a faithful Christian teacher from New England to do good among her pupils." For sale by Whittemore, Niles & Hall.

THE LIFE OF GENERAL DANIEL MORGAN OF THE VIRGINIA LINE, U.S.A. By JAMES GRAYMAN. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1856. 12mo. pp. 476.

The name of Morgan is one of the most illustrious on the long list of our revolutionary heroes, and his unexaggerated efforts read like a romance. The life before us is well written, and embraces a general view of the stirring and glorious times in which the gallant general lived and did his part. A fine portrait of the hero forms the title-page. For sale by Sanborn, Carter & Baile.

VICTORIA, or The World Overcome. By CAROLINE CHESNORE. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1856. 12mo. pp. 465.

We think the public will decide that this is the best work yet from the pen of our popular American authoress. It is interesting as a narrative, pure and lofty in its tone, and abounding with vividly drawn characters. We predict an extensive sale for it.

FRONTIERS FROM A MOUNTAIN MESE. By HENRY J. SARGENT. "Residual Legacy of the late Walter Anonymus." Boston: Crosby, Nichols & Co. 1854.

These very clever poems, many of them humorous, seem to grow in favor with the public. There is an ease and grace in the versification, a reality and purity in the sentiment, which commend them to all tastes. These first print offerings of a native genius lead us to expect other and yet more successful productions.

THE LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON. By J. T. HEADLEY. Illustrated. New York: Charles Scribner. 1856. 8vo. pp. 477.

The life of the Father of his Country cannot be too often written. Each year that rolls over our heads adds to the value of his example and the importance of his counsels. It deserves and will receive an extensive sale. For sale by A. Williams & Co., 100 Washington Street.

FLYING PROAS

OF THE LADRONE ISLANDS.

The accompanying picture represents the peculiar boats (proas) used by the Ladrone islanders, with their slender hulls and huge triangular sails, managed by the natives with great adroitness. To the mariner accustomed to European rigs, a fleet of these queer craft hurrying along shore affords a singular spectacle. All the navigators who made known to us the existence of groups of islands in the Pacific, the Indian and other oceans, accompanied their narratives with descriptions of the canoes or other kinds of boats in use among the natives; and means are thus afforded for observing the various ways in which ingenuity is brought to bear on such matters. Whether each nation or tribe made its own discoveries, and applied its own inventive skill, or whether one borrowed ideas from another and modified them according to circumstances, can now hardly be known; but it is probable that both causes led to the production of the object in view. The proa we have delineated is used among the Ladrone and other eastern islands. In the account of Anson's voyage, this proa is spoken of with marked commendation. "Whether we consider its aptitude to the particular navigation of these islands, or the uncommon simplicity and ingenuity of its fabric and contrivance, or the extraordinary velocity with which it moves, we shall find it worthy of our admiration, and meriting a place among the mechanical productions of the most civilized nations." The proa seems to be constructed on a principle the very reverse of American vessels; for, while we make the head of the vessel different from the stern, and the two sides alike, the proa has the head and stern alike, but the two sides different. There is one side of the vessel which is intended always to be kept to leeward, and this is flat, whereas the other side is rounded. To prevent her oversetting, which is liable to happen from her narrowness of beam, and the straitness of her leeward side, there is a frame extending from her to windward, to the end of which is fastened a log, shaped like a small boat, and made hollow. The weight of the frame is intended to balance the proa, and the small boat, by its buoyancy, prevents the oversetting. The body of the proa is made of two pieces joined endwise, and sewed together with bark—there being no iron used about her; it is always about two inches thick at the bottom, and about one at the gunwale. The proa generally carries six or seven men, two of them placed in the head and stern to steer the vessel alternately with a paddle, according to the direction in which it is going; the other men being employed in baling out the water which she accidentally ships, or in setting and trimming the sail. The peculiar construction of these vessels arises out of the sort of navigation for which they are intended. The Ladrone is a string of islands lying nearly north and south of each other, and the proas have scarcely to follow any other points of the compass than these two in maintaining intercourse between one island and another. Either end of the vessel may at pleasure make the head, and thus, by simply shifting the sail, it may go to and fro without ever "putting about" or turning round. By the flatness of their lee side and small breadth, they are able to be much nearer the wind than other vessels. They have been known to progress, when a brisk tradewind was with them, at the rate of twenty miles an hour, and their amazing swiftness has earned for them the name of "flying proas."

WASHINGTON STREET, HOBOKEN, NEW JERSEY.

In our number of September 6th, we presented a general view of Hoboken, taken from the river, and accompanied it by a sketch of the place. We now add a view of Washington Street from the pencil of the same artist—Mr. Hill. Hoboken is laid out with great taste and liberality, and the streets are planted with shade trees. That in our view is the principal business street. The prominent buildings delineated are the Odd Fellows Hall and one of the armories. In front of the latter, a New York city company, on a target excursion, accompanied by Doderworth's band, is halted. During the fall, hundreds of corps come over from New York for target and battalion exercises. There is great military spirit in New York, and the emulation among the volunteer companies brings their drill as near perfection as possible.

THE LAKE OF GENEVA.

The Lake of Geneva, or Lake Lemán, presented on the next page, is one of the most beautiful and celebrated of European lakes. The picture before us delineates as far as engraving can, one of the most striking portions of this vast inland mirror, reflecting the magnificent theatre of mountains that rise until their snow-capped summits blend with the very clouds. The buildings stretching along in the middle distance, add greatly to the picturesque effect of this truly magical scene. This lake lies between Switzerland and the Sardinian States. It is in the form of a crescent. Its length is forty-five miles, while its breadth varies from one to ten. It is 1230 feet above the sea, and its greatest depth is 984 feet. It is traversed by the Rhone from east to west, and receives the Dranse, Venoge and other small rivers. Its waters are noted for their deep cerulean blue color. They abound in fish. This magnificent sheet of water is never frozen over. It presents a very curious phenomenon at times, when it rises from one to five feet, this remarkable elevation lasting only about half an hour. It has formed the subject of many paintings and poems, but none of the latter attain the beauty of the well-remembered stanzas in Child Harold's Pilgrimage. During Lord Byron's stay in Switzerland, he took up his residence at the Campagne Diodati, in the village of Coligny. It stands at the top of a sloping vineyard, the windows inside presenting a fine view of the lake and the city of Geneva. To his evening excursions on the lake, we owe those stanzas commencing with an invocation to the lake:

"Clear, placid Lemán! thy contrasted lake,
With the wild world I dwell in, is a thing
Which warns me, with its stillness, to forsake
Earth's troubled waters for a purer spring.
This quiet sail is as a noiseless wing
To waft me from distraction; once I loved
Torn ocean's roar, but thy soft murmuring
Sounds sweet as if a sister's voice reposed,
That I with stern delights should ever have been so moved."

CONTENTMENT.

BY WM. RODERICK LAWRENCE.

But few the hearts where true content
Doth in its fullness dwell,
And few there be who rightly prize
Its calm and holy spell.

To its possessor it is more
Than all the gems of earth:
It is a rare and blessed gift,
And owns a heavenly birth.

We may be rich without the wealth
That falls to some below;
We may be poor, yet millions own,
As earthly riches go.

But he who true contentment feels,
However low his lot,
Bears in his heart a jewel rare,
That will forsake him not.

MY TUTOR'S NIECE.

BY WILLIAM B. OLIVEN.

I was just seventeen years old when my father entrusted me to the care of Parson Atherton, an old friend of his. He lived in a rural district, far away from the temptations of the busy town, in a quiet embowered parsonage, from whence he rarely emerged, except to give his usual Sabbath sermons. To all appearance, the gentle old man was as innocent of world knowledge as his young pupil; and had there not been a Mrs. Atherton, one would have doubted whether the placid flow of his existence had ever been stirred by any emotion whatever. But that he had a wife, and the fact that she at least had felt something more than mere ripples on her sea of love, were proofs that some time—long back perhaps in the history of the great past—Mr. Atherton's life had been buoyed up into hope, or swayed by ambition for one he loved.

Be that as it may, they had settled down in a passive calm now. Nothing on his part ever took place more important than the dull lesson from Cicero or Horace, which he drilled into me, or the duller sermons which he drilled into his rustic parishioners. Nothing on hers more grand than the autumnal pickling and preserving, or the tying up of her roses and honeysuckles. It was the old story of Adam and Eve; and surely this place—this very Longwood Parsonage—was Eden itself. But alas! Adam had grown old and infirm, and Eve, though a good deal younger than Adam, was certainly not the "fairest of her daughters."

They were very kind to me. I can remember that. Whatever of wrong or blame may be attached to me—Hamilton Lockhart—that of forgetting friends or favors is not among my transgressions. I loved the kind old man very dearly, and I am not sure that Madam Atherton did not claim as large a share in my youthful heart as her good husband. Everything which she could do, or cause her neat-handed servant girl, Nannie, to do for me, was done. My chamber was as sweet as the mountain heather, with lavender and dried rose leaves, my wardrobe neatly kept, the handsomest flowers and finest fruits at my disposal, and freedom to read in the cosiest corner I could find.

Those were rare days! I wonder now that I did not linger more fondly over them, and feel that nothing brighter or happier could ever come up to me in life again! The morning lesson, rendered easy by the masterly teaching Mr. Atherton gave me, the two following hours before our simple, early dinner, in which I helped Mrs. Atherton shell peas or pare apples, and listened to her stories of old times; the after dinner stretch, not sleep, in the cool, shaded alcove, with the murmur of the brook and the song of birds in my ear, and the fretted network of green leaves and branches above me, where the stray sunbeams only partially came in, and a perfect bower of roses around me; the sweet rustic repast which Nannie always spread beneath the trees, when the weather would permit; the moonlight sail on the little stream, in which I was proud to show my seamanship to the two venerable friends who accompanied me—yes, those were rare days indeed; and yet they were as nothing, absolutely nothing, to the bewildering dream that followed them.

Strange as it may seem, I did not tire of these simple joys. Whether it was that out in the illimitable future there stood a shape, a destiny, that I seemed to know by intuition would never be approached nor hurried, I seemed to wait passively the time when it should come to me, or I should unconsciously be drifted up to it, I know not. But despite my youth, and the impatience natural to it, I was waiting for it very calmly.

Sometimes it had a glory around its brows, and then it seemed farther off; but often it wore a look of gentle dependence, and of patient hope, as if it, too, was waiting for time to bring two souls together, which, after that meeting, were never to be parted again.

You will say these were schoolboy fancies; but if so, why did they grow stronger, and become invested with a higher faith and a more enduring presence, as I ripened into manliness? Why did I believe in it, firmer and firmer, as the devotee believes in his patron saint, or the spiritualist in his guardian angel? Why did not the conviction ever come to me, as my mind and understanding matured, that I had been cherishing a mere fancy—a deception—a chimera?

No; each year deepened my faith in the coming fate which always wore so sweet an aspect in my eyes. And had it not seemed like dragging down my angel into a mere common mortal,

I might almost have embodied my ideal, or at least hoped to have done so, in the person of Madam Atherton's niece, whom she was now daily and hourly expecting to take up her abode with her—for both father and mother had died abroad, and left their only child to the protection and care of my tutor and his wife.

I thought a great deal about the new comer. She did not take the place of the dweller in my thoughts; but she had a nearer approach, and I could think of her differently—more like a human and less like a supernatural being. Moreover, this one had a name, and I could identify her, too, through another's vision. Madam Atherton had seen her niece, although she was then a mere child, and I could not blend my glorious shadow with the large staring eyes, gipsy skin and irregular features, which she laughingly owned were her niece's distinguishing characteristics of person, scarcely improved, she thought they could be, by her three years' residence in the West India islands, where her father, a rich Scotchman, had resided, and where his wife and child had joined him. The fever which spared the daughter, had not been so merciful to the parents; and Flora Ballantyne was now coming to the parsonage, with little more than a remnant of her father's wealth—perhaps barely enough to pay her board.

"But we shall never mind that, Master Hamilton," said the old lady; "my sister's child would be welcome without a penny, as well to Mr. Atherton as to myself. She will be like a daughter to us both; and surely she will not forsake us in our old age, if we protect her youth."

The sympathies of a youth of twenty are not hard to be roused when the subject is a young lady; and I delighted Madam Atherton by my ready appreciation of the new treasure she was about to receive, promised my assistance in trying to make Miss Ballantyne's time pass pleasantly, and won her admiration the very next day, by a new coat of paint which I gave my boat, and the new brass collar which I fastened around Hector's neck. She took both as compliments to her niece.

For my own part, I found myself stopping short in my Latin translation, with the words "staring eyes, gipsy skin" on my lips, which I took care should not reach the ears of Mr. Atherton, who sat writing out his Sunday discourse, perfectly unconscious of his pupil's wandering thoughts; and, in his simple way, turning over the leaves of his great Bible until he found the passage he needed.

We were not expecting Miss Ballantyne very soon, for word came that she would first visit an old schoolfellow at Southborough. When, therefore, the Longwood stage came dashing and tumbling down the hill opposite our house, disappeared into the valley, and was again seen through the trees, lumbering slowly up the ascent that led to Longwood parsonage, we were not prepared for the advent of the Scotch maiden, but rather believed it to be some member of my own family paying me a hurried visit on the way from town.

I stood, therefore, on the receptive, thinking only to see brother Charles, or perhaps only John, my father's head clerk, who sometimes came to settle my board bills, when the stage drew up with a jerk, the driver dismounted and pulled down the step, and took in his arms a small, light figure closely veiled and draped in deep mourning. I stood aside, awkwardly enough, and let Mr. Atherton take my place; and for the next half hour I was seeking Madam Atherton among the shrubberies, down in the orchard, and finally in old Katy Jewsbury's cottage. By that time I found that there would be no further sight of the new comer until the next morning; and I retired to my room, where I lay watching the moonbeams playing on the brook, and wondering what strange beauty Flora Ballantyne's face might have grown into since her childhood; and fell asleep to dream of two distinct figures standing afar off in the mist, and finally blending into one.

The next morning I was up bright and early; but on going down to the pretty stream which ran by Longwood parsonage, I found that our guest had preceded me. She was sitting on the green bank of the stream, and playing with the branch of a tree, which she dipped into the sparkling water.

"Miss Flora Ballantyne!" I said, inquiringly; for I had come unaware upon her seclusion, and I could not retreat.

"Just so," said the maiden; "and this is Mr. Lockhart, I suppose."

I acknowledged the fact, and sat down beside her; and when we returned to the breakfast table, it was with a friendship already begun and considerably advanced. For we had talked nearly two hours upon a variety of subjects, and had discovered a wonderful similarity of opinion and sentiments; and the formal introduction which Mrs. Atherton had been anticipating for weeks, was fairly nipped in the bud.

"Well, Hamilton, does Flora look as I described her to you?" said good, simple Mrs. Atherton, as I drew a chair for the lady, and boldly seated myself beside her.

I pretended to look at her niece somewhat narrowly, as if her looks had not had any place in my thoughts before.

"She certainly does not resemble the people of her father's country," I answered, after mature deliberation.

"Very true," said Madam Atherton, "my sister lost all her blue-eyed and auburn-haired children, and only this 'gipsy-skinned maiden' survives."

I looked again, and the bright, eloquent black was struggling up through the dark skin, and beneath the black, glorious eyes; and the red lips parted into a smile, that showed such magnificent teeth, as one sees but once or twice in a lifetime. She did not then resent the term of gipsy. I knew then that she was sweet-tempered, for dark girls are sometimes irritable and sensitive as to their peculiar tinge; and she was so dark, that she might have been mistaken for a genuine West Indian.

I liked her for this; and indeed our breakfast was not over before we all seemed happily to grow into the belief, that she was to be the great acquisition to our family circle—was to fill up the niche in the household so long empty, and, in short, that none of us could ever do without her again. She fell into her place as pupil to my instructor in the most natural way; told him that she wished to rub up her school learning; and, with the most exquisite little aprons, she commenced helping Mrs. Atherton and Nannie with the housework, doing all the parts that required most perseverance and energy, and again copying for her uncle with the zeal of a regular literary fag.

I looked to see her tire herself out, and go back to unmitigated fine ladyism. Not she! She was too much engrossed in it to weary, and nothing seemed to trouble or fatigue her. She was always cool, always ready, and never in haste, nor out of temper.

"How had aunt Atherton lived without her so long?" she asked one day; and the good old lady said, earnestly, "How, indeed?"

Among all these pleasant things was one that troubled me. She received letters constantly from some one who wrote a beautiful hand, evidently a gentleman's. As I was the one who attended to taking the family letters from the post-office, I often saw the quick blush that came to her cheek when that particular handwriting was presented to her eye. She never entrusted me with any in return; but while I was engaged in my morning lesson, she generally went down to the village, I could not doubt for what purpose. It was coming upon me slowly, but not less terribly, that Flora Ballantyne had a lover! And equally slow and terrible was the fact, that I could no longer deny to my soul that I loved her with the deepest and strongest love of which the human heart is capable.

I struggled madly with this new trouble which had come upon me. I felt that a wrong had been done me; that here, in this quiet, peaceful home, a being had been sent to me without any act of my own, formed, as it seemed, expressly for me alone, and yet that I was scarcely to look at her face, and feel how intimately our beings were united, before the tie was to be severed, and we were to become as nothing to each other! This was mad reasoning enough, but I was new to heart conflicts then, and I did not know how to manage and keep in check the deep, loud throbs that came swelling like billows from the tide of my overpowering passion.

I was lying on the bank of the stream one evening, just as the daylight had departed, and the broad, round moon had shown its rim above the horizon. My boat lay there ready to be launched, and Hector was impatient to spring in. I rose languidly, and prepared to cast off the rope by which I had fastened it to an upright post.

"Let me go with you, Hamilton," said the voice of Miss Ballantyne behind me. I had been thinking of her, and must have blushed like a girl, as I turned to her; but I courteously placed her in the boat and sat down near her, while Hector, according to custom, laid his head in her lap. I was cold and embarrassed, and she evidently noticed it.

"We have beautiful moonlight sails on our Scottish streams," she said, after a pause. "I remember some in which joy and sorrow are so intimately blended with their memory, that I cannot tell which has the pre-eminence."

"Your recollection of your mountain home, Miss Ballantyne, seems always more vivid than your recent residence in the islands."

"It is, indeed, and far more pleasant. When I tell you that my little brothers and sisters, and my parents all died after we left Scotland, you will not wonder that those islands seem to me like one vast grave."

"Enough. I entreat you not to recall it again. I was almost rude to make the remark; but as it was inadvertent, you will, I am sure, forgive me."

Of course she said everything kind, but we had a painful and constrained meeting, until as we were about to step on shore at the little sort of cove where I sheltered my boat, Flora's foot slipped, and she went backward with her face falling forward into the water. It was but the work of a moment to take her up and bear her to the house in my arms, Hector following with his loudest bark. They had all retired, but I ran to my bedroom and brought blankets, and laid her on a settle by the kitchen fire, and poured wine into her mouth, and finally restored her. She had fainted from striking her knee against a stone, and it now pained her terribly. I called her aunt, and ran off for the doctor, who decided that it was an injury which would probably confine her some days to the house. It did so for weeks.

During this illness my relations with Flora were of the most genial nature. I waited on her almost constantly. She was not carried up stairs, but a bed was brought down for her every night, and her aunt or Nannie slept on the couch. In the morning, after she was dressed, either her uncle or myself would take her in our arms and carry her to the breakfast-room, where she remained until after tea, when she would be carried back to the parlor again. No queen on the throne ever met with more homage; no one ever more graciously acknowledged it. The fruit, flowers, game, fish and fowl that were brought to her from the village, would have supplied many a summer boarding-place through the season. She pleased herself by selecting it for the sick and poor, who fared all the better for her temporary illness.

"Take this down to old Katy Jewsbury, please, dear Hamilton," she said to me one evening, when she had sent all the family out on similar errands. She had never called me so before, and I was half glad, half sorry to hear it now. Glad—if indeed I could be forever dear to her heart in the way in which she alone was dear to me; sorry, if the word was only prompted by sisterly tenderness for one who had so watched and tended her.

"No, Flora, I shall not leave you alone. Wait till Nannie comes back, and I will send her. See, she is coming now with a letter."

It was for Flora, and the well-known hand was upon it. How

I hated it! She blushed as usual in taking it, and hid it by. I left her to read it if she wished, but when I returned from the garden, from whence I brought her some fresh roses, the letter lay on her couch with the seal unbroken. I looked at her. She had grown paler and more shadowy since her injury; and when I had placed the little chaplet of rose-leaves around her brow, I fancied that she resembled that shape which my boyish fancy had sometimes pictured as belonging to me, or linked some way with my fortunes. I could not help telling her of it.

"Do you believe in fate, Hamilton?" she asked.

"I do."

"Why, then, do you not suffer it to come along as it listeth, and not give way to vain struggles in attempting to hasten its approach?"

What could she mean? Had she so truly guessed my state, that there was no need of my ever making any revelation of my feelings towards her, even if the time should appear to have arrived? She laid her hand upon the letter, the sight of which brought up all my wrath again. How was I ever to wait patiently for a fate which that handwriting could at any time turn into misery? O, Flora! Flora!

I leaned my head upon my hand, and looked resolutely away from her. My heart was growing hard towards her. At that moment she seemed born to be my evil destiny—she, so young, so beautiful, so much like the being I had hoped for as my good genius, my guardian angel, my shadow in the distance, brought near and enveloped in a robe of light that dazzled while it charmed me.

In turning around I caught a glimpse of her face, and saw that she was in tears. I was melted down at once. Flora, weeping, was a sight I could not well bear; and before I knew it—as I firmly believe, before either of us knew what we were about—we were weeping together on each other's shoulder, I kneeling by her couch.

"This is worse than folly," I said, as I started from that posture. "I will fool myself no longer. Flora Ballantyne, do you return the true love which you know now that I bear you, or are you bound to the writer of that letter? Speak one word—yes or no!"

She was frightened. She had never seen me vehement, or even roused before, and she could not well bear it now. She was weak, too, from suffering. She drooped under my passionate words, and seemed to be weeping again.

The door opened, and in came her uncle and aunt. They did not notice anything, and only excused their long absence—were sorry to have kept Hamilton in so long. I went out quickly, and saw her no more that night. The next morning at breakfast she was grave and silent. It was Sunday, and as Mrs. Atherton never had dinner cooked on that day, I proposed to her privately, that she should let Nannie go as usual, and I would stay with Flora.

"But how will they get along with the singing, dear?" said my simple old friend.

"O, well enough. Charlie Austin is in town to-day, and will be there. Let Nannie go; she has been quite confined lately."

"Ah, I see, you are lazy to-day, and want a nap in my husband's rocking-chair."

"Well, do let me have it." And she consented.

How vividly that glorious Sabbath morning comes back to me! The range of hills opposite our house, and seen only through a loophole which I had cut through the shrubbery, stood covered with trees, and forming almost a perfect amphitheatre; while below lay the broad basin of our beautiful lakelet, as we sometimes called the brook, when swollen by rain to an unusual size. As the belt of trees cut sharply against the clear blue of the sky, every branch seemed pencilled there by the hand of a mightier artist than man; while from the southwest were rising a few milk-white clouds, whose fleecy edges varied and beautified the scene.

The bell from the village church was calling the people to worship, and soon the last, lagging footstep had entered. I watched it all with my hand clasped in Flora's, and she returned the close pressure of mine. The letter lay there still, but now it was unseen. I dreaded to break the silence that lay about us.

"May I have faith in you, Flora?" I at length said. "May I believe, that whoever you loved when you came here, you have transferred it to me? Am I too presumptuous in hoping for this? Speak to me, Flora."

She could not, for she was now sobbing violently, but she did not withdraw her hand.

"If you will let me hope, Flora, clasp my hand still tighter."

She lingered but for a moment, and then pressed my hand in both hers. It was enough.

It was late in the evening before Flora had finished her tale. Some one kept breaking in and disturbing her. Uncle Atherton thought she would like to read his sermon, as she could not go to church, and aunt Atherton had brought her the compliments of half the congregation, and Nannie bustled in, thinking she was missed from her post of nurse, and the doctor made his special Sunday visit a long one.

But I could wait now. I could look at that letter, and admire Colonel Hector Macdonald's handwriting with perfect magnanimity. Out of her broken and detached relation, I learned that Colonel Macdonald was a great friend of the late Mr. Ballantyne; that in dying, he had told her of his friend's proposal to marry her; that he had claimed no actual promise from her, but had generously offered to wait her own time.

Within a fortnight she had written him, that the time could never come; and this letter, which she had so dreaded to open, was his reply. It was a noble renunciation of her affections, which he said he never had believed would be his; assured her of his continued friendship, and his sincere wishes for her welfare, and begged her to feel towards him and his family, as if no such thoughts or feelings had ever been.

"And why did you write the letter to which this is the answer? Answer me, Flora! I deserve this at least from your hands."

"Because already I had learned that my life must henceforth be passed with you, or alone."

I did not question her further that night. I bore Flora into the breakfast-room next morning in my arms, stoutly contested by uncle Atherton.

"My privilege, my dear sir," I said, "now and always."

"What is the boy talking of, Flora?" said he. "Too much study is turning Hamilton's brain; he must go away for awhile."

"Not until Flora gets well enough to go with me, sir. We shall then travel, I think."

"Flora must travel, Hamilton—she is a rich heiress, my boy. I have a letter from her father's bankers, and they say every penny of her property is restored, and they wish to see her, if possible."

Flora turned red and then pale.

"O, I am so glad!—so glad for you, Hamilton!"

It was all she could say; but her uncle and aunt caught up the key-note, and said:

"What is it to Hamilton?"

"A great deal," she answered, while her fine eyes glistened with the happiness of bestowing upon those we love. "I am going to marry Hamilton!"

"And I am so glad that I did not know of this fortune yesterday," said I.

We are to be married to-morrow, and on the very next day we start for Scotland, thence to the islands where Flora's property lies. I am very happy. My shadow—my destiny has assumed a distinct and beautiful shape. She looks at me with her clear, loving, trustful eyes, as if she had found with me peace and protection. Already she has blended and become inseparable from that which sometimes came between us.

We shall return; but it will be to establish ourselves permanently close to Longwood parsonage. As long as our venerable friends live, we will never give them the deep pain of parting from those whom they ever call their beloved children. The evening of their days shall be made serene and beautiful by our love; and when God calls them home, we will "keep their memories green."

THE USEFUL AND THE BEAUTIFUL.

The tomb of Moses is unknown, but the traveller shakes his thigh at the well of Jacob. The gorgeous palace of the wisest of monarchs, with the cedar, and gold, and ivory, and even the temple of Jerusalem, followed by the visible glory of the Deity himself, are gone; but Solomon's reservoirs are as perfect as ever. Of the ancient architecture of the holy city, not one stone is left upon another; but the pool of Bethesda commands the pilgrim's reverence to the present day. The columns of Persepolis are mouldering into dust; but its cisterns and aqueducts remain to challenge our admiration. The golden house of Nero is a mass of ruins; but the Aqua Claudia still pours into Rome its limpid stream. The Temple of the Sun at Tadmor in the wilderness has fallen; but its fountain sparkles as freely in his rays, as when thousands of worshippers thronged its holy colonnades.

It may be that London will share the fate of Babylon, and nothing be left to mark its site, save the mounds of crumbling brick-work; but the Thames will continue to flow as it does now. And if any work of art should still rise over the deep ocean of time, we may well believe that it will be neither palace nor temple, but some vast reservoir. And if the light of any should still flash through the mist of antiquity, it will probably be that of the man who, in his day, sought the happiness of his fellow men rather than glory, and linked his memory to some great work of national utility and benevolence. This is the glory which outlives all other, and shines with undying lustre from generation to generation, imparting to its work something of its own immortality, and in some degree rescuing therefrom the ordinary monuments of historical tradition of more magnificence.—Buffalo Christian Advocate.

IMPORTANCE OF THE TELEGRAPH.

There should be a telegraph line constructed along the route of every railroad. Its usefulness, as an indication of the position of trains, and of the occurrence of accidents, would be sufficient in most cases to compensate for its cost. On New Year's day, 1850, a catastrophe was averted on one of the London railroads by the aid of the telegraph. A collision had occurred to an empty train at Gravesend, and the driver having leaped from his engine, the latter started at full speed to London. Notice was given by telegraph to London and other stations; and, while the line was kept clear, an engine and other arrangements were prepared as a buttress to receive the runaway. The superintendent of the railroad also started down the line on an engine, and, on passing the runaway, had it transferred at the next crossing to the up line, so as to be in the rear of the fugitive. He then started in chase, and on overtaking the other, ran into it at full speed, and the driver of his engine took possession of the fugitive, and all danger was at end. Twelve stations were passed in safety; it passed Woolwich at fifteen miles an hour. It was within a couple of miles of London before it was arrested. And its approach been unknown, the mere money value of the damage it would have caused might have equalled the cost of the whole line of telegraph.—Liverpool Mercury.

SHADE TREES.

The maple is one of the best shade trees for city growth. It is not affected a particle by the extremes of heat and cold. It forms a beautiful head, with clean, glossy foliage, smooth bark, is free from all insects, and has a rapid growth. In five years, in a good soil, it makes a fine, symmetrical head, with gracefully sweeping branches, and affords a dense shade. The American tulip-tree is also very choice. Its great elegance of habit, and striking beauty of leaf and blossom, recommend it to any one who has an eye to the proportions. It requires a deep soil, with plenty of room to expand freely on all sides. It will not bear removing when large; but small trees grow rapidly when transplanted into a deep soil.—N. E. Farmer.

A SCOTTISH JUDGE.

Another original of the Scottish bench was George Ferguson, Lord Hermand, a personage still remembered in Edinburgh. He was an able lawyer and a worthy man. Two young gentlemen, friends, went together to the theatre in Glasgow, supped at the lodgings of one of them, and passed a whole summer night over their punch. In the morning a kindly wrangle broke out on their separating or not separating, when by some rashness, if not accident, one of them was stabbed, not violently, but in so vital a part that he died on the spot. The survivor was tried at Edinburgh, and was convicted of culpable homicide. It was one of the sad cases where the legal guilt was greater than the moral; and, very properly, he was sentenced only to a short imprisonment. Hermand, who felt that discredit had been brought on the cause of drinking, had no sympathy with the tenderness of his temperate brethren, and was vehement for transportation. "We are told that there was no matter, and that the prisoner must have been in liquor! In liquor! Why, he was drunk! And yet he murdered the very man who had been drinking with him! They had been carousing the whole night; and yet he stabbed him! After drinking a whole bottle of rum with him! Good God! my lands, if he will do this when he's drunk, what will he do when he's sober!"

His love of children was warm-hearted and unaffected. He always treated them seriously, exactly as if they were grown up. Few old men's speeches are more amiable than his, about his grand-nephew who happened to be his partner in a match at bowls: "No wonder that that little fellow and I are such friends—there are just seventy years between us." He was eighty, the boy ten. But when a boy happened to be a sailor he was irresistible. A little English midshipman, being violently attacked by a much bigger lad in Greenock, defended himself with his dirk, and by an unfortunate, if not accidental, thrust killed the assailant. He was tried for this at Glasgow, and had the good luck to have Hermand for his judge, for no judge ever fought a more gallant battle for a prisoner. The boy appeared at the bar in his uniform. Hermand first refused "to try a child." After this was driven out of him, the indictment, which described the occurrence and said that the prisoner had slain the deceased "wickedly and feloniously," was read; and Hermand then said, "Well, my young friend, this is not true, is it? Are you guilty or not guilty?" "Not guilty, my lord." "I'll be sworn you're not." In spite of all his exertions, his young friend was convicted of culpable homicide; for which he was sentenced to a few days' imprisonment.—Lord Cockburn's Memorial.

HOW TO COMMENCE BUSINESS.

One of the wealthiest merchants of New York city tells us how he commenced business. He entered a store and asked if a clerk was not wanted.

"No!" in a rough tone, was the answer, all being too busy to bother with me; when I reflected that if they did not want a clerk they might want a laborer, but I was dressed too fine for that. I went to my lodgings, put on a rough garb, and the next day went into the same store, and demanded if they did not want a porter, and again—

"No, sir!" was the response, when I exclaimed in despair almost, "A laborer, sir! I will work at any wages. Wages is not my object; I must have employment, and I want to be useful in business."

This last remark attracted their attention; and in the end I was hired as a laborer in the basement and sub-cellar at a very low pay, scarcely enough to keep body and soul together. In the basement and sub-cellar I soon attracted the attention of the counting-house and chief clerk. I saved enough for my employers in little things wasted to pay my wages ten times over, and they soon found it out. I did not let anybody about commit petty larcenies without remonstrance, and threats of exposure if remonstrance would not do. I did not ask for any ten-hour law. If I was wanted at three A. M., I never growled, but told everybody to go home, "and I would see everything right." I loaded off at day-break packages for the morning boats, or carried them myself. In short, I soon became indispensable to my employers, and rose, and rose, until I became head of the house, with money enough, as you see, to give me any luxury or any position a mercantile man can desire for himself and children in this great city.—Merchants' Magazine.

GRIZZLY BEARS.

Californians tell a great many wonderful stories about the prowess and ferocity of the grizzly bear; and all agree that, as a general thing, a bear is a very unpleasant stranger for a man to encounter in a lonely place. The best chance of escape, in such a case, is for a man to lay prostrate upon his face and pretend death; for the bear will never prey upon a body which he has not killed himself, unless upon the verge of starvation. An American miner while prospecting in the mining regions, beheld one of these shaggy monsters approaching him down a mountain path. Finding that the animal was close at hand, and an attempt to fly being useless, he suddenly dropped upon all fours, and boldly advanced towards the bear. As soon as the two met, they put their noses together dog fashion, and finally went through all the formality of strange dogs meeting each other, not omitting the most minute ceremony, till master Bruin, being satisfied with the civilities of his new acquaintance, made him a very affectionate adieu, at a neighboring tree, and marched off.—N. Y. Atlas.

HON. OTIS P. LORD.

The accompanying portrait, drawn expressly for us by Hill, from a photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case, of this city, presents an accurate likeness of the original, who is so widely known as a public man in Massachusetts, and who has so wide a circle of acquaintances in this city and in Salem. Mr. Lord was born at Ipswich, Mass., July 11, 1812. After the usual preparatory course of study, he entered Amherst College, where he distinguished himself as an industrious student and a young man of great ability and promise, graduating with honor in 1832. Having selected the law as a profession, he entered the law school, and after a full course of study, graduated in 1836. He soon after commenced practice, and is now one of the most eminent lawyers in Essex county. Politics engaging his attention, he soon rose to a prominent position in the ranks of the Whig party, and for a series of years was a prominent and active member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, and in the year 1854 was chosen to preside over that body. Possessing the requisite promptness, self-possession, fairness, and a thorough acquaintance with parliamentary usage, he discharged his duties as a presiding officer to the entire acceptance of the members. Mr. Lord is a very able and fluent debater, and is a pleasing and convincing popular speaker. He is not one of those orators who conceal a lack of minute information by rhetorical flourishes. He always speaks to the point, never indulging in episodic remarks for the purpose of consuming time, or displaying the graces of oratory. Mr. Lord has always been regarded as a sound and reliable man, pursuing the even tenor of his way, never shaken in his adherence to his principles and convictions. His ability is uncontested, and though still comparatively a young man, he has earned an honorable and enviable name in our community.

COAL PIT ON THE GRAVOIS ROAD,

NEAR ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

The accompanying engraving is from a drawing made expressly for us by Mr. Killburn, during his recent pictorial tour through the Western States. The coal pit, delineated with its characteristic apparatus and figures, is situated upon the Gravois road, about five and a half miles from the city of St. Louis, and was selected by our artist on account of the picturesqueness and attractiveness of the locality. The scene is depicted with the fidelity of the daguerreotype, and may be relied upon as correct in its minutest features and details. The coal is found near the surface, and the veins are followed horizontally under ground. The expense of the coal being very slight, owing to its location and the low cost of the material employed by the miners, it is afforded at ten cents a bushel at the pits. The State of Missouri abounds in coal. In the centre and on both sides of the Mississippi, is a remarkable deposit of cannel coal, the extent of which is yet unknown. The stratum is from thirty to seventy feet in thickness and underlies several counties. In addition to this great central deposit of "Cannel Coal," Missouri is furnished in the southwest with another coal field which is known to be very extensive, but the capacity of which has never yet been ascertained. The mineral wealth of the western country is inexhaustible, and this, taken in connection with the fertility of the soil and the inestimable facilities of navigation, accounts for its extraordinary progress—a progress which no one can appreciate who has not travelled extensively in this wondrous region, studied for himself the bounties which Providence has lavished on it, and marked the energetic spirit, which within a few years has converted a wilderness into the abode of comfort, of civilization and refinement. Elsewhere the growth of empire is slow and imperceptible, but here the process is visible and appreciable. It goes on before your eyes. You mark the disappearance of the forest, the conversion of the wild prairie into cornfields, the magical celerity with which villages, towns and cities spring up. It is impossible, however, to measure the future of this country. The imagination halts in the effort to picture the future splendor and power of the West.

ANGLO-FRENCH TUNNEL.

The project of constructing a railroad tunnel beneath the Straits of Dover, with a view to unite the shores of England and France, has occupied much attention lately, and a number of plans have been laid before the public through the columns of the newspapers. The plan, however, which seems to attract the greatest share of attention from scientific men, is that which has been matured by Mr. William Austin. He proposes to construct a tunnel having a triple way of three arches, oval in form, and securely locked together by inseparable and indestructible masonry, impervious to moisture; and for such unavoidable leakages as will occasionally occur, three culverts are to be provided to carry the water to either shore, where powerful lift pumps will convey it to the sea. The fall is to be from the centre towards each shore, and it is calculated that the crown of the tunnel will have a thickness of chalk of sixty feet between it and the ocean bed at the deepest point, which does not exceed one hundred and forty feet below the tidal level, as proved by soundings. There will be three double lines of railways, which will be ample for all purposes. Sufficient space is afforded for the necessary pathways, and the telegraph wires will be laid in the centre, on a new principle of economy and ready access. The tunnel, by its length, will thoroughly ventilate itself, but, should it prove necessary, three or four, or more, air shafts can be readily constructed, the upper portions forming light-houses or places of refuge in case of shipwreck, or to be used for the purpose of signalling vessels which may be in the channel. The cost of this truly gigantic enterprise is estimated at £6,000,000, and the time for its construction seven years.—Portfolio.

GRAND CAIRO—HALIM PASHA'S GARDENS.

We visited the gardens of the harem of Halim Pasha, brother of Said Pasha, governor of Cairo—a ride of three miles from Cairo—through an avenue of sycamores forming a delightful arcade all the way. We entered, and a scene of cultivated grandeur burst upon our sight, and the odor of the orange-blossom scented the passing zephyrs, while trees laden with ripe lemons, apricots, oranges and nectarines glittered in the sun. Having with us a dragoman in his Eastern livery as a cicerone, he led us to a fine pavilion, where we enjoyed awhile the cooling breeze before we proceeded along the countless walks of this paradise, which contains eighty acres. All was beauty and enchantment. The shadowy walks, clustering trees, varied flowers and the delicious shrubberies thickened as we approached, and the birds above sang anthems to their praise. Pavilion after pavilion arose, furnished in most superb style, with windows stained in every hue and design, draped with ample curtains and painted blinds in all the excellence of high art. The walks are generally composed of pebbles stuck artistically in cement, decorated with designs in white and black, and feel most comfortable to the feet and grateful to the eye; and in looking over their rich green borders, the earth was strewn with fallen fruit, as we see in orchards at home in autumn, but of a very different kind; and occasionally heaps of lemons gathered together similar to the manner we gather potatoes into bins. There is no necessity here for conservatories, the whole extensive parterre being a hot-house of itself! In the centres of the converging avenues are fountains and water-spouts with pavilions around, while other walks lead to terraces of great height, reached by capacious stairs, with openings in the balustrades for landing on each terrace, where streams of water flow for coolness and irrigation, and on the margins of which grow the rarest flowers and fruit trees. We now come to an extensive quadrangular building, the outside of which scarcely gives an idea of the grandeur within; ascending a flight of marble stairs, a massive gate is opened, and an enchanted palace bursts upon the eye! This marvellously grand edifice is called the "Fountain," and all the peerless beauty of the East seems concentrated here. The centre is open to the sunlit sky, with a marble promenade all round the sides, 300 feet in length and about 50 in breadth, covered with a highly ornamented verandah supported on 200 Italian carved marble pillars of twenty feet high, each formed of one stone. Great marble bowers, surrounded with solid marble borders, are laid out like drawing-rooms, one in each centre of a quadrangle, furnished with divans and ottomans of the most sumptuous order, and in the rarest styles of foreign design. Inside of this vast edifice, and open to the sun, is a lake with a great centre, double-balustraded and decorated with vases full of flowers, where, with little skiffs you may row over and pace the extensive floor of this artificial island, so elegant in structure—while all around the canopied promenade, windows unglazed, but grated with fanciful bars resembling panes, let in the balmy air that wafts in gentleness the garden odors around you! In each corner, circled off, are also suites of rooms which the keepers open to show you. The first we entered dazzled our eyes and excited our imagination, for the perfection, the grandeur, the wealth, the art in all departments almost exceeded belief; and as we proceeded to the other three, our amazement still increased. It is said the decorative art of window staining is lost, but here the flattest contradiction is given by ocular demonstration. The richness of the colors, the chasteness of combination, the designs and workmanship, are as much alive, and even more resplendent than in the mediæval times. The blinds, also, are in color and design equal to the finest paintings. Words cannot fully express what the eye perceives in such elaborated repositories of wealth, art and magnificence. Those beautiful gardens and palaces are for the summer enjoyment of Halim Pasha and the ladies of the seraglio, who generally frequent them on the Fridays, when the gates of this truly magnificent realization of Oriental splendor and luxury are closed to travellers and the public.—Glasgow Citizen.

THE STEAMSHIP ARABIA.

People have not yet done talking about the accident to the steamship Arabia, last month, which came very near adding another to the long list of ocean tragedies that have filled so many hearts with mourning. When running at full speed, the steamship struck upon the same rock on which the Staffordshire was wrecked. It is charged by a nautical man on board that proper precautions had not been taken, and that the lead had not once been used on the passage from Boston until the accident occurred. The shock of the vessel, her recoil, her wild rush over the rock with the loss of her keel, of course created the greatest panic on board. It was a time when the officers should have shown the utmost forbearance and kindness to the alarmed passengers who crowded on deck, many of whom were ladies. But it is charged that the officers refused to reply to the questions asked by those who were quaking for their lives, and that they were treated to a full dose of bulldog British insolence. It is charged, also, that when the ship arrived at Halifax, and it was determined to send her to England in spite of her leaking badly, the passengers, after the survey, were allowed only one hour to decide whether they would land or stay by the ship, and that no facilities were afforded those who chose the former alternative for getting out their luggage. We say nothing of the rashness of despatching the vessel to Liverpool in her leaky condition, merely remarking that such an act on the part of American shipowners would have been held up abroad as a proof of the criminal recklessness of American navigators; but this is not the question—it is whether British officials are to be upheld in insolent treatment and neglect of American passengers committed to their charge. If such conduct is sanctioned, then, as a matter of course, no Americans will sail under any flag but their own. The establishment of an American steam line between Boston and England has been projected, and the affair of the Arabia will no doubt hasten its consummation.

AN OUTRAGE ON THE FACULTY.—When a Turkish M. D., from want of skill or negligence, causes the death of a patient, he is compelled to parade the streets, carrying a wooden frame round his neck, to which are attached a number of bells. If this atrocious punishment were inflicted on all the quacks in America, a man could not hear himself speak for the ringing of the bells.

PEA SHELL SOUP.—In France, they make excellent soup out of pea shells. If we imitated our Gallic neighbors, we could live quite economically with pea shell soup, frogs and horsesteaks. They already send us champagne made out of honey, and olive oil manufactured from lard.

REMOVAL.—We have removed our office of publication to No. 22 Winter Street, in the large building especially erected for our business, and where we shall be happy to meet our patrons.

OLD AND NEW TIMES.

There are writers in every age who praise the past at the expense of the present, who talk about the "good old times" and ignore the glory that actually surrounds them. But these writers are successively convicted of error. The manners of an age, blamed by contemporary writers, are quoted as models by writers of the following century, and thus from epoch to epoch, the manners of the same period are by turns lauded and condemned. A familiar acquaintance with history shows a constant progression of the human race, with certain comparatively insignificant periods of gloom and stagnation. The great river of human life has its eddies and turns, but the stream widens and deepens, and grows stronger as it advances to the great ocean of eternity.

If there were any foundation for the eloquent declarations we have read in favor of the past and against the present, it would follow that there exists in the world a progression of evil. "If this were true," says Montesquieu, "men would be now worse than bears."

An author of the 16th century says:—"Is it not apparent that if the world were always growing worse, and fathers in general were always better than their children, we should long since have reached a climax of evil which could not be heightened! Six hundred years ago, a certain cardinal, convinced of this alleged progression of evil and continual degradation of the human species, concluded that the number of our teeth was diminishing. So, according to the cardinal's propositions and deductions, we should all of us be toothless at this present moment."

A quaint old French writer (Guyot de Provins), embracing the same opinion, declared that a fatal change was going on; that men, formerly tall and handsome, had become small and mean, and that the human race would go on dwindling, until the time would come when the peasants could easily thresh grain in an oven, and "four knights fight in an iron pot."

"This false opinion," says an eminent writer, "this respect for the past and this contempt for the present, are the fruits of our education. Fathers, regretting the keen enjoyments of their youth, are constantly vaunting the days in which they could experience them, and blame those in which they have ceased to feel; moreover, to command the esteem and respect of their children, they take good care to appear better in their eyes than they really are. The children, detecting afterwards vices in society, seem to see them growing with their growth, and take the progress of their experience for the progress of evil. Their teachers, equally mistaken, fortify the mind of youth in these views by their discourses. Thus an error is established which can only be eradicated by a study of the past—a study repugnant to most men, who find it easier to believe a falsehood than to painfully labor in searching for a truth."

THE CHARTER OAK.

This famous tree, in which the royal charter of Connecticut was concealed, May 9, 1689, and which was blown down on the morning of the 21st of August last, was probably an "old settler" at the time of Columbus's discovery of America. It stood upon the old Wyllis estate at Hartford, now owned by Hon. J. W. Stuart. The history of this venerable monarch of the forest is briefly as follows:—In 1685, when New Haven was a separate colony, she refused to give in her adhesion to the charter from Charles II., consolidating the Connecticut colonies into one government. So, in 1687, James II. sent over Sir Edmund Andros to resume the charter of the several colonies. The Hartford Assembly was in session on his arrival, and while the subject was under consideration, the lights were suddenly extinguished, and the charter secretly conveyed away and concealed in the cavity of an old oak. Since that day, this tree has been called the "Charter Oak." After the deposition of Andros, the charter was resumed, and continued in force till 1818, when the present constitution of Connecticut was adopted.

NEWPORT.—Though the past season has been gay at this watering-place, yet all agree that its splendors paled in comparison to those of previous years. Belles abounded, but beaux were sadly deficient—particularly dancing ones. A word to the wise is sufficient, and we dare say that next year Newport will be flooded with dancing cavaliers.

THE SYDENHAM PALACE.—The Sydenham Crystal Palace, England, is a marvel of taste. In architecture, in fountains, in curiosities, it surpasses everything else in the world. It is a monumental museum—a universal conservatory. The result of a private enterprise, it has already cost thirty millions.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT.—We are indebted to our friend and correspondent, W. R. Lawrence, for the "Transactions of the Connecticut State Agricultural Society for 1855," and for other documents of interest, as well as for a bunch of leaves from the old Charter Oak, now alas! laid low.

GREECE.—For the twentieth time, at least, it has been officially announced that the brigands of Greece have been exterminated, and the very last rascal expiated his offences against life and property by death. Unfortunately, these Greek brigands, like the fabled Phoenix, are born anew from their own ashes.

A SIMPLE RULE.—To ascertain the length of the day and night, any time of the year, double the time of the sun's rising, which gives the length of the night, and double the time of setting, which gives the length of the day.

HONEST.—When Crockford, who kept a gaming house in London, was charged by an old man with ruining his only son, he answered:—"I know it! I ruin a man a-day. I live by it."

ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

One of the cleverest hits at the times was lately given in one of Punch's caricatures. France, allegorized as a jaunty dandy, was coining a bouquet into the button-hole of England, figured as a starchy gentleman in top-boots. John Bull looks confused, and says:—"Well, Madame France, as to this treaty of peace, I don't exactly understand—" "You no onnerstan," replies France. "O, no maitaire; come viz me and see ze fireworks." Well, the fireworks have gone off, and the cannon have thundered, and now the smoke has cleared away, our friend, John Bull, is beginning to "onnerstan" that he has wool pulled over his eyes—a terrible indignity. The English press now makes admissions of facts which we were charged with unkindness in hinting some weeks ago. To show that the correctness of our views is admitted by our English friends, we copy the following from a late number of that widely circulated journal, the "Illustrated London News." It is not an expression of individual opinion. "We, for our part, shall not cease to lament the indecent haste and slavish obsequiousness with which our statesmen and diplomatists lent themselves to the foregone conclusions of the emperor of the French, and agreed to a peace that settled nothing, that left everything to chance, and that made Russia and France the virtual masters of Europe. This country is rapidly drifting into a second-rate position. Our ambassadors have no influence abroad. England is no longer the first to be feared—the first to be thought of—the first to be consulted in emergency. The Emperor Napoleon is the master. What he wills is done. What he thinks is earnestly inquired; and English diplomatists take their cue from those of France, and sedulously refrain from saying or doing (whatever they may think) anything that can in the remotest degree awaken the jealous susceptibilities, or offend the dignity of the all-potent autocrat of the French. They 'crawl under his huge legs,' and treat him with such obsequious deference, that he may not unjustly flatter himself with the idea that he is a greater man than his illustrious uncle. England never placed herself in the humiliating position of acknowledging the superior might of the first Napoleon. Napoleon III. has achieved what his predecessor would have given his right hand to have accomplished. He has made free England not only his ally, but his tool. He has gained all the honors of the victory, and left us with nothing but the bills, the wounds, the losses, and the discredit."

FANCY DRESSES.—A young man, lately arrested in New York in female apparel, gave as his reason for the travesty, that he found it easier for a female to obtain employment than a man. A young woman at the West lately was induced to put on a male attire, because, she said, she could thus more readily obtain a situation. Such is the difference of opinion.

TOWN AND COUNTRY.

BY JOHN THORNHERRY.

"HERE we are, then!" said Mr. Newman to his family, as the stage-coach brought them in view of his brother's country-house, the old homestead of his youth. "Now this begins to look like it. This does me good. I'd rather come out here for a week or two, than go to all the watering-places in the land."

The two girls—Elmira and Josephine—thrust a head apiece out of each window, uttered an exclamation of disappointment, and drew their heads in again. Mrs. Newman curled her lip, elevated her nose, and resolved that nothing of this kind should "stand between the wind and her nobility."

They had had a long jaunt of a day from town, by rail and by coach, and on the whole were glad to find the end of their journey anywhere. At his brother's house Mr. Newman was certain of finding both rest and welcome. He was tired of the world. No spot that he could think of was half as pleasant as the place where he passed the innocent days of his childhood. There he could throw off care and anxiety, and revel in the freshness of new days.

"O, brother! O, sister!" exclaimed the farmer's wife, as she accosted them at the gate. "How glad we are to see you all out at the old place again! Children, welcome home here! Do pray come in, all of you! I'll send for Henry at once, for I knew he didn't expect you to-day, and he's off in the field, getting in hay."

They all bundled in across the deep porch, and collected in the large living-room. There they were met by Mr. Henry Newman's three girls, two of them about the same ages with Elmira and Josephine. Mrs. Newman assisted them in taking off their bonnets and travelling toggery, and the girls showed their cousins to their chamber.

In less than half an hour, all hands were assembled again; Mrs. Newman and one of the girls were getting supper on the table, however, and the two brothers were chatting as pleasantly as if the outside world had never crowded itself between their hearts. Mrs. City Newman, however, said little or nothing. Occasionally one or both of her daughters glanced round at her, to catch the right cue, and then fell to their silent criticisms again upon what was going on before them. The simplicity of the furniture, the earnest and honest manners of their country cousins, the style of the table, and the like of these things, were the chief objects of their attention, and instead of making the most of their privileges, they tried to feel as uncomfortable as they could, by contrasting this simple country life with their own way of life at home. If people want to make themselves uneasy, there is no better way than this that one could recommend.

When supper was ready at last, Mrs. Henry Newman (the farmer's wife) smoothed out her apron, and asked them all if they wouldn't sit up to the table.

"Do you sit there, sister," said she to Mrs. James Newman, "and you there," to Mr. Newman. The two girls she seated on one side by themselves, and her own found places all about.

To enumerate the several dishes with which the table was garnished, would occupy more space than I have allowed myself. But it was a right down country feast, at any rate. It was dinner and supper stirred together; and no thrifty housekeeper understood that trick one half as well as Mrs. Henry Newman.

Elmira and Josephine did not wish to be thought hearty eaters, though in truth they were as hungry as bears. So they just nibbled at the ham, and dallied with their rich cream-toast, and sipped their tea like any ladies. They wanted to enjoy as much as any one; but their pride would not tell them where to begin. Mrs. Newman ate, because it was her way. She needed food. She had an appetite. She had ridden a great ways, and was really tired; and being tired, was hungry too. So she made everything taste good; and felt thankful in her heart that there was a plenty. As for Farmer Newman and his brother, the city merchant, they were enjoying themselves as highly as two men ever did. Farming was now the topic of their talk, and now merchandize. Mr. James, however, delighted chiefly to talk about the grass crop and cattle.

After supper, they scattered in all directions. The girls helped about clearing off the table, while their mother sat down to entertain Mrs. James by the open window. As for Josephine and Elmira, they walked out by themselves. The brothers finally found themselves beneath a famous old pear tree in the back orchard, that they had known in their earliest youth. Mr. James stood and smoked his fragrant Havana, while the farmer threw himself at his length upon the ground.

"O, this is a beautiful old spot, Henry!" at last burst forth from the merchant's lips. "I sometimes wish I had never left it, but had let you try the world. As it is, you have shown the best evidences of filial affection; you have taken care of our parents in their old age; this old homestead has been a mine of wealth and happiness to you and your family; and here you are, anchored safe from all the tempests of the world. I know what a peaceful life yours must have been; and it is on that account I envy you."

"Then why not give up business at once, and live as we live?"

"Ah, but there's the rub! Once in, is in for your lifetime. There's no getting out of it."

"But you can end it, if you choose. What is easier? You are worth enough to-day. You are rich. What more do you want? To get still richer? I wish I was in your shoes."

"From my heart, I wish you were."

"At all events, I would show the world that I preserved independence enough to quit business when I'd got money enough."

"Ah! but you wouldn't be likely to feel then just as you feel now. If you were in my shoes, you would feel about as I feel; and this is the way I feel. When I make up to a certain mark in business, I mean to leave off and retire to some pleasant spot like this. That mark I haven't quite reached yet."

"Now let me ask you one single question," returned Farmer Henry. "Didn't you, years ago, say exactly the same thing to yourself?"

"Well, I did," replied Mr. James.

"And didn't you then set your mark lower than you have set it now?"

He hesitated. Finally he answered, "Well, yes. I confess I did." "And now," pursued the farmer, "just as sure as you reach your present mark, just so sure you'll be as dissatisfied as before. I know enough about the ways of human nature. If you don't stop where you are, you'll never stop at all."

Mr. James thought a moment or two about it, and puffed thicker clouds of smoke. Finally he said: "Well, I'm inclined to think you're more than half right, though I really wouldn't say as much to anybody else, I can tell you. There's something about this accumulating business that plays the mischief with every one of us."

"I know it," said Henry. "When men become engrossed in this business of getting gains, they are slaves. And now you may just as well stop to-day, as to wait to do it to-morrow. Why not? You know what you have looked forward to all your life, and that is just what I have been all my life enjoying. Happiness is not to be had in the goading hurry for wealth. You must change your intentions. You must cease looking without, and begin to turn within."

"We can all talk about these things, I suppose," rejoined Mr. James; "we can theorize and speculate, but when one comes to the pinch, I tell you it's not exactly the same thing. We are the creatures of circumstances, I believe; of destiny, in other words. Where we shall bring up at last, Heaven alone knows."

And upon this, he fell into a short ramination, which he soon came out of, with a dreamy remark or two about the delights of country life. His farmer brother assented to what he said, and seemed to try to help him along toward his conclusions.

"I always meant to find me a quiet spot somewhere at last," said the merchant, "and I mean to still. There's nothing in life to me half so pleasant as the thought of a home, and a last resting-place in the country. And if my heart is drawn to any one place, it is to this place of my birth."

"I will divide the old farm with you," eagerly offered the farmer. "Come; do leave off in the city, and settle down again where we began life together. What's the use of putting it off?"

"I'll think of it, at any rate," said Mr. James. "I'm really more strongly inclined towards it than I ever was before. But I must take time to turn it over. I must go back and consult with my old friends, and look up some of my interests in business, you know."

The farmer's heart sunk. "Then," said he to himself, "the case is a bad one. He'll not make up his mind at all."

They left the precincts of the old pear tree long after twilight, and found the two families sitting in the door, enjoying the evening air. That one sight almost determined the merchant's resolution, at once, but he could not thus quickly yield.

Next morning, all awoke bright and early. The country cousins had rosy cheeks and expressive eyes. Their city cousins looked as if one night's sleep out there having done so much for them, there was no telling how much a week of nights might do.

After breakfast was over and the things cleared away, Mrs. Farmer Newman went about her butter in the little dairy. She asked her sister and the girls if they wouldn't like to look in on her. There she stood at the dresser under the window, kneading out the buttermilk from a great wooden tray full of yellow butter, the generous churning of the morning. Her sleeves were stripped up, and she wore a tidy apron about her.

"How awful that kind of work must be!" exclaimed her city sister. "I declare, I should get so tired of it, I shouldn't know how to follow it up."

The two daughters obediently curled up their lips, and skipped off out of doors.

"I don't know," responded Mrs. Henry, when she found herself quite alone with Mrs. James, "I sometimes think I'd rather do this than do a great many other things. But then," she added, with a glow of earnestness, "to think that you are making your own butter! That's a privilege every one don't have, in these times."

"Farm labor must be the coarsest kind of drudgery," said Mrs. James. "How can you bring yourself to it?"

"Well, I don't know. Nothing is drudgery, unless you choose to make it so. It all depends on how you take hold of a thing. After all, there isn't so much difference between one sort of work and another. It's all about alike."

"But I should get tired of this everlasting sameness all around me," added Mrs. James. "I don't believe I could ever get used to it. Perhaps I could put up with it for a week or two in the summer; but to think of staying here all through the winter! How terrible dreary it must be!"

"As for that, I can only say again—it's all in habit. For my part, though I should like a visit once or twice a year to town, yet I don't think I should ever reconcile myself to living there. And as for the winters, why, you don't know what they are! You must live out in the country, as we do, to appreciate them. Here they are beautiful. I think quite as much of them as I do of my summers."

And thus the conversation was carried on.

Out doors, Elmira and Josephine had fallen upon their cousin Kate, with whom they began an animated discussion about the same topics, though perhaps in a slightly modified way. Among other things, Josephine declared that country people were just the coarsest, greenest people in the world. Her cousin Kate was shrewd enough to keep her temper under such speeches, and merely smiled their effect away.

"I should die here, among such bores," said Josephine. "And if I'd got to stay, I'm sure I should wish to."

"I should die," added Elmira, "with the very thought of it."

"How do you manage to pass your time?" asked Josephine.

"What do you do all day? Do you ever go out evenings?"

"O yes, sometimes," good-naturedly answered Kate. "We some of us pick up a bean, now and then, you know."

"Beaux! La! What horrid creatures they must be! Cow-hide boots and satinet, I suppose? As much manners as oxen? How I should like to set eyes on one of them!"

"O, well; then we will invite some three or four of them over, some afternoon, if you say so. You can tell your friends then, you know, that you have seen and talked with the real specimens."

"O, no; I beg you wouldn't get any of them here on my account," said Josephine.

"No, nor on mine," chimed in Elmira.

"Or you may see them at church, perhaps, on Sunday. I will point them out to you, as they come in to meeting."

"What curious creatures they must be! But don't you miss society here? parties, and soirees, and assemblies, and all those things? Don't you wish you were nearer folks? or ever feel dreadful dismal and lonesome, out here in the fields so? I should think you would, I'm sure. I should think you'd die in a week, only for want of seeing somebody that's civilized. Just to think of living out of the world so! Why, it's abominable. I don't see how anybody can possibly stand it!"

"O," laughed out her more philosophic and sensible cousin Kate, "we all manage to get used to these things. After a while, you know, they cease to trouble us. I suppose, to tell the truth, that they would come hard to you at first; but we have the decided advantage of being born and brought up among them. I suppose we hardly know what we lose here."

"No, you don't indeed," responded Josephine, with characteristic courtesy and curtness.

"Still," added Kate, "I never would change situations with you."

The city cousins gazed at her with a look of surprise that bordered closely on contempt.

And in this way was the discussion carried on between the daughters; the mothers still engaged in it, in the dairy and kitchen.

As for the brothers, they were both haying as hard as they could, down in the meadow back of the barn. It was a warm day, a great deal of grass had been cut early in the morning, and they were making out a merry time of it. It carried them back to their youthful days, to be working thus together again. They tossed, and pitched, and talked, and laughed. They sat down to their luncheon beneath the same old trees that had sheltered them when boys, and went over the old times once more in the shade. It was sad, and yet it was dearly delightful to the heart of the city merchant, thus to throw off restraint, and give himself up to the innocent enjoyment of the hour. Fifteen minutes careless tossing and rolling on the grass was sweeter to him than as many days passed in the society of idlers at the crowded hotels by the seashore. He felt the blessing descending even while he lay there.

Supper was a welcome repast. It found them all tired and hungry. Never were known better appetites, nor more wholesome and inviting food. Even the girls had forgotten that they were satisfying themselves at the table of a plain country farm-house.

They all sat in the little parlor and entry, and twilight was already gathering, when a boy came in with the mail from the post-office. There was a letter for Mr. James Newman. He took it and hastily broke the seal. It was glanced over almost in an instant, when he let it fall from his hands, exclaiming, "Ruined! ruined! I might have known as much!"

His face was colorless. His wife sprang towards him with a shriek, and began to ask him what it all meant. It was some time before he could collect courage to tell the story. Finally said he:

"I have lost all! My ship has gone to the bottom, and not ten dollars worth of insurance on her! I haven't enough left to count on my ten fingers!"

All manner of exclamations followed so unexpected an announcement. His wife couldn't believe it—wouldn't believe it. The girls sat demure and astonished. The farmer's wife and daughters were sympathizing and sad, while only Mr. Henry himself dared offer consolation of any nature.

"Does this strip you of all?" at last inquired he. "Haven't you a dollar?"

"Yes," said his brother; "perhaps fifteen or twenty thousand."

"Then you are rich enough! Now just hold on right where you are. You know what we were talking about last evening; now is the time to take your resolution. You've got enough; you needn't ask any more. I'm ready to divide the old place with you to-day. Come; the hand of a kind Providence is in this. Promise me to take that resolution to-night, and my word for it, you will never regret it as long as your life is spared you."

"It is taken!" answered the merchant. "I could choose no better time. From this day, wife, I am no longer a dweller in cities! I come out and live on the farms! It may cost us a pang at first, but we shall be all the happier for it in the end."

In three months a house was in process of erection near the old homestead; and in less than three years, Miss Josephine was engaged to be married to one of the "horrid country beaux," with big feet and hands.

Mrs. James Newman, moreover, makes her own butter, and it is good butter too. And among them all, there is no more lamentation over the day that changed their fortunes so much for the better. They are content.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

The number of arrivals at the several hotels in Saratoga, from the 23d of June to the 23d of August, was 17,658. — The cornerstone of a Free Public Library was laid recently at New Bedford, with considerable ceremony, in presence of a large concourse of the citizens. It was laid by the mayor, who made a short and appropriate address. — Advice from Sydney, Australia, May 20, mention extensive gold discoveries in the western part of Australia. — There is a family of four persons living in Suffield, Connecticut, who bear the following relations to each other—husband and wife, son and daughter, father and mother, brother and sister, uncle and aunt, nephew and niece, and first and second cousins. — At St. Louis, lately, two young ladies were burnt to death, in consequence of carelessness in filling a lamp with burning fluid. — The people of St. Paul, Minnesota, held a public meeting recently, with a view to the adoption of summary measures for the extirpation of the gamblers, cut-throats and thieves who infest that city. — It is anticipated that an invitation will be given to Mr. Collins to visit Boston in his new steamship, the Adriatic, in October, by the merchants of this city, and that he will accept the compliment. — A female physician in Philadelphia advertises that it is her particular speciality to cure all affections of the heart. — William Sprague, of Rhode Island, has purchased a valuable water power and a large tract of land on the Shetucket River, in the town of Lisbon, Ct., some ten or twelve miles from Willimantic, and is putting up a cotton factory there 950 feet long, 80 feet broad, four stories high, and intended to run 1200 looms with 50,000 spindles. — The shipments of cotton to Europe for the present commercial year thus far amount to about $129,000,000; of tobacco, $14,000,000; of rice, $3,000,000; and naval stores, $2,000,000. — A lot of tobacco of a "bright golden hue, and the texture as fine as silk," was sold in Lynchburg, Va., recently, at the enormous price of $255 per hundred! It was said to be the finest specimen of the article ever seen—and ought to be to sell for two dollars and fifty cents per pound. — The Journal of Commerce says, that the predictions of a short peach crop are fully verified. There is no probability that it will exceed one quarter of an average. — The oldest daily paper in London is the Public Ledger, established in the year 1700, which for several years has only had from six and seven hundred subscribers. The printing press had been at work in England nearly one hundred and fifty years before the inventive genius of that country produced a single newspaper; and nearly another hundred years passed before a daily paper was ventured upon. — It is calculated that the clergy cost the United States six millions of dollars annually, the criminals nineteen, the lawyers thirty-five, tobacco forty, and rum one hundred millions. — The lumber business at Albany, heretofore the greatest lumber market in the country, is decreasing year by year. It culminated in 1853, and has never been so great since.

EXPENSIVE LUXURY.—The Albany Knickerbocker says, "as things are managed now-a-days death is one of the most expensive luxuries that people can dabble in." The editor speaks of the burthen, entailed upon decent poverty, reducing it frequently to want and misery, by the costly funerals and costly mourning which fashion obliges the family of a deceased person to indulge in. There is certainly a necessity for a reform in this matter, for we are fast approaching the condition of the Parisians, with whom living is amazingly cheap and dying enormously dear.

A COMMENTATOR.—An ardent Shakspearian has written a pamphlet on the play of "Hamlet," called an "Attempt to ascertain whether the queen were an accessory before the fact, in the murder of her first husband." This reminds us of the attorney's clerk in the pit, who, when the witches reply to Macbeth's question, "What is't ye do—a deed without a name?" shouted, "It's null and void. If it isn't signed, sealed and witnessed, I wouldn't give a ha'penny for it!"

MILKING BY MACHINERY.—Some genius has actually invented a machine for milking, and a wag suggests an Æolian attachment, so that the cow while undergoing the operation may be soothed to perfect stillness, regardless of the flies. The tunes might be the "Mellow Horn," or "Corn rigs are bonny," or that fine old psalm tune called "Durham."

NEW INVENTION.—A Yankee has invented a new preventive to theft. It consists of a box the size of a watch, and worn in the vest pocket attached to a chain. When a thief seizes the chain, it immediately puts in operation an alarm-bell, and thus enables the intended victim to seize upon the thief.

FRUITS OF GENIUS.—Genius is sometimes well remunerated in this hard world, after all. Jenny Lind, during her late professional tour in England, conveying a few months, received nearly half a million of dollars. When Paganini the violinist netted $75,000 in a season it was thought wonderful.

PRIVATEERING.—The American government will not abandon privateering until foreign nations give up the right of capturing private goods by national ships.

APPLES.—There will be a scant supply of this fine fruit this year, at least in this region, though in some parts of the country there is a heavy crop.

GAS.—The town of Dorchester is to be illuminated with gas. There's nothing like the diffusion of light, physical and intellectual.

The summers of 1812, 1814, 1818, 1826, and 1856, are the hottest remembered in Ireland by the "oldest inhabitant." It was exceedingly hot in 1826, but we believe the past summer to have been more so.

The Cincinnati papers record the death of Mr. Robert Orr, in the 88th year of his age. He was born in Lancaster, Pa., in 1771. Mr. Orr, 57 years ago, raised corn and other grain on what is now the densest part of Cincinnati.

A lady appeared at a recent ball at Congress Hall, Saratoga, with a $10,000 set of diamonds, besides other jewelry, upon her person. They were not her own, however, but belonged to a dealer who hoped to find a market for them among the fashionables, and took this mode of advertising them.

There is said to be an old lady in Johnsonville, S. C., who is one hundred and thirty-six years of age. She was a grown young lady at the time of Braddock's defeat, and can recount many incidents of the Revolution. She has been blind for thirty years, but can walk about with the aid of a walking stick.

A servant girl in London has been fined forty shillings, or a month's imprisonment, for pouring a kettle of boiling water on a cat that was trespassing on her master's premises. The Russian clergy have just celebrated a grand mass at Bala-klava, at which every one walked barefoot in sign of mortification, after which holy water was sprinkled in every direction. The camp of 6000 men, which has been formed on the heights of Inkermann, will be the only military force remaining in that part of the Crimea.

The wires are erected on strong, durable posts like those in our own country.

The New York Express states, that never, since the summer and fall of 1853—the Crystal Palace year—have the hotels in that city been so full as at the present time. The number of visitors from the South en route to and from Europe and the fashionable watering-places here at the North, since the commencement of the summer months, has been unprecedented.

A young lady, at present a pupil in one of the literary institutions of Richmond, has received the distressing intelligence, that among those who perished in the terrible calamity at Last Island, were her father, brother, uncle, aunt and two cousins. Every house will also be illuminated.

There are 1,000,000 of inhabitants in Upper Canada, of whom 308,000 are children between the ages of five and sixteen. ## THE COLUMN OF THE PLACE VENDOME, PARIS.

This magnificent monument, erected at a cost of 1,500,000 francs, stands in the Place Vendome at Paris. The square was formerly occupied by the sumptuous hotel of the Duke de Vendome, the son of Henry IV. and the fair Gabrielle d'Estrées. Louis XIV., in 1685, purchased the hotel and removed it, at the suggestion of Louvois, intending to erect, around the square thus formed, buildings for the royal library, the mint, the ministers, etc. On the death of Louvois, this project was abandoned and the ground ceded to the city of Paris, conditionally. The form of the place is a symmetrical octagon, the larger sides of which measure respectively 420 by 450 feet. The buildings on the sides are uniform in character. The place was first called the Place des Conquetes, then the Place Louis le Grand, and finally the Place Vendome. A colossal equestrian statue of Louis XVI., in bronze, formerly stood in the centre, but was demolished by the revolutionists, August 10, 1792. The mutilated pedestal remained until 1806, when it was replaced by the triumphal pillar erected by Napoleon to commemorate his successes in the German campaign of 1805, the material being 1200 pieces of brass cannon captured from the Austrians and Russians. The column is an imitation of Trojan's pillar at Rome, and rises to the height of 135 feet; 360,000 pounds of metal were consumed in this gigantic work. The pedestal and shaft are of stone, covered with bronze bas-reliefs representing the victories of the French army. The reliefs on the pedestal depict the uniforms, armor and weapons of the conquered troops. Above the pedestal are garlands of oak, supported at the four angles by eagles, each weighing 500 pounds. The door is of massive bronze, decorated with oak wreaths, surmounted by an eagle of the highest finish. Above is a bas-relief, representing two figures of Fame, supporting a tablet with a Latin inscription showing the purpose of the structure. The bas-reliefs of the shaft pursue a spiral direction to the capital, and display, in chronological order, the exploits of the army from Bonlogne to Austerlitz. The figures are three feet high, and number about two thousand, the length of the scroll being 840 feet. A spiral tread, dividing the loes, records the names of the battles represented. The designs were furnished by Bergeret, and executed by thirty-one sculptors, one of whom was a lady named Charpentier. Above the capital is a gallery, approached by a winding interior staircase of 175 steps, from which a fine view of Paris is obtained. The present statue of Napoleon was placed there under the reign of Louis Philippe, and inaugurated with appropriate ceremonies on the 28th of July, 1833, in the presence of an immense multitude, who greeted with deafening cheers and every demonstration of delight the restoration of the effigy of the popular idol of France. The statue is eleven feet in height, represents the emperor in his military costume, and was modelled by Seurre.

ARCHITECTS OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE, NEW YORK.

On this page we present engravings, from photographic portraits, of Messrs. Charles Gildemeister and George J. B. Carstensen, both young men, and architects of the Crystal Palace, New York, a building which, in symmetry and elegance, is acknowledged to surpass both the palace of the World's Fair at London and that in which the grand Exposition was held in the city of Paris. Various plans were submitted to the Crystal Palace Association for adoption. Sir Joseph Paxton, the gifted originator of the English Crystal Palace, with great liberality furnished a splendid design, which the peculiar form of the ground on which the building was to be erected precluded the association from accepting. The late lamented A. J. Downing, a gentleman of unequalled architectural skill and taste, submitted a very original and admirable plan, but it did not meet the requirements of the city, which, in making the grant, had stipulated that it should be entirely of iron and glass. Mr. Leopold Eidlitz presented a plan with a suspension roof, intended to obviate the great difficulty of spanning great widths by arches. Mr. James Bogardus submitted a plan of a circular building with successive colonnades, placed above each other, somewhat resembling the Colosseum at Rome, and involving a new mode of joining, for which he has obtained a patent. Mr. Julius W. Adams submitted a plan of a great octagonal vault or dome, the supporting ribs being formed of clusters of gas pipes. Among the other plans, presented by different individuals, were some of such beauty and originality that the task of selection was rendered a delicate and difficult one. That, however, which was finally adopted gave universal satisfaction, and showed its authors to be men of genius and skill. That so novel a style of building should have been successfully attempted and carried in an American city excited universal astonishment abroad, and created a high idea of the progress of the arts in the United States.

THE RIVER SIDE.

The pastoral landscape on this page is such a one as would have delighted the heart of Izaak Walton, and will delight the eyes of all who are "lovers of virtue and go an angling." Screened from the world without by a mass of foliage, through which a single opening gives us a view of a rolling country and a rustic cottage, a tranquil river pursues its liquid path. But the scene is not inanimate. A delightful group is gathered on the grassy shore. Lounging in an easy attitude, with his reel beside him, an inveterate fisherman is watching his float, anxiously expectant of at least "one glorious nibble." Near him stands a recreant brother of the angle, whose reel is idle, and who is completely absorbed in the romance or poem which one of the group of young ladies is reading to her companions. On the other side are two rebellious spirits insensible to the spell of literature, and bent on more frivolous pursuits. They are engaged in an attempt to snare a beautiful butterfly, whose bright wings, glittering in the noontide, have attracted their eyes, and inflamed them with the desire of possession. The fluttering insect will most probably elude its youthful pursuers—the chances are in its favor.

CHAPTER XIII.—[CONTINUED.]

When the party arrived within sight of the house and its surroundings, as well as could be seen by the imperfect light, they found they were a pleasant and encouraging aspect. They stopped at some little distance to reconnoitre the apartment, which could be seen through an uncurtained window.

"What a lovely home-picture," said Bessie.

"Yes," said Wilton, "here, if I mistake not, is what may be truly called a home."

They both had good reason for what they said. In the ample fire-place a good fire was burning, and on a small table placed in front of it, was the well-trimmed lamp which had been their guiding star. On one side of it was a man with a boy of four years old on his knee. The earnest and delighted attention with which the child looked up into his father's face, made it pretty certain that he was listening to one of those veritable stories, such as is recorded of "Jack, the Giant-Killer," or that cow, remarkable for her "vaulting ambition," that jumped over the moon. At the opposite side of the table sat a woman busy with some sewing, and near one corner of the fire place, a girl of ten or a dozen years was knitting, who seemed nearly as much charmed with the stories as her little brother.

The four forming this family group were handsome—no commonly so; and yet, as far as the husband and wife were concerned, it was a kind of beauty not easily described, as it consisted more in those expressions of countenance which have their source in the culture of the affections rather than in the beauty of outline or color.

There was, however, a great deal of this last kind of beauty in the girl's face, with cheeks red and fresh as the mountain daisy, and her fair, smooth brow shaded by rich, out-brown curls. And then those heart-smiles. Anybody who looked at the father and mother, would have known the reason of their being so warm and full of sunshine was because they had never been met by frowns and unnecessary rebuke. It required only a minute for the eye to take in this picture, and for the heart to give it a true interpretation.

"We can hardly wish for anything more promising than this," said Braynard.

"No—I think not," was Wilton's reply. "And you, Bessie, are of the same mind, judging from the exclamation which escaped you, when you first caught a view of that cheerful-looking fire-side."

"O, yes," replied Bessie, "with such a family I should feel safe as I should at home."

"Come, Bessie," said Wilton, springing from his horse, and then assisting her to alight, "I think you had better go with me, when I apply for admission. The sight of your face will be a good passport for the rest of us, as it will quiet all fears of Indians or marauding soldiers."

The man came to the door, who, when he saw Bessie, called to his wife.

"Mary," said he, "here is a lady. You must come and welcome her."

And very kind and cordial was the welcome she gave her, while that which Wilton and the others received from the host was equally warm. It was plain that feelings of true Virginian hospitality were cherished beneath that humble roof. While the host, whose name was Ashmore, assisted by the travellers, saw that the horses were well cared for, a well supplied larder afforded Mrs. Ashmore the means of preparing a plentiful and acceptable repast.

In the morning, finding that there was a post-town about seven or eight miles distant, Bessie wrote to her mother, giving a brief account of what had befallen her since they parted. She also mentioned that she intended going to Mrs. Woodhull's after a day's rest, which, as near as she could ascertain, would be somewhat of a hard day's ride from where she then was. She would remain at Mrs. Woodhull's, she wrote, till she received a letter from home.

When Bessie's letter was ready, Wilton set out in company with the three other young men (who now, being within a day's journey of their own homes, were anxious to arrive there), to convey it to the post-office.

"You will return in season to dine with us," said Mr. Ashmore, addressing Wilton, when they were ready to start.

"I think not," was his reply. "I may be absent all night, but shall return in the morning, in season to accompany Miss Hamlen."

CHAPTER XIV.

THE PERCIVAL MANSION.

At the village where the post-office was kept, Wilton and his friends parted. While they proceeded in a south-easterly direction, he turned to the north, where, some ten or twelve miles distant, there was another post-town, where he hoped to find letters from Mr. Grosvenor and Edith, and also from his business agent. It having been later in the morning than they intended it should be, when they left Mr. Ashmore's, they remained at the village hotel to dine; after which, as it might be a long time before they would meet again, if ever, they indulged in an hour's social chat. Wilton was in no hurry, however, as there was more than time enough to enable him to reach the other village before dark.

His horse, finding that he was suffered to take his own gait, from a brisk trot soon came down into a walk. The animal's indolence was favorable to the rider's enjoyment of the highly picturesque scenery, which, in the distance, was softened and harmonized by the golden haze of the Indian summer. When Wilton, at last, awoke from his reverie, he found the oaks and chestnuts which grew by the wayside, were casting long shadows across his path, and looking towards the west, he found that the sun in less than half an hour would sink to rest beneath the golden-fringed clouds which already arched the clear, amber-hued sky.

He looked at his watch, and found that it must be full three hours since he took leave of his friends at the hotel. The village where he intended going was not yet in sight. He quickened his horse's pace and rode on something like a mile further. Still, nothing was to be seen of the village. There was a small house, however, some forty or fifty rods ahead, where he concluded he would make some inquiries, as he began to suspect he had lost his way. By the information obtained from the woman who came to the door, he found that he was right in his conjecture. He must have turned aside from the road that led to the village, only a few miles after he left the hotel.

"Is there any hotel, or tavern," said he, "within a few miles of here, where I can obtain supper and a night's lodging?"

"I don't know of any," was the woman's answer; "but after you get a piece further, the road turns away to the left among the hills, and pretty soon you'll come to a valley where there are a number of houses, and you'll find no difficulty in obtaining such accommodations as you need, at either of them. I would invite you to stay here, only I know you'll fare so much better than you would in this poor place."

Wilton thanked her and rode on. He found, as she had said, that the road turned to the left, and very soon he came to a part of it which overlooked the valley, which was varied by fine swells and ridges of land, and nearly encircled by a river, one of the tributaries of the Potomac. On one side of the valley, where the ground was more elevated than the rest, there was a large edifice, built after the fashion of the old manor-houses of England. It was now venerable from age, having been built over two centuries. In convenient proximity were the dwellings of the servants.

Several small houses were situated near the outskirts of the valley, and Wilton checked his horse while he considered whether it were better to apply at one of these or the larger one. Inclination was in favor of the latter. He hardly knew why, for one of the smaller houses, nestled amid vines and shrubbery, which still retained much of their summer verdure, wore a far more cheerful aspect.

Proceeding about a quarter of a mile further, he arrived at the entrance of the broad avenue shaded with oaks, which led to the mansion. It was now after sunset, though still so light that objects were distinctly visible. He turned into the avenue, and when he had approached the house more nearly, he found that the front part of it seemed silent and deserted. He rode round to a side-door and knocked, which was opened by a colored girl.

"I have lost my way," said Wilton, "and have called to see if I can stay here to-night."

"I will go and see," replied the girl.

In a minute or two she returned, and inviting him to walk in, conducted him to what might have been called the home room. A woman, whom he subsequently found to be the housekeeper, invited him to take a seat near the fire.

"The master is absent," said she, "but I could not refuse supper and lodging to a traveller who has lost his way."

An aged and very disagreeable-looking woman sat on a form placed against the jamb of the huge fire place, smoking a short, dingy pipe. As Wilton took the chair offered him, she removed the pipe from her lips and regarded him with great attention. The moment, however, that he looked that way, she replaced her pipe between her lips, muttering something to herself, though in such a manner as to be unintelligible. From time to time, when she thought herself unobserved, she cast towards Wilton quick furtive glances, and once she shook her head, and said, half audibly:

"No, no—'tis no such thing, and I'm a fool for thinking about it."

After a while she turned aside a little, and looking steadily into the fire puffed away with great energy till the weed which filled the blackened bowl was exhausted. She then knocked it free of ashes on the end of the large back-log, and having put it into her pocket, folded her arms around her, bent forward, and again seemed intently watching the fire. Having sat in this attitude several minutes, she raised her head and turned sharply round towards Wilton.

"Are you a stranger in these parts?" said she.

"I am, as regards this particular section of the State."

"You were never this way before?"

"I've no remembrance of ever having been."

"You aint a native of Virginia then?"

"Yes—but I was born further south."

"And nearer the sea-shore, perhaps?"

"I was. Richmond is my native place."

"That's where your parents live?"

"They did live there. My mother died before my remembrance, and it is over ten years now since my father's decease."

"You'll think I've no business to be so inquisitive, sir, but somehow, strange fancies come over me sometimes."

"O, ask as many questions as you please," said Wilton, smiling. "If there should happen to be any I should prefer not to answer, I will be frank enough to tell you so."

The woman seemed disposed to avail herself of the liberty thus granted, and went on with her catechism.

"You said you were born in Richmond—have you always lived there?"

"Always, till within a few years—except when I was at college."

"Then you are college larnt?"

"Yes."

"A cravin' for larnin' always run in the Percival blood. Arter all, my first thought may be right."

This was said in low, mumbling accents, not intended for Wilton's ear. He had for a moment been a little absent-minded, and imagined that she addressed him.

"Did you speak to me?" he said.

"No, 'twas nothin'—I was thinkin' of my son."

"You have a son, then?"

"No, no, I haven't," said she, with a startled look. "What made you think I have?"

"You said you was thinking of your son."

"So I did—I remember now. Well, it has been years and years—I can hardly tell how many—since I was a childless widow. Though hard for me, 'twas better for him, so I've tried to make the best of it."

"Was your son quite young when he died?"

"Died? Well, no matter—he's dead to me. No, he wasn't young—he'd come to man's estate. At first, it wrung my heart. Then it grew hard and bitter, and there have been times when I've almost thought that all wasn't right here," said she, touching her finger to her forehead.

"All are liable to be afflicted," said Wilton, "and we must try to bear the common lot with as much fortitude as we can."

"Do you say mine is the common lot?" said she, sharply.

"Well, so it is, in one sense. But the mother can never forget her son—no, never. The son may forget the mother who has watched over him when she should have slept, and even be ashamed of her."

"We will hope, for the sake of humanity," said Wilton, "that the cases are rare."

"If rare, when it does happen, it is so much the harder to bear. The old proverb says that misery loves company, and it says the truth, sir."

And again folding her arms around her and bending forward, she commenced a nervous, rocking motion, such as persons inclined to be somewhat demonstrative, have recourse to sometimes, when suffering from painful emotion. Supper was now brought in and placed upon the table.

"I think you must need something by this time," said the housekeeper. "We have a good cook, but she is rather slow."

As Wilton passed near her to take a seat at the table, she looked towards the woman who sat in the corner.

"There are times," said she, "when her mind is not quite sound."

"That is what I thought," he replied.

After having partaken of the viands which had been placed before him so liberally as to be quite satisfactory to the hospitable housekeeper, Wilton expressed a wish to be shown to the room where he was to pass the night.

"Don't let it be in the southwest chamber, Lois Grey," said the woman in the corner, to the housekeeper, and speaking for the first time since she questioned Wilton so closely.

"That is the one I had prepared for him," said Mrs. Grey.

"Don't let him go there—I charge you not to let him," said she, with a kind of frenzied earnestness.

"What chamber shall he have, then?" said Mrs. Grey, who seemed inclined not to cross her.

"Any one but that."

"He can have the one over the back parlor, then."

"That is as good as the other."

"Yes, quite as good, except the prospect from the windows isn't as fine."

"Fine prospects wont make him sleep the sounder."

"I am not particular," said Wilton. "Consult your own convenience, and I shall be well satisfied, I dare say."

Meanwhile a colored man, somewhat advanced in life, had been standing ready to show him the way.

"To the room over the back parlor?" he asked of Mrs. Grey.

"Yes, Numa. As she says, the chamber is as good as the other."

Wilton followed Numa up a grand old staircase, almost broad enough for a chariot and four.

"This is the room where Mrs. Grey intended you should sleep," said Numa, opening the first door they came to, after ascending the first flight of stairs, and holding the light just within the chamber, so that a view of the interior could be obtained.

The furniture was rich, though rather cumbersome, and the walls were hung with a number of portraits.

"Would you like to look at the portraits before going to the other chamber?" inquired Numa.

"I should. I like to look at portraits."

They entered, and Numa held the lamp so that its rays fell full on the first one they came to. It represented a handsome, dark-complexioned man, in the prime of life, with the peaked beard and broad, stiff ruff of Charles the Second's time.

"This is the portrait of Sir Harry Percival, who came over from England," said Numa. "He purchased the plantation of a gentleman who wished to go South."

"Sir Harry Percival, did you say?"

"Yes, the estate was owned by the Percival family more than a hundred years."

"It has passed into other hands, then?" said Wilton, finding Numa as intelligent as he was inclined to be communicative.

"Yes—the heir who would have inherited it was lost."

"Lost?"

"Yes—drowned, as was thought, when he was only a little over two years old."

Wilton had it on his lips to ask into whose hands the estate then passed, but at that moment, without having stopped to look at several intervening portraits, Numa held the light so that it fell on the full length portrait of a lady, youthful and very lovely.

She was dressed in the comparatively modern costume fashionable at the beginning of the last quarter of the eighteenth century, the rich, broad skirt, as well as the soft and glossy texture of the pink satin robe worn over it, which was open in front and swept back in graceful folds, being represented with an accuracy and carefulness of finish, characteristic of the Dutch school. Even the pearls and diamonds which adorned the stomacher were so faithfully delineated as to resemble real gems. Though the strong contrast afforded by raven locks is generally thought to enhance the brilliancy of a fine complexion, it would have been difficult to imagine how that of the lady represented could have appeared more brilliant, though, according to the fashion of the period, the natural hue of her hair was concealed by powder.

When Wilton first glanced at this lovely picture, the general effect was so dazzling that he did not mark the form and expression of the features; but when the bewildering influence had had time to subside, he was certain that it bore a strong resemblance, either to a person or portrait he had somewhere seen. It was impossible, however, for him to recall to mind the time or the place.

"Is the original of this portrait living?" he inquired.

"No, she has been dead many years."

"Who was she?"

"The wife of this gentleman," said he, passing the light along to the next portrait.

"And was he a Percival, too?"

"Yes, and the lineal descendant of Sir Harry Percival, whose portrait you first looked at."

There was something, too, in this one, which Wilton thought looked strangely familiar.

"There is, to say the least," said he, "something singular in the impression which these portraits give me."

At the same moment he happened to cast his eyes towards a pier-glass, opposite to where he stood. It reflected his figure at full length, and this solved the mystery as regarded the last portrait. It was impossible for him not to see that there was a very striking resemblance between it and himself. Numa, too, had discovered the similitude, judging from the manner he alternately regarded him and the portrait.

"One might think that he was a Percival," said Numa, unconsciously perhaps, giving utterance to what was in his thoughts.

"You see a resemblance between me and the portrait?" said Wilton.

"A very great one."

"It isn't impossible but that my mother might have been related to the family."

"Was her name Percival?"

"I never knew what her name was before she was married. She died before my remembrance, and I was too young when my father died to have much curiosity as respected my genealogy."

Numa, without making any answer to this, passed on to the next portrait.

"This," said he, "is the likeness of Mr. Edgar Percival, father to him we've just been looking at."

"Was his son's name Edgar?"

"No, Thomas. He had a son, named for his grandfather—the same I have already mentioned, who was drowned when he was only two years old."

Wilton, after remaining in a thoughtful attitude a few moments, asked Numa if he knew the reason why the old lady who sat smoking in the chimney corner at the time he arrived, appeared so unwilling to have him sleep in the chamber where they then were.

"I do not," he replied. "She runs of wild and singular notions occasionally, and has done, at times, for many years. She is generally thought to be deranged."

They were about to look at the next portrait—that of Mr. Edgar Percival's wife—when they were startled by a voice at the door.

"How dared you disobey me?" it said.

They turned, and saw her they had just been speaking of. She had a wild, frightened look.

"I am going to the other chamber," said Wilton. "I only stepped in here to look at these portraits."

"Twas Numa who brought you here. He will live to see the day he will repent it."

"It was for no evil purpose," said Numa.

"That is evil which leads to evil."

"Well, good mother," said Wilton, "we will hope that no harm will come of my looking at these portraits, for it has given me much pleasure. If it has caused you any uneasiness, I am sorry for it. We will go now."

As he and Numa approached the door, she glided into the room.

"I shall keep guard here to-night," said she, "so you needn't try to come back. I shan't be lonesome. They will come down," and she pointed to the portraits of Mr. Edgar Percival and his son—"they will come down and make me show them my hands. They've done it before, and they looked at each other and laughed. I knew what they meant. They expected my hands were stained, but they found no blood on 'em."

"You see she isn't in her right mind," said Numa, as they passed along the corridor.

"Yes. What caused her insanity?"

"It isn't known."

By this time they had reached the other chamber.

"I should advise you to turn the key," said Numa, as he lit a candle which stood on a table. "Old Elsie won't be likely to sleep much to night, and she may take it into her head to pay you a visit, if she finds the door on the latch."

When Wilton was left to himself he followed Numa's advice, and locked the door. Feeling no inclination to sleep, he sat down by the table, and tried to remember why the portrait of Mrs. Percival had looked so familiar to him. For a long time it was a vain endeavor, when suddenly it flashed upon his mind.

"I think I have it with me," said he, and putting his hand in his pocket, he drew forth a small package.

Undoing the folds of a thick, strong envelop, a piece of soft tissue paper presented itself to view, in which was enclosed a cameo portrait. It was that of a very young and lovely woman, and was one of the first things of which he had any recollection. It was of an oval form, about three inches in circumference, plainly set in gold, with a small ring at the top, through which was passed a band not more than a third of an inch wide, which was wrought with the finest and most delicate needle-work. This band was fastened together by a tiny clasp, which was marked with the letters—F. P.

"They are the initials of the person's name who once owned it, no doubt," he murmured to himself, as he unrolled the band which was wound round the cameo.

A sudden flush crossed his brow as he thought one of the names might have been Percival.

"I knew I could not be mistaken," said he, when at last the portrait was revealed.

The form of the features, and the graceful way the finely-shaped head was placed on the shoulders, was indeed the exact counterpart of the one he had seen in the chamber. This certainly appeared singular, and he endeavored to recollect some incident connected with the cameo, which would serve as a clue to come at its history. Nothing, however, could be recalled, which he could in any way, as far as he could perceive, make available for this purpose. In this respect, the few memories connected with it appeared to him unimportant.

His father had been very choice of it while he lived, and had always kept it under lock and key, in a little box or cabinet, where he kept his most valuable papers. He had given Wilton to understand that it belonged, not to himself, but him; and when he occasionally showed it to him, he was accustomed to tell him that as soon as he was old enough to take good care of it, he should give it up to him. Once Wilton asked him where it came from, when he answered rather evasively, that such kind of things were brought from over the sea.

A few days before he died, he mentioned the cameo portrait to Wilton, and charged him to preserve it carefully, as the time might come when it would be worth a great deal to him. When Wilton asked him in what respect, he replied that he was unable to give him any satisfactory explanation, but that for certain reasons he had faith in what he told him.

If he had only specified those reasons, Wilton might have turned them to good account; now they only served to perplex and more deeply involve him in conjecture.

"What if I am the lost heir?" was the thought which struck him so suddenly, that he involuntarily started to his feet. The next moment he smiled at his folly in indulging an idea so preposterous. Just then, the old eight-day clock he had seen in the hall, commenced striking the hour of midnight. He could hardly believe it possible that it was so late, and hastily restoring the cameo portrait to its wrappings, he returned it to his pocket.

He had scarcely laid his head on the pillow, when he heard a stealthy footstep approach the door, and a minute afterward, some one lifted the latch. He recalled to mind what Numa had told him, and concluded that it was old Elsie, and very thankful he felt that he was secure against the intrusion of the weird-looking woman, who, whether her intellectual faculties were disordered or not, appeared to him as if urged by some strong impulse, to which she yielded unwilling obedience, to entertain towards him some sinister purpose. The latch was lifted a second time, and then some low-breathed mutterings were heard close to the keyhole. Shortly afterward, the stealthy footsteps were again heard, this time receding, and soon were lost in the distance.

Soon the maze of strange thoughts and bewildering fancies floating through his mind began to grow dim and indistinct, losing themselves, as it were, in a cloud of mist, till, at last, even the bright sweet face of the lady's portrait, which, when all besides had faded, continued to beam upon him, suddenly vanished, and he slept.

CHAPTER XV.

AN UNPLEASANT SURPRISE.

WHEN Wilton woke, the sun was shining brightly into his chamber windows. On descending to the room where he had spent the previous evening, he found the table already laid, though he was told that breakfast would not be ready under an hour.

He saw nothing of old Elsie, and was glad, soon after his entrance, to find himself alone with Mrs. Grey, for he was now determined to inquire who was the successor of the Percivals, which, although he had fully intended it, and had had ample opportunity for the purpose, he had by some means neglected.

"Though I have partaken of your hospitality," said he, "I am as yet ignorant of the name of the gentleman who owns this fine plantation."

"His name is Withers."

"Is it possible?"

"Yes; it is now over twenty years since he came into possession of it. By your manner of speaking, you know him, I should think."

"Is his name Ishmael Withers?"

"It is."

"I have heard of him, though I never saw him. Were you here in the lifetime of his predecessor?"

"This wasn't my home at that time, though I often came to see my aunt, who filled the same place in the household of Mr. Percival which I do now."

"His name was Thomas Percival, was it not?" said Wilton, anxious to lead her on to say something of the family.

"No, it was Edgar. Thomas was his son, and was here very little, after he became of age. He was only twenty-seven when he died."

"He was married?"

"Yes, but his wife lived only two years afterward."

"He survived her only a short time?"

"No; he died suddenly, only a few months after she did."

"Do you recollect the lady's Christian name?"

"Certainly I do. It was Florence."

Wilton thought of the initials engraved on the clasp of the band attached to the cameo, and felt more convinced than ever that, at an early period, before his remembrance, he had in some way been connected with the family who formerly owned the estate, now in the possession of Withers.

"Mrs. Percival's name was Dale before she was married," Mrs. Grey went on to say, "and she was a descendant of Sir Thomas Dale, who, two hundred years ago, was governor of Virginia. Young Mr. Percival found her when on a visit to England, and a sweet lady she was, too. Do you know, sir, that when you smile, you make me think of her?"

"How?"

"I can hardly tell myself. You don't resemble her, in the least, any other time."

"The man who showed me to my room last night told me that the younger Mrs. Percival had a son who was drowned when he was only two years old."

"Yes, it was so said."

"And was there any reason to suppose that it was not so?"

"Some thought there was, but I was very young then—only a child, and the older people who whispered it among themselves were careful not to say much in presence of the children. I remember, though, that my aunt said, if the boy's father had been alive, it wouldn't have been passed over so lightly. The child's grandfather did what he could, but his health had been failing him ever since the death of his son, and the loss of the little Edgar gave him a shock which he never got over. This prevented him from giving his personal attention to the investigation which took place, and though Mr. Withers appeared to be very much concerned on account of the child's disappearance, and made a great flourish about searching the woods and dragging the river, a great many people thought that he was glad the child was gone."

"Mr. Withers must have been wealthy, to be able to purchase so valuable an estate as this."

"He hadn't a hundred dollars in the world. Mr. Percival gave it to him by will, a short time before he died. This was partly what made people talk; for though Mr. Percival had no near relations, he had cousins who would have fallen heirs to his property, and were, as it was said, much better men than Ishmael Withers."

The entrance of a servant, who came to tell Mrs. Grey that breakfast was ready to be served, put an end to the conversation.

When Mrs. Grey had told Wilton that when he smiled he reminded her of the younger Mrs. Percival, she had not passed unnoticed the much greater resemblance he bore the lady's husband and his father. She had once been on the point of mentioning it, but, on second thought, concluded it might not be altogether advisable.

Wilton, conscious of the resemblance which he bore both father and son, thought it a little strange that she should not have noticed it when she had been so quick to detect even what she considered a slight similitude between him and Mrs. Percival, though, as was very natural, from motives readily appreciated, he refrained from making any allusion to it himself.

Wilton, now that he knew it was at the house of Withers where he had been entertained, would have preferred to leave before breakfast, but there had been a tacit understanding that he should remain, and he could think of no plausible pretext which he could assign for taking leave at the very moment it was ready. He had already ascertained that in coming thither he had taken a route so circuitous that the distance had been more than doubled, and that he could go by the way of the post-office, where he expected to find letters awaiting him, and still have time to return to Mr. Ashmore's in good season. There was no one at the table except himself and Mrs. Grey, who dismissed the servant in waiting.

"You will excuse me," said she, the moment the girl had left the room, "if I take the liberty to inquire your name, as it isn't from any idle curiosity."

"Certainly," he replied. "I was thinking that I had already mentioned that my name is Wilton Richmond."

"I have heard that name before, but had no suspicion that it belonged to you."

"You have heard Mr. Withers mention it?"

"Yes."

"Not in a manner which gave you reason to believe that his feelings towards me were very friendly?"

"No, it was not. I don't think that he knew I was within hearing at the time I heard him speaking of you. I believe you told me that you and he are not acquainted?"

"I did. If we were to meet, I shouldn't know him."

"And you think he wouldn't know you?"

"How should he?"

"It is not impossible," said she, appearing slightly confused, "that he may have seen you. Such a thing might happen without your knowing it."

"May there not be some other reason why he should know me?" said Wilton, as he recalled to mind the unmistakable resemblance between himself and the portraits of Mr. Edgar Percival and his son.

Before she had time to make any answer to this question, old Elsie entered the room with a covered basket in her hand.

"What have you there?" said Mrs. Grey.

"Something that will be needed before long. I knew that it would be, long ago, and told him."

"Told who?"

"My son."

"But I've heard you say a great many times that you never had but one son, and that you lost him a great many years ago."

"Yes; 'twill be twenty-nine years next Michaelmas; but then I see him sometimes. Do you want to know where?"

"Yes," replied Mrs. Grey, "if you have no objection to telling."

"Listen, then, and you shall hear;" and fixing her eyes on the floor, and swaying herself backwards and forwards so as to mark the different stops and cadences, she repeated these lines:

"We meet by moonlight, but not on the lea,
We meet, though not by fountain or tree;
But where the deadly nightshade springs—
Where the bodied raven flaps his wings.
We meet on the wild and blasted heath,
Where the night-wind shrieks, and the gaunt wolves howl,
And where noisome weeds, their odors foul,
Bleed with the serpent's venomous breath; and brave and merry meetings we have, too. When shall you be here again?" said she, coming up close to Wilton, and laying her withered hand on his shoulder.

"I don't know that I ever shall," he replied, and recoiling a little at this unexpected familiarity.

"You will, and it won't be long first, though you had better take the advice of one who has lived longer in the world than you have, and stay away."

Having said this, she went and took her old seat in the corner of the fireplace, and taking her pipe from her pocket, held it in her hand, and appeared to be impatiently waiting for them to get through with their breakfast. Her patience was not severely tried, for the meal was soon finished, and Wilton, seeing through the window that his horse was ready, took leave. He would like to have said something more to Mrs. Grey, but the presence of Elsie prevented. Seeing Numa standing near, as he was about to mount his horse, he bid him good morning. Numa returned the salutation in a manner very respectful, and then approached a little nearer.

"Mr. Withers," said he, "has just sent word that we may look for him sometime between this and sunset, and that he wishes to have everything put in the best order possible on so short a notice, as he expected to bring some one with him."

"Did he mention the person's name?"

"No, though I shouldn't wonder if it was a British officer. More than one has been here within the last six months. I didn't know but what if you knew he was coming home, you would like to stay long enough to get a sight of him. You will pardon me, sir, if I tell you that he is no friend to you, and it is well to know our enemy when we meet him."

"That is true, but I must trust to some other time, as well as place, to obtain sight of him; besides, I have an engagement, which I mustn't break."

"I hope you won't think I've been too presuming. I meant right."

"By no means. On the contrary, I owe you many thanks."

"I am old," said Numa, "yet not so old but that I hope to live to have a better man for a master than Mr. Withers."

Numa bowed in a respectful and evidently regretful manner, as, after saying a few kind and cheerful words, Wilton turned down the broad avenue which led to the high road.

As he expected, he found letters from Mr. Grosvenor and Edith at the post-office, and without meeting with either incident or accident to occasion delay, he found himself at Mr. Ashmore's door. He was busy doing something near the house, and Wilton thought he appeared a little surprised at seeing him.

He looked towards the windows, expecting to see Bessie with a smile of welcome, at one of them, but he was disappointed.

"I hope Miss Hamlen's fright and fatigue didn't make her ill?" said he.

"O, no," replied Mr. Ashmore; "she was well, and in good spirits, when she left here."

"She surely hasn't gone from here?"

"Did you expect her to wait till you came? We didn't any of us so understand it."

"I certainly told her that I would be back in season to ride over to the hotel with her, where she was to take the stage."

"Yes, we knew that, but then we understood by the messenger you sent, that you were unexpectedly detained, and that you wished her to go with him."

"I have never sent any messenger."

"Then we have all of us been deceived."

"Which we must now remedy the best way we can."

CHAPTER XVI.

WHAT HAPPENED TO BESSIE.

So consistent and plausible seemed the reasons which were assigned for Wilton's detention, that Bessie did not, for a moment, suspect any treachery, and with full confidence placed herself under the guidance of him whom she supposed had been sent for that purpose.

In the hurry of departure, she had hardly noticed his personal appearance; but when they were fairly on their way, she saw that he was a middle-aged man, by no means ill-looking, and, by some, might have even been thought handsome. To her mind, however, all beauty was destroyed by an expression which hovered about his lips, arising more from the lines traced around them than from any peculiarity of formation, and a restless, scintillating light in his small, head-like eyes, which betokened more of craft and cunning than good faith.

But she was far from being so much of a physiognomist as to imagine that the "mind's construction" could be always read in the face, and as his words and manner were sufficiently respectful, she made a successful effort to throw off those feelings of distrust which had begun to assail her.

"I should judge by the manner you manage your horse, that you wouldn't be afraid to go a pretty good jog," said he, after they had gone a short distance.

"No; I am used to riding; but is there any hurry?"

"There's no time to lose," was his answer; and as he spoke, he bent forward slightly, and directed a keen, scrutinizing glance along a road which branched off a little to the right, though the course, for some distance, was so nearly parallel to the other that it could, when the view was unobstructed by trees or thick clumps of evergreen shrubbery, be plainly seen. No one was in sight, and while a look of apprehension passed from his countenance, he fell back into his former easy and natural position, and spurred his horse into a brisk trot. But the fleet animal which Bessie rode appeared to rejoice in the accelerated speed, and required no urging.

Still, from time to time, the man continued to cast quick, apprehensive glances towards the other road, which, though it kept gradually diverging more and more, would require some ten or fifteen minutes of hard riding, ere, by the intervention of more hilly ground, they would lose sight of it. This appearance of apprehension did not escape the watchful eyes of Bessie.

"Is there any reason for fear, sir?" she at last ventured to inquire.

"I think not, but then these are times when it is best to keep a sharp look out."

"That is true," she replied, and her thoughts reverted to her recent escape from those who, as she doubted not, were acting under the direction of Withers, by the opportune appearance of Wilton and his companions, and began to fear that she might again fall into their hands.

When, at last, the other road was lost to view, she fully shared the feeling of relief evidently experienced by her guide, who now checked the speed of his horse. They rode on in silence the better part of an hour longer, when Bessie began to think that the seven miles between Mr. Ashmore's and the hotel, where she expected to find the coach, which would convey her to Mrs. Woodhull's, appeared much longer than she had anticipated.

"Are we not nearly there?" said she.

He hesitated, though only for a moment, while Bessie thought she heard a noise resembling the distant tramp of a number of horses. His car had caught the same sound, and this was what had caused his momentary hesitation before answering her question.

"When we reach the top of yonder hill," he then said, "we shall be in sight of the place where you are going."

By this time, there was no mistaking the noise heard in the distance. It was surely the tramp of horses, and they were rapidly approaching. In a minute more, half a dozen horsemen made their appearance on the brow of the hill, which was now only a short distance.

"Who can they be?" said Bessie.

"That isn't easy telling. They may be friends, or they may be enemies."

"See—they wear the dress of British soldiers. Let us turn back. We can yet escape."

"'Twill be much better," said he, "to jog quietly on. If we take no notice of them, ten to one, they won't mind us."

"I'm not willing to trust to that," she replied, and fully confident that the fleetness of her horse would enable her to soon place herself at a safe distance from them, when she could before long reach Mr. Ashmore's, she was determined to make the attempt.

But the man at her side had kept a watchful eye on her, and caught hold of her bridle at the very moment she essayed to turn her horse.

"You wouldn't have done that," said she, "if your intentions were friendly towards me. Wilton Richmond never sent you for me."

There was no time to deny the accusation, for the party of horsemen, who, as Bessie had thought, were dressed in the British uniform, had already reached them, and hemmed them in on every side.

"We thought you had met with bad luck," said one of them, addressing the man with Bessie, "and so came to hunt you up."

"Well, you see that you were mistaken," was the reply.

"I beg that you will permit me to proceed," said Bessie.

"That is what we intend to do. We are going to turn back, and will take you with us."

When they reached the top of the hill, Bessie found that it overlooked a valley containing several houses, one of which was a large and ancient-looking edifice, but she could not see that either of them bore any resemblance to a hotel.

"Are either of the buildings I see yonder used as a hotel?" she inquired of the man who was nearest her.

"No; did you expect that you were going to find one here?"

"Yes; he told me that when we were at the top of the hill, we should be in sight of the place where we were going," said she, indicating him who had accompanied her.

"Well, he told the truth, and you will find better accommodations at yonder fine house than you would at an inn, or a hotel, as you call it."

"Is that large house the one we are going to?"

"Yes."

"And does the stage stop there?"

"No, I rather think not," he replied, laughing.

"Who lives there?"

"O, a nice gentleman, rich as a Jew."

Bessie's heart sunk within her, and she said no more. The few questions she had asked had been prompted by a faint hope that her fears were exaggerated. Now, she needed no further confirmation that they were about to be realized,—that the stately mansion they were now approaching belonged to Ishmael Withers. Even then, full as her heart was with indignant and bitter emotion, among which, predominating over all the rest, was a sickening, loathing dread at the bare thought of meeting him in whom recklessness, hypocrisy and sycophancy seemed so strangely blended, a faint sense of what the surrounding scenery must be, when in its summer glory, existed in her mind.

NAPOLÉON'S BRAVERY.

At the first rumor of the emperor's return to Champagne, the Austrian army, as if seized with panic at a single name, had retreated by every road from the walls of Paris, as far as Troyes and Dijon. The Emperor of Austria, fearful of being surrounded, even in the midst of his troops, took refuge at Dijon. Alexander and the king of Prussia had got beyond Troyes. These sovereigns, magnifying the danger by the memory of so many former defeats, and fearful of a snare in the very heart of France, which had fallen with such apparent facility into their hands, agreed to send to their respective plenipotentiaries at the Congress of Chatillon the most pressing instructions to effect a peace. Had the emperor had timely notice of these terrors, he could have signed a peace on a European basis, at the moment that his own empire was fading beneath his feet; but he was ignorant of them. Alarmed, on his own part, at the masses crowding down upon him, he retreated towards Arcis-sur-Aube, where he unexpectedly came in contact with the army of Schwarzenburg. A sanguinary battle ensued, unexpectedly to both generals, between the French and Austrians. Napoleon fought at hazard, without any other plan than the necessity of fighting, and the resolution to conquer or die. He renewed in this action the miracles of bravery and sang-froid of Lodi and Rivoli; and his youngest soldiers blushed at the idea of deserting a chief who hazarded his own life with such invincible courage. He was repeatedly seen spurring his horse to a gallop against the enemy's cannon, and reappearing as if inaccessible to death, after the smoke had evaporated. A live shell having fallen in front of one of his young battalions, which recoiled and wavered in expectation of the explosion, Napoleon, to re-assure them, spurred his charger towards the instrument of destruction, made him smell the burning match, waited unshaken for the explosion, and was blown up. Rolling in the dust with his mutilated steed, and rising without a wound, amidst the plaudits of his soldiers, he calmly demanded another horse, and continued to brave the grape-shot, and to fly into the thickest of the battle. His guard at length arrived, and restored the fortune of the day.—Lamartine.

WINDSOR CASTLE, ENGLAND.

We present on the next page a large engraving representing the embattled gateway and the flag-tower of Windsor Castle, one of the royal residences of England. The castle is of great extent, but by representing only a portion of it, we are enabled to exhibit minutely the style of this massive feudal structure. The court here pass a portion of the year, and the figures in our engraving show the style in which the queen and Prince Albert travel, with outriders, footmen and an escort of cavalry. The castle is 28 miles from London, on the right bank of the Thames. During the residence of the court, its interior is a scene of dazzling splendor. There modern art has ministered to heighten the charm of antiquity, like a jewel sparkling in an antique crown—the bright gem shining more brilliantly from its ancient setting. About the towers of Windsor, ten centuries have woven a web of rich associations, and its corridors, chambers and terraces are tenanted by many of England's holiest memories. And there, too, all around this courtly magnificence, lie spread the sweetest charms of nature. There, in the park, is every shape and form of sylvan beauty, from the smooth lawn dotted with "Daisies, those pearly Arcturi of the earth,

The constellated flower that never sets;
Faint oxlips; tender blue bells, at whose hirth
The sod scarce heaved."

to the bold upland swelling towards the sky, the quiet dell, the tangled coppice, and the woody groves—the spots that Shelley sang of, where

"—the woven leaves
Make network of the dark blue light of day,
And the night's noontide clearness, mutable
As shapes in the wierd clouds."

Before the time of George IV., Windsor was an old castle, kingly in its proportions, rich in the recollections of bygone scenes, but yet only an old castle. It had little of comfort and elegance—a noble and half-deserted relic of other times. It is now fitted up with every comfort and elegance, is enriched with costly furniture and paintings, has a magnificent throne-room and chapel, and halls and chambers without number. No traveller in England should neglect to pass at least a day at Windsor Castle.

ONWARD.

BY FRANCIS A. DUBIVAGE.

"Nulla vestigia retrorsum."

Nor look, nor footsteps backward turn.
Though many a vanished scene be fair;
There's less Nereus in the urn
Of Memory than despair.
The Future we can carve at will—
The sculptured Past defies our skill.

Why summon up the weird army
Of spectres false—Delusion's train?
The idols Time has proved of clay
Will ne'er be gold again:
Nor deftest Alchemy restore
The treasures that we prized of yore.

Onward Life's river bravely pour—
And when we've won the skill to guide
The enginery of sails and oars.
Why backward cleave the tide?
If Beauty charmed the vanished scene,
We'll look to find some new Ulysses.

The wreaths that decked our youthful brows
Have lost their brightness and perfume—
We'll weave our crowns from fresher boughs
And flowers of richer bloom!
And brighter sunbeams than of old
Shall change our sails to beaten gold.

We will not think of reef or wreck,
Of latent dangers hurried o'er,
Of storms that whilom swept our deck;
Our Pharos shines before
And gilds the waves that ceaseless sweep
On to the vast eternal deep.

THERE IS NO TIME LIKE THE PRESENT.

BY MRS. S. P. DOUGHTY.

UNCLE JOSHUA had not only a goodly number of veritable nephews and nieces, but he was the adopted uncle of the whole neighborhood where he resided. It may, however, be more satisfactory to our readers to have him formally introduced to their notice as Joshua Churchwood, Esq., a wealthy landholder in one of our Western States.

Uncle Joshua was a bachelor; and as his years already numbered more than threescore, it seemed highly probable that he would remain so. It was a question of deep interest with many of the wise ones around him, as to who would become heir to his rapidly increasing wealth; and to confess the truth, the same question frequently presented itself to Uncle Joshua's own mind, and caused him many serious reflections. A recent and somewhat alarming illness had aroused him to the performance of a prompt decision; and on the evening when we would first present him to the notice of our readers, he was seated before the cheerful wood fire, in his handsome, though lonely parlor, absorbed in a reverie, in which all his relations, distant and near, were passing before him in solemn review.

"I will not give to those who are not in need," he said, half aloud. "Brother Henry is a richer man than I am. To him and his children I will leave nothing but my love; and the same to sister Sally's. There is no use in feeding those who are already surfeited. Poor Margaret's boy may do for my heir. I wonder what sort of a fellow he is—like the father, perhaps. Got married a year ago; foolish boy! hardly out of his teens, and only a clerk's salary to depend upon! Well, well, I suppose he missed his mother, and so he took a wife." And an involuntary sigh from Uncle Joshua gave evidence that he was not unaware of the blessing of woman's love.

The young man to whom his thoughts were now directed, was the only child of a younger sister, who, having married against the wishes of her family, had for many years held little communication with them. Her husband was a man of little energy of character, and ill-fitted to struggle with the many trials of life. He died about three years before the commencement of our story, while yet in the prime of manhood; and ere another year had passed, his wife had followed him to the spirit world.

Frank was at this time in his nineteenth year, and was employed as clerk in a large mercantile establishment in the city. His health had always been delicate, and he depended greatly upon the affectionate care of his devoted mother. For months after her death, his health and spirits failed so entirely, that the duties of his situation were but very imperfectly fulfilled, and it was only through the kindness of his employers that he was retained in the establishment.

At length, the bright eyes and gentle smile of a young girl, an orphan like himself, awakened him to the consciousness that all was not lost. A happy future appeared before him; he could yet love and be loved. Health and vigor returned, and from the time that Ellen became his bride, the duties of life ceased to be irksome; and with a manly step, and a cheerful heart, he went about the business of the day. Ellen brought him no fortune, but their wants were few, and his salary was sufficient to afford them a comfortable maintenance. A widow lady, who had formerly let a part of her house to Frank's mother, now gladly received him as her tenant; and by her motherly advice and sympathy quite won the heart of the young housekeeper, who gladly profited by her counsels. And thus happily glided along the first year of married life.

But we must return to Uncle Joshua, whom we left seated in his arm chair, engaged in deep deliberations on the important subject of his will. His long-neglected nephew, Frank Maynard, seemed to him the only proper person to become his heir, always provided that he was a "promising young man, and had a taste for Western life."

"Can't have my fine farms sold," soliloquized Uncle Joshua. "But there is little danger that he would want to sell. Most independent life in the world. A poor clerk in the city would think it a happy exchange."

But then came confused thoughts, that by the time the will was carried into effect, Frank might no longer be a poor clerk. The Churchwood family were rather remarkable for longevity. Uncle Joshua might enjoy his own farms for many years yet. "But there was no telling what might happen, and therefore he would make inquiries concerning the young man, and if all seemed well, he should be the principal heir."

Certain legacies must be given. One or two poor relations must be considered; the orphan asylum must receive at least one thousand dollars; and then the housekeeper—good Mrs. Payton—she surely deserved some token of remembrance. And as Uncle Joshua's reflections reached this point, Mrs. Payton herself appeared at the door, and informed Mr. Churchwood with her usual respectful manner, that supper was quite ready.

The interruption was by no means an unpleasant one, and Uncle Joshua willingly deferred the further consideration of events which were to succeed his death, and proceeded at once to partake of the tempting repast designed to prolong his stay on earth.

The knowledge of his generous intentions towards Mrs. Payton gave a wonderful complacency to his manners towards her, and observing the marks of recent tears upon her cheeks, he kindly inquired the cause of her sadness, and whether he could be of service to her.

Mrs. Payton was a widow with one child, a promising boy of twelve years, on whom all her earthly hopes had centered. Her situation at Mr. Churchwood's not only afforded her a comfortable home, but it enabled her to provide suitably for her boy, who was kindly cared for in the family of her sister. For three years she had sent him to a good school, and her heart was gladdened by his good behavior and rapid progress.

"But this could not last always," as she said to Mr. Churchwood, in answer to his inquiries. "Edmund must be put in a way to earn his own living. He had already got a power of learning, and Mr. Blanchard the carpenter wanted a young apprentice. So it was a good chance for him."

"Does the boy fancy the trade?" asked Uncle Joshua, thoughtfully.

"Not at all, sir; that is what troubles me. He has been to see me this evening, and pleaded so hard for a little more schooling, that it made my heart ache to refuse him. But every one says I ought not to lose the opportunity."

"Mr. Blanchard is a worthy man, undoubtedly," replied Mr. Churchwood; "but the boy's inclinations should be consulted. What trade does he fancy?"

"None whatever, sir—nothing but the books. And that will not do for me, you know."

"The teacher gives him the character of an excellent scholar," observed Uncle Joshua, with a thoughtful shake of the head.

"He does, indeed, sir; and learning is a fine thing. But poor folks must earn their living."

Perhaps Uncle Joshua did not hear the last remark, for he seemed quite absorbed in his own reflections. Mrs. Payton feared that her unusual garrulity had displeased him, and wisely said no more.

"There is no time like the present!" exclaimed the old gentleman, suddenly breaking the silence, and almost unconsciously giving utterance to his thoughts.

"To speak plainly, Mrs. Payton, I have intended remembering you in my will."

"Heaven forbid that you should think of that at present, sir," exclaimed the good housekeeper.

"It is time to think of it, my good woman," returned Uncle Joshua, with some solemnity. "But, as I just observed, I have intended remembering you in my will. I thought a legacy of a few hundred would be useful to you, and your services justly entitle you to consideration. But if you prefer help at the present time, I will devote the sum which I had intended to bequeath to you, to the education of your son. Education is a capital investment of property. If the young man proves worthy, he may make you a rich return."

"He is a good boy, indeed!" exclaimed the delighted mother.

"Bless you for your kindness, sir. I would rather have Edmund well educated, than to be made the richest lady in the land."

"Set your heart at rest, then, for it shall be done," replied Uncle Joshua. "I will attend to it at once. The boy shall be placed at the best school in this part of the country."

With another burst of gratitude, Mrs. Payton retired from the room, eager to relieve her own excited feelings by communicating the glad news to her son; while Uncle Joshua indulged in a second reverie, differing but little from the first, excepting that there was a feeling of satisfaction when he thought of Mrs. Payton, and of the pleasure he should experience in being an eye-witness to the good fruits of at least one of his legacies.

"And now that I have taken the business in hand, I will have it all settled at once," he said to himself, as he retired for the night. "I will write to some of my old friends at the East, and make inquiries concerning my nephew. Meantime I will take a peep at the Orphan Asylum, and decide what sum to bequeath to it. And then that family of poor cousins. I must remember them. They are in need, I am told. My mind will be easy when the legal document is drawn up. Lawyer Bruce will do it for me in good shape." And thus ended Uncle Joshua's soliloquy for the night.

Promptness is a rare virtue, but it was one which Uncle Joshua undoubtedly possessed. Neither weeks nor days had passed before a letter was despatched to an old friend in the great Eastern city where Frank Maynard was a resident, making particular inquiries respecting the young man's character and prospects; while Uncle Joshua himself, after putting the letter into the office with his own hand, turned his horse's head in the direction of the Orphan Asylum, and was soon engaged in earnest conversation with the matron of the establishment. Uncle Joshua loved children; there was a tender spot in his heart, which always yielded at once to their bright eyes and glad voices. This institution had grown up under his own observation, and he had already contributed largely to its support. Others had also done much, but there yet remained much to be done; and secure of the sympathy of her visitor, the matron poured the list of wants and troubles into his attentive ear. So much more good might be done, if their means were a little enlarged. It was sad to think of it, but then people had done a great deal already.

Uncle Joshua's face wore its thoughtful expression again. He thought of his intended legacy, and his favorite motto, "There's no time like the present," came forcibly to his mind. He could easily spare a thousand dollars. Even should his life be prolonged many years, he would not feel the loss. And how pleasant to aid the little ones who were now before him, and to feel that they would have reason to bless his memory long after he had passed from earth.

"I will see the treasurer," was his cheering promise to the matron, as he bade her good morning; and before many days had passed, it was noised abroad that great improvements were to be made in the Orphan Asylum, in consequence of a handsome donation lately received. Other wealthy citizens followed the example of Uncle Joshua, and the good results of their benevolence were soon apparent in the charitable institution.

"Another legacy disposed of," thought Uncle Joshua. "I shall be my own executor after all."

In due time came the answer to the letter respecting Frank Maynard, but it was not clear and explicit enough to satisfy his uncle. It stated briefly that the young man was a clerk in a very respectable establishment, and was well thought of by his employers.

"But I want to know something of his private character," said Uncle Joshua, as he finished perusing the unsatisfactory epistle. "A man may be one thing in business and another at home. I have half a mind to take a trip to the eastward myself. Let me think—forty years since I last saw my native city. It is time I took another peep at it; and travelling has got to be an easy matter now-a-days. I need not be long absent, and Stevens can be trusted to attend to affairs here. Yes, I will go."

The matter once decided upon, it took but a short time to complete the necessary arrangements; and but a few days elapsed, ere Uncle Joshua found himself whirling along the great western railroad, at what he could not but consider as an alarming rate. The composed and satisfied countenances of those around him tended to re-assure him, however, and with many reflections upon the wonderful changes which had taken place since he first resolved to seek his fortune in the West, he abandoned all fears for his safety, and enjoyed his novel situation with the keen zest of a schoolboy.

More than a year had passed since our young couple had taken possession of their bridal home, but we still find them in the same neatly furnished rooms. The cradle in which Frank himself had been rocked, has lately been dragged from its hiding-place in the garret of a friend, with whom it had been stored for safe keeping, and now stands in that cozy little parlor, while the young mother bends with delight over the tiny treasure which it contains.

Frank's eye also brightens as he enters the room on his return from his daily employment, and gazes fondly on this new blessing. But his step is less firm than it is wont to be; and an expression of extreme languor comes over his countenance, as he takes his accustomed seat.

"Are you ill, dear?" asked Ellen, anxiously, as she watched his movements.

"Not ill, but weary, Ellen—very weary. This close confinement to the conating room is ruining my health. I have never been so sensible of its ill effects as within the last few weeks."

The words fell like a chill upon Ellen's heart.

"Is there no other way of gaining a support?" she asked, as she gazed sorrowfully upon her husband. "You are very young. Can you not engage in some more active business?"

"Capital is needed in almost everything," was the reply, "and that we do not possess. If I were unmarried, I believe I would go to the West. It would do me good to 'rough it in the bush,' but I cannot expose my treasures to the privations and dangers of such a life."

"Far better to expose us to those trials than to endanger your health, and perhaps your life, by continuing in an employment which you feel to be injurious to you," pleaded Ellen, earnestly.

"You magnify the danger, Ellen. I am sorry that I have thus disturbed you. Let us think no more of it. Another day I shall feel better."

The young wife was silenced, but not convinced; and as each succeeding evening continued to bring Frank weary and exhausted to his home, her anxiety increased, and she felt that any hardships would seem light when compared with the misery of seeing his health and strength thus failing from the confinement of his present situation.

"A gentleman wishes to see me, did you say, Mary?" repeated Mrs. Maynard, in some surprise, as her little handmaiden summoned her to the parlor one afternoon in the latter part of autumn. "Yes, ma'am. A very nice old gentleman. He asked for Mr. Maynard, and when I told him he was not in, he said he would like to see you."

"Very well, Mary; say I will be down directly." And with the infant in her arms, Ellen quickly descended to the parlor.

Uncle Joshua certainly deserved the appellation of a "nice old gentleman;" and the mistress fully agreed with her little maid, as he greeted her with one of his peculiarly pleasant smiles, and informed her in his plain, kind manner, that his name was Joshua Churchwood, and that he was uncle to her husband.

Ellen had heard of the existence of such an uncle, and she had a confused idea that he resided somewhere in the western world; but Frank being himself entirely unacquainted with his relations, seldom spoke of them to his wife, and she was quite ignorant of Uncle Joshua's situation in life, and of the great advantages which might result from gaining his good opinion.

But her sweet voice and affectionate greeting found its way at once to Uncle Joshua's heart; and long before Frank's return, they were chatting together as freely as if they had known each other for years.

Delighted to have found a relation of Frank's to whom she could confide her anxieties, Ellen told of all her fears on Frank's account, and asked numberless questions about the West, "hoping, as she said, to be able to convince Frank that a wife and child need not prevent him from going there if he desired it."

No wonder that Uncle Joshua's motto came forcibly to his mind, "No time like the present." Why not take the young folks home with him at once? He had enough for all; and if Frank was to be his heir, why not treat him as a son during the remainder of his life?

Uncle Joshua's face absolutely shone with pleasure, as he thought of the happiness it was in his power to bestow; and his satisfaction was by no means diminished when his nephew appeared. The well-remembered features of his younger sister, who had been his pet and plaything in his boyish days, were clearly reflected in the countenance of her son; and the old gentleman's voice faltered, and his eyes were suffused with moisture, as he shook him warmly by the hand.

"My dear boy, I am glad to know you now, and I wish I had known you before," were words which called forth a responsive feeling of affection in the warm-hearted young man before him.

It was a happy evening for all parties; and before its close, Uncle Joshua's visit had been explained, and the young couple promised to share his Western home, and be to him as affectionate children in his declining years.

Another month had passed, and good Mrs. Payton had welcomed with no little bustle and ceremony, the return of Uncle Joshua and his young family. The little infant was quietly sleeping in his new home, while the old gentleman gazed first upon him, and then upon his parents, exclaiming, as he rubbed his hands together in the fullness of his joy:

"Well, Frank, my boy, this seems like comfort. I like being my own executor. Now I have nothing to do, but to send a few hundred to those poor cousins of ours, and then give you a deed of all my property. And I am no longer a lonely old man. I have those around me whom I can love, and who will love me. My motto is a good one—'There is no time like the present.'"

LOVE.

The earth is full of love, albeit the storms
Of passion mar its influence benign;
And down its voice with discord. Every flower
That to the sun its heaving breast expands,
Is born of love; and every song of birds,
That floats melodiously on the balmy air,
Is but a love note.—THOMAS HAGO.

THE PRINCE OF THE FORESTS.

BY FRANCIS A. HERIVAGE.

IN the province of Valois, near the woods of Villers Cotterets, there were a little boy and girl, who met from time to time on the banks of the little streams of the country—the one, compelled by a woodcutter named Oak-Twister, who was his uncle, to pick up dead wood; the other, sent by her parents to collect the little reeds which the subiding of the waters at certain seasons renders visible in the slime. She had also to watch for crawfish, which were very numerous in certain localities.

But the poor child, always stooping with her feet in the water, was so compassionate for the sufferings of animals, that generally, on witnessing the contortions of the fish-bow as she drew them from the river, she restored them to the water, only retaining the crawfish, which sometimes drew blood from her fingers, and to which she was therefore less indulgent. The little boy, for his part, made fagots of dried wood and bundles of brush, often exposed to the reproaches of Oak-Twister, either because he had not brought home enough, or because he had been too busy talking with the little fish-girl.

There was a certain day in the week on which the children never met—the same, doubtless, on which the fairy Melusma changed herself into a fish, and the princesses of Elda were transformed to swans. The morning after one of these days the little woodcutter said to the fish-girl:

"Do you remember that yesterday I saw you pass below in the waters of Challepoint with all the fishes escorting you, even to the carps and pikes; and you yourself were a beautiful red fish, with your sides all glittering with scales of gold?"

"I remember it well," said the little girl, "since I saw you on the banks of the stream, and you were like a beautiful green oak, whose branches were of fine gold, and all the trees of the wood bent to the earth, saluting you."

"It is true," replied the little boy. "I dreamed all that."

"And I dreamed what you told me. But how happened it we both met in a dream?"

At this moment the conversation was interrupted by the appearance of Oak-Twister, who struck the boy with a heavy staff, reproaching him with not having bound a single fagot.

"And then," added he, "didn't I order you to twist off the branches which yield readily, and add them to your fagots?"

"But," said the boy, "the guard would put me in prison, if he found green wood in my fagots; and then, when I wished to do as you told me, I heard the tree moaning."

"Just so," said the little girl, "when I am carrying away the fishes in my basket—I hear them singing so sadly, that I throw them back into the water. Then they beat me at home."

"Silence, little masque!" said Oak-Twister, who seemed excited by drink. "You hinder my nephew at his work. I know you with your pointed teeth, the color of pearls. You are the queen of the fishes. But I shall know how to take you on a certain day of the week, and you shall die in the basket—in the basket!"

The threats which Oak-Twister had made in his drunkenness were before long accomplished. The little girl found herself caught under the form of the red fish, which destiny had obliged her to snare on certain days. Happily, when Oak-Twister wished, by the help of his nephew, to take the wicker trap from the water, the latter recognized the beautiful red fish with scales of gold which he had seen in his dream, as being the accidental transformation of the little fish-girl. He ventured to defend her against Oak-Twister, and even struck him. The latter, furious, seized him by the hair, and tried to throw him, but was astonished to find a great resistance. The boy's feet clung to the earth with such tenacity, that his uncle could neither overthrow him nor lift him, though he twisted him in every direction.

At the moment when the child's resistance was about to be overcome, the trees of the forest shuddered with a deep sound; the agitated branches gave passage to the winds, and Oak-Twister, recoiling from the tempest, rushed into his hut. He soon came back, threatening terrible revenge, and changed, as a son of Odin. In his hand gleamed the Scandinavian axe, which threatened the trees, like the hammer of Thor breaking rocks.

The young Prince of the Forests, the victim of his uncle the usurer, now knew his rank which they had sought to conceal from him. The trees protected him, but only by their bulk and passive resistance. In vain did the thorns and the saplings twist together on all sides to arrest the steps of Oak-Twister. The latter had summoned his woodcutters, and was carving a path through all obstacles. Already many trees, formerly sacred in the days of the old druids, had fallen under axes and bills.

Happily the Queen of the Fishes lost no time. She had thrown herself at the feet of the Marne, the Aisne, and the Oise, the three great rivers of the neighborhood, showing them that if the projects of Oak-Twister and his companions were not arrested, the forests, too widely cleared, would no longer collect the vapors that produce rain and furnish water to the streams, rivers and ponds; that the fountains themselves would dry up and cease to feed the rivers, to say nothing of the speedy destruction of the fishes, the game and the birds.

Thereupon the three great rivers made such arrangements, that the ground was entirely swept by an inundation which speedily destroyed the aggressors. The Prince of the Forests and the Queen of the Fishes could now resume their innocent interviews. They were no longer a little woodcutter and a little fish-girl, but a Sylph and an Undine, who were afterwards legally united in the bonds of matrimony. Such is the allegory of the union of wood and wave still current in the Valois.

ELIZABETH CITY, NEW JERSEY.

M. M. BALLOU, Esq.,—Dear Sir:—After an interregnum of some months duration, I resume the pleasurable task of furnishing you, and through you, your many thousand readers with the result of my wanderings in search of the picturesque. Beginning nearest my point d'appui, I present you herewith a group of illustrations of the City of Elizabeth, N. J., a place of some considerable suburban importance, whose rapid growth of late years is a striking evidence of the repletion of the neighboring metropolis. Notwithstanding it is the oldest (English) town to the State, it ranked among the second or third rate towns until within the past ten years, when the influx of residents, whose business is in the great metropolis, having given it a start, its prospect are now second to none of its sister towns or cities. The New Jersey Railroad, which passes through it and affords communication with New York some fifteen or twenty times per day, and the New Jersey Central Railroad, which now extends from Elizabethtown Point, on the one hand, to the mines of Pennsylvania, on the other, have been the immediate means of the prosperity and full development of the place.

The land on which Elizabethtown is situated was purchased from the Indians, in 1664, by John Bailey, Daniel Denton and Luke Watson, and a charter was granted to them and their associates by Gov. Richard Nichols. The land was known and designated as the "Elizabethtown grant," and the first settlers as the "Elizabethtown Associates." They were not permitted to occupy their purchase in quietude, for there were a number of persons who claimed to have a title to the grant by virtue of a warrant from the Duke of York, and the commotions, strife, and difficulties arising from these rival claims, were seriously detrimental to the growth of the place.

In 1665, Gov. Philip Carteret, of East Jersey, settled here, and fixed the capital of the province, naming the place in honor of his brother's wife, Lady Elizabeth Carteret. At this time there were but five log huts in the town, but settlers were soon attracted to the seat of the provincial government, and it assumed an air of importance, which made it for many years the most flourishing town in East Jersey. The first General Assembly met here in 1668, and continued its sessions until 1682, when it was removed to Perth Amboy, and after fluctuating from place to place, was finally established at Trenton.

A large proportion of the settlers being from New England, and such as were driven from England by religious persecution, it is natural to suppose that the doctrines and influence of the Puritans were paramount; and we find the first church edifice erected was the Presbyterian, which is, in fact, the oldest congregation in the State, dating its origin in 1666. The church stood on the site of the present one (represented in the large engraving), and was a very venerable and antique structure. After standing over a hundred years, it was ruthlessly fired by the hands of a tory, named Jacob Hetfield, and burned to the ground in 1780.

Elizabeth is situated on Elizabeth Creek, an inconsiderable stream, which empties into Staten Island Sound, about 2 1/2 miles from its mouth, where is situated Elizabethport. The two places are rapidly approximating, and will shortly be embraced within the same bounds. The latter is a thriving place, having considerable trade. Steamboats and sail-vessels ply between it and New York daily, and the depot of the New Jersey Central Railroad being located here, gives to it an appearance of great activity. During the Revolutionary war, both places, from their proximity to Staten Island, where a large portion of the British army was stationed, were subject to all the accumulated horrors of that struggle for independence. The inhabitants were continually harassed by incursions of foraging and other parties of troops, added to which, the disaffected in their midst kept them in a constant state of fear and excitement. Being the main thoroughfare into "the Jerseys," from whence the troops of the enemy drew most of their supplies, the streets of the two towns were alternately occupied by parties of British and Americans, who frequently encountered each other in hostile array, and shed each other's blood.

The influence and example of such men as Gov. William Livingston and Rev. James Caldwell had a powerful effect to keep alive the spirit of patriotism in the breasts of the better part of the inhabitants; although it is not a matter of surprise that there should have been a considerable amount of illicit trading with the enemy, when the facts are considered. The Americans were poor and paid in worthless continental money, while the British paid for all supplies in substantial and attractive gold. The temptation was too great to be resisted, and many persons, whose patriotism was undoubted, preferred the market at Staten Island to that of the American camp, although the traffic at the former was attended with much danger and risk of life and limb. The page of history bears witness to many scenes of thrilling interest as occurring in this vicinity; and although I long to dwell in view of subjects of such absorbing interest, yet a due consideration of your pre-occupied space, and the patience of your readers, will allow me only to notice the more prominent incidents in the lives of the two gentlemen who are mentioned above, and whose names are intimately associated with the Revolutionary history of the place.

When the struggle for independence commenced, William Franklin, the only son of Dr. Benjamin Franklin, was the royal governor of New Jersey. Unlike his father, he took sides with the king, and the provincial legislature declared him to be a dangerous enemy to the common cause. He was arrested at his residence at Perth Amboy, and sent to Connecticut, and William Livingston elected in his stead. This gentleman belonged to that noble family which furnished so many distinguished names to the annals of the Revolution. He was a graduate of Yale College, and possessed talents of the highest order. His patriotism was as eminent as his talents, and such was the high estimation in which he was held by the people, that he was re-elected annually to the office of governor, until his death, in 1790. He was an active partizan, and was constantly employed in aiding the cause of the Republicans. This, of course, attracted towards him the particular attention of the enemy, and several attempts were made to seize his person. For this purpose, Sir Henry Clinton sent an expedition from New York, which landed at Elizabethtown Point about 12 o'clock on the night of the 28th of February, 1779, and marched directly to "Liberty Hall," the residence of the governor, which was about three miles distant. Surrounding the house, they burst open the doors, and demanded of the frightened inmates the person of the "d-d rebel governor." Fortunately he had gone to spend the night with a friend, and thus escaped capture. Disappointed in their search, the marauders demanded his papers and effects. These were in the parlor, in the box of his sally, but the presence of mind of his daughter preserved them from capture. Seeing one of the men about to seize the box, she claimed it from the officer in command, asserting that it contained her own private effects, and appealing to his sense of honor as a gentleman and a soldier, not to permit a defenceless female to be robbed. He could not resist the appeal, and ordered a guard stationed over the box, while the brave girl led his men to the library, where she surrendered to them a mass of worthless law papers, with which they filled their foraging bags and decamped. On another occasion, when Knyphausen, who had marched to attack Greene at the Short-hills, and had been forced to retreat, was marching through Elizabethtown, a number of British officers stopped at the house in pursuit of the governor, who was again fortunately absent. They however intimated their intention to take up their quarters there; and as there was no gainsaying them, the females of the family retired to rest, feeling secure from molestation by the troops, while their officers were in the house. It happened, however, that they were called away in the night, and a short time afterwards a party of Tories and Hessians entered, and threatened to burn the house over their heads. The ladies retreated to their room, where they locked themselves in, while the servants hid themselves in the kitchen. The drunken assailants soon found out the hiding-place of the former, and threatened to break in the door unless they were admitted. At this juncture, one of the young females (probably the same brave girl who had saved her father's papers), thinking it best to show an appearance of courage, which they did not feel, opened the door, and as one of the wretches seized her by the arm, she grasped him by the collar in a threatening manner, which induced him to look up, and a gleam of light shooting athwart the hall at the moment, and falling upon her white dress, he staggered back in affright, exclaiming, as he did so, "God! it's Mrs. Caldwell that we killed to-day!" Alarmed by their own superstitious fears, the party soon after left the house without any further demonstration of hostility. Governor Livingston's proximity to the enemy laid him open to surprise and capture, and he was subject to constant alarm, particularly as a reward had been offered for his arrest. At one time it is said that Sir Henry Clinton offered a bounty for his assassination, and induced a notorious Tory to undertake the task. Governor Livingston accused Clinton of this base endeavor, and the following correspondence ensued.

Gov. Livingston to Gen. Clinton.

Elizabethtown, March 29, 1779.

"SIR:—I beg leave to acquaint you that I am possessed of the most authentic proofs that a general officer under your command has offered a large sum of money to an inhabitant of this State to assassinate me, in case he could not take me alive. This, sir, is so repugnant to the character which I have hitherto formed of Sir Henry Clinton, that I think it highly improbable you should either countenance, connive at, or be privy to a design so sanguinary and disgraceful. Taking it, however, for granted, that you are a gentleman of too much spirit to disown anything you think proper to allet, I give you the opportunity of disavowing such dark proceedings, if undertaken without your approbation—assuring you at the same time, that if countenanced by you, your person is more in my power than I have reason to think you imagine. I have the honor to be, with all due respect, your excellency's most humble servant.

WILLIAM LIVINGSTON."

Sir Henry Clinton to Gov. Livingston.

New York, April 10, 1779.

"SIR:—As you address me on a grave subject (no less than life and death, and your own person concerned), I condescend to answer you; but must not be troubled with any further correspondence with Mr. Livingston. Had I a soul capable of harboring so infamous an idea as assassination, you, sir, at least, would have nothing to fear; for, be assured, I should not blacken myself with so foul a crime to obtain so trifling an end. Sensible of the power (of being able to dispose of my life, by means of intimates of yours, ready to murder at your command), I can only congratulate you on your amiable connections, and acknowledge myself your most humble servant.

H. CLINTON.

"Wm. Livingston, Esq., New Jersey."

Not satisfied to let the subject rest here, Livingston addressed a somewhat sarcastic reply, closing with the following language:

"As to your 'must not be troubled with any further correspondence with Mr. Livingston,' believe me, sir, that I have not the least passion for interrupting your most useful correspondence with the British ministry, by which the nation will doubtless be greatly edified, and which will probably furnish materials for the most authentic history of the present war—and that you cannot be less ambitious of my correspondence than I am of yours; because, whatever improvement I might hope to receive from you in the art of war (and especially in the particular branches of conducting moonlight retreats and secret expeditions, I should not expect from our correspondence any considerable education or refinement in the epistolary way. I am therefore extremely willing to terminate it by wishing you a safe voyage across the Atlantic, with the singular glory of having attempted to reduce to bondage a people determined to be free and independent."

To understand the allusion above, to "moonlight retreats" and "secret expeditions," it may be necessary to state, that Sir Henry, in his report to the ministry regarding the retreat after the battle of Monmouth, had said that he "took advantage of the moonlight," whereas the moon had set two hours before he commenced to move; and also that none of his secret expeditions were successful, owing probably to a want of generalship.—I have given a view of "Liberty Hall," the residence of Gov. Livingston during his lifetime, and the place of his decease, July 25, 1790. This house, now the property of John Kenn, Esq., is still standing on the road gregation were led to adopt his views, and many of them were enrolled in the American army. He himself joined the patriot host in the capacity of chaplain. Many anecdotes are related of his fervency and zeal in the cause of his country, as well as of his God. Such was the animosity engendered in the breasts of the Tories by his activity and efficiency, that fearing for the safety of his family, he removed them to Connecticut Farms, about four miles from Elizabethtown, where he thought them comparatively safe. He was destined to bitter disappointment, however, for when Knyphausen marched from Staten Island to attack the Americans at the Short-hills, he passed through Connecticut Farms, which he reduced to ashes, and Mrs. Caldwell was killed by a renegade soldier, who had formerly been in the employ of her husband, and entertaining a malignant feeling against him for some fancied affront, took this coarse to revenge himself. Mrs. Caldwell was lying down in an inner room, when her servant informed her that a British soldier was crossing the yard towards the house. She rose with her infant in her arms, and the wretch fired through the window, killing her instantly. At the time of her death, Mr. Caldwell was with the army at Springfield, in fearful suspense, which was only relieved by news received next morning, of the murder of his wife. Mr. Caldwell was himself shot by an American sentinel, at Elizabethtown, a little more than a year afterwards. He had gone to the port to receive a young lady, who had come under the protection of a flag of truce from New York; but not finding her on board of the vessel, he took charge of a small bundle which belonged to her, and with which he was proceeding to his chaise, when he was accosted by the sentinel, a man named Morgan, who demanded the surrender of the bundle that he might examine it. This Mr. Caldwell refused, and turning to go back to the vessel, he was shot in the back and instantly killed. Morgan was convicted of murder, and hung at Westfield. The body of Mr. Caldwell was conveyed to the house of Mrs. Noel, in Elizabethtown, where his congregation learned of their bereavement the next morning (Sunday), when they came to hear him preach. His funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. Alexander McWhorter, of Newark, on the following Tuesday. Previous to his burial, the body was placed where the concourse which had attended could view his remains, and after the services were closed, Dr. Elias Boudinot came forward, leading a group of nine orphan children, who were by this second calamity left to the cold charity of the world. Placing them around the bier on which was the remains of their parent, he touchingly appealed in their behalf to the multitude assembled, which was nobly responded to, and they all lived to fill prominent and useful positions in society. Dr. Caldwell was a man re-markedly beloved by all but the enemies of his country. His church, which was a wooden structure, and occupied the site of the present brick one represented in the first large engraving, was given up to the American troops as a hospital; and the spire was used as an observatory, from whence the movements of the British on Staten Island were watched. Elizabeth has, owing to the rapid influx of persons from the city of New York, from which it is only about thirteen miles, recently assumed an air of thriving importance, commensurate with its rapid growth and future prospects. Having been incorporated as a city, it is assuming all the privileges and responsibilities of a city government, and bids fair to take its stand among, if not to rival some of its more prominent sister corporations. The large view given above is a truthful representation of what is usually a very busy scene. It is taken from near the depot looking south, along the main street. In the middle ground the tracks of the two railroads are seen crossing each other at an acute angle, and running along on either side of the hand-ome depot, recently erected for the convenience of passengers and freight. The residence of Chancellor Williamson (seen in one of the smaller cuts), is situated a short distance north of the depot, on the main thoroughfare, and is surrounded by many handsome private dwellings. Not to pass over the claims of Elizabethtown, for representation, I have given a characteristic scene in the centre of the place, the prominent features of which are the depot of the New Jersey Central Railroad, the hotel, and the distant shores of Staten Island. The straggling nature of the village precluded the possibility of giving a more comprehensive view, or I should have done so. And now I take my leave for the present, by subscribing myself,

LINES

On seeing MRS. KELLER in the Triumph of Galatea.

BY W. H. C. ROSMER.

I thought it was a dream—a shadowy myth
Born of the fabled fancy of old Greece;
But lo! the blushing Paphian queen of love
Rises in new-born beauty from the waves!
In the voluptuous splendor of her charms:
What grace of figure matched to royal mien!
What rounded outlines to the snow-white arm,
That shames the marble with its lustrous glow!
It cannot be a creature born of clay
That thus excels in loveliness divine
The high ideal of a poet's soul.
Ethereal essence sparkles in her glance,
And a charmed hush is in the listening air,
A glory far beyond expression bright,
In the mute sky, as if the natural world
Welcomed a creature so divinely fair.
The whiteness of the foam-flake on her cheek
Commingles with a rich Auroral dye
Caught from the morn-kissed wave.

Young queen, all hail!
Attending nymphs are round thee, and the sea,
Enamored of thy presence, basks in light,
While in thy rocking, rose-lipped shell afloat
Borne onward art thou, without aid of oar,
To an enchanted home in Cyprian bowers.

COUSIN JULIA.

BY SARAH HAMMOND.

Looking over a trunk of valuables, the other day,—valuable for the pleasant reminiscences connected with them, valuable because dear hands had consecrated them,—my eye fastened upon a package of letters, firmly bound together by a long piece of red tape. The handwriting was easy, graceful and even elegant. As the author of these—a fair cousin of mine—has long since entered the circle matrimonial, and is now the pride of a fond husband, the perfection of all that is good to numerous little ones who call her by the loving name of mother, perhaps she will have no very serious objections to our presenting them to the public, making use of fictitious names for the real.

May 15, 1844.—Here I am, dear Grace, in the big noisy city. The whirl of wheels, the tramp of thronging feet, the dusty streets, the never-ending rattle of business, gives me a feeling that borders somewhat on homesickness. It is all so different from the green fields, the pleasant shade, the quiet I have left behind me; and not more different are all these sights and sounds, than the faces by which I am surrounded from those that now shine before me, as I sit alone in my chamber. But this I must expect—did expect; but I feel it none the less for all that.

I came directly to Aunt Mussey's; my hand trembled a bit as I pulled the door-bell—it was not one of those natural, vigorous pulls that go jingling to the heart and tell of a pleasant arrival; but it accomplished its errand, and I was ushered into the presence of a fair, somewhat haughty-looking lady, whom I at once recognized as my Aunt Ina. I had not seen her for many years, not since I was a little girl; still there were traces of the old face, that had once won my childish love. Time had hardened, fashion distorted, and pride marred the soft beauty that once characterized it; still those regular features were the same. She gave me quite a cordial welcome, insisted upon nyming my bonnet-strings, and offered me her own easy chair; but there was something in her manners, I hardly know how to describe it, Gracie, and you cannot imagine it, unless you have some time felt it, that jarred, awoke a wrong note in my bosom—a sort of patronizing air, that you cannot find fault with in words, but nevertheless calls forth a feeling of resentment. I always long to say I do not need it, that I can stand alone, proud in my poverty; and then comes the bitter afterthought of dependence; yes, the poor must labor for the rich, but the mind need never grovel. All these things and many more passed through my mind, while she was endeavoring to act the agreeable, striving to make me feel at home in her splendid cage. If she would only have left me alone, I could have pillowed my head upon her crimson cushions, and felt to enjoy the soft touch of velvet and silk. I could have looked in the broad mirror at my own rosy face, and thanked nature for her kindness. It is not vanity that prompts me to say this, but my heart is offering its own frank thoughts to only you, dear Grace.

My dress was plain, but there was no glare about it, to disturb the harmony of colors; and had it not been for the over-fidgery kindness of my hostess, I think I should have noted the lady at once. My cousins, Georgianna and Maria, were from home, on a shopping expedition. Georgianna, my aunt informed me, was considered very beautiful, quite a belle. Maria was plainer, but very accomplished. I forgave this display of the daughters' good qualities, for there was so much motherly feeling mixed in with the vanity that I could not help it. I was soon conducted to my chamber to arrange my hair and prepare for tea. It is a pleasant little apartment, commands a fine lookout, and, since I have hung my dresses in the closet, arranged my books, got my writing-desk and work-box out, it seems, or begins to seem, a little right, a little like home. I had hardly time to finish my toilet before the tea bell summoned us below. I descended to the parlor, where I was introduced to my city cousins for the first time. They both gave me a pleasant greeting. I was rather disappointed at the non-appearance of my uncle, Mr. Mussey, for I had often heard him spoken of in terms of highest praise; but soon learnt he was absent on business, and would not return for a number of days.

Here let me leave you, Gracie, for I am still a stranger, and all is strange. Do not forget how much I shall need your kind encouraging letters. Adieu, until I write again. JULIA.

May 30.—He has come, uncle. Tuesday; a week ago to-night you would have laughed heartily to have seen the meeting. I was standing by one of the parlor windows, entirely alone, building all sorts of air castles, as usual, when I was interrupted by a quick step; the next moment a pair of great hands pushed back my hair, and held my face, where he, uncle, could read all its blushing, surprise, and curiosity.

"And so Cousin Julia has concluded to honor us with her presence a while, has she?" said he, laughing at my confusion. "I have no doubt but that we shall become excellent friends. Come," said he, flinging the sofa cushions on the carpet, to make a place for me by his side, "sit down here; there is time for a nice chat before tea."

He is a little strange; this uncle of mine, Gracie; but you could not help liking him at once. There is something in his open, genial countenance that inspires confidence at the first glance. His hair is heavy and dark, with here and there a gleam of silver; his eyes large, beaming with pleasantness. He is so different from aunt, I cannot help wondering how the world engrosses so large a share of her affections, blessed as she is with such a companion. He is so free, careless and independent, and minds so little for the "they say" of those around him, while she is a perfect specimen of propriety, all paralleled off with the straight lines of decorum. Why is it, cousin mine, that prosperity has so dissimilar an effect upon different individuals? Why does it contract, narrow down, all the good there is in some, while in others it is the means of giving play to all those finer vibrations of the soul? Little minds become contaminated by the world's touch; they seek only to gratify their vanity. Self swallows up the nobler aspirations of youth; gold removes the absolute necessity of toil. With folded hands, comes a dull apathy in regard to the welfare of others, till at last those bright traits of character that would have shed a holy radiance about their earthly pathway, in a less luxurious atmosphere, seemingly vanish in utter darkness. But there are those whose souls were originally run in so perfect a mould that these outward circumstances fail to distort, selfishness fails to sear. Their hearts and hands go together continually to do good. True greatness is appreciated by such in whatever garb it appears; and the tongue is not afraid to say "I like," though the world's voice fail to echo the sentiment.

Mr. Mussey is such a man; one that wears humanity gracefully—that can recognize a brother clad in home-spun garments as readily as he can appreciate broadcloth and linen. But I was going to tell you, Gracie—but my pen has not forgotten to run its old races you perceive, and will go where it likes. After tea was over, uncle asked if we, the girls and myself, would not like a moonlit stroll. That temptation was strong, but I thought of the unfinished dress of Maria's that was wanted for the next afternoon, and so declined, reluctantly, I confess, the pleasure. "But you must go," said uncle. "Why not? give us your reasons. Poh! I don't care anything about it; the girl has frocks enough. Where's your bonnet? Maria!"

There was a tone of reproof and impatience in his voice this time. "Bring me my cane." I looked up and at once felt the cause. An unmistakable frown was visible upon her brow, resembling a thunder-cloud at the dusk of day. My spirits deadened at once. O, how gladly would I have gone to my room! but there was now no retreat. The evening was beautiful, and spite of the ill-humor of my cousin, whom I very soon forgot, I enjoyed it to the full. The dark blue waters of the harbor, the dancing sails fluttering in their white beauty, the stately mansions gleaming in the moonlight, fair gardens just springing into the life and luxuriance of summer—how could I think of scowls and unfinished work, with my eyes feasting on so much? I knew I should suffer for it, but I put the thought far off, and lived only in the sunshine of the present; and is not this the wisest course to pursue, to enjoy what we can, and when we can? If I had done wrong, or needlessly given pain, then I should have suffered rightly; it would have been very different. Georgianna only bade me good-night upon our return. 'Tis late, dear Grace, and I must close. Do not forget your own cousin JULIA.

June 6.—Very many thanks for your last kind letter, dear Cousin Grace; I have been happier ever since it came. To be thus remembered is a happiness that I would not lose for the whole world. Tell mother not to worry about the strayed one. I am learning to be contented quite fast; but I don't forget, O no. I am with you continually. But I must hasten to tell you of the scattered cloud that so threatened to mar my sky of blue, when last I wrote. I took Maria's dress to my chamber that very night; there was a great deal of trimming about it, two or three flounces, and I knew if I was not very industrious, it would not be finished in season for the next day. I sat late, worked till I could work no longer, and then retired with a violent headache. The next day it was no better; but the dress was ready at the appointed time; how it happened I hardly know.

Georgianna knocked at my door to inquire how I was, before leaving, offering to stay with me, but I would not listen to it; said Maria was a cold, selfish girl, and ought to be ashamed of her conduct. But this I did not like, and I told her so, when she put her beautiful face down to mine, to kiss the pain away, as she said. I do not know why it was, but this little act of kindness completely overcame me. I cried heartily after she left, and it did me good—made me strong for a long time to come. The next morning I was much better, and went below to take a scolding from my good uncle and a command to touch no work for the next forty-eight hours, and to receive a condescending smile from Miss Maria, whose dress, Georgie whispered to me, was the most elegant thing out.

I must tell you one little incident, Grace, because I know it will please you. A few mornings after my arrival here, Georgie and Maria came to my room to have a "social good time," they said; but I could not help thinking a little curiosity had something to do with the call; nevertheless, I was glad to see them. Georgie is a vain little thing, beautiful and good-hearted, but not intellectual; Maria the reverse—lacks heart, but owns a cultivated mind. Georgie seated herself on the floor to arrange a bouquet, just brought from the garden, while Maria carelessly leaned over my table to examine my treasures—"story books," with just the slightest contemptuous smile playing about the corners of her mouth.

"But," said she, looking up with an entirely different expression—"French, German—you can't read these, Julia?"

"I try to sometimes," replied I; there was something so impressively ludicrous in her amazement that I could not help laughing.

"O, I am so glad!" exclaimed Georgie, springing up and scattering her flowers in all directions,—so glad! Cousin Julia, Maria thinks no one can know anything but just her dear self. So glad—so glad!"

"Hush, chatterbox!" said Maria, her dark eyes flashing. "Where did you learn such things, Julia? What good will they ever do you?"

"One that has drunk of the fountain of knowledge need not ask that question. May I answer, Yankee fashion, by putting the same to yourself?"

A graceful sweep of skirts, a jarring door, and Georgie and I were left to our comfort. I assisted her in re-arranging her flowers, which she bestowed upon me before leaving; they are very beautiful, and still grace my toilet-table. So you perceive, Gracie, a poor little sewing-girl like myself has no right to meddle with books; for what can she do with the high thoughts of master minds? for what right has she to know anything beyond her daily occupation? Why shouldn't poverty cramp the soul as well as the body? why should that he free to soar? Thank God for the blessed freedom of this land, that gives the child of the poor man equal advantages with that of the rich, to lay a foundation for future usefulness. Our common schools—what a glory they are to us! what a reproof to those who know not the good! Yes, Cousin Maria is learned, too learned to seek to fetter an unbacked mind, to take from it its own rightful wealth.

June 12.—A quiet Sabbath morning; not a cloud veils the clear blue of heaven. The finger of silence seems to have sealed the harsh voices of yesterday. No bustle, no rattling confusion. Now a solitary bell is heard, sending forth its voice on the still air; another and another, till the chime of ringing notes awakes a jubilee in the heart, joy, hope and faith in the future, when the clinging robes of earthly toil, earthly desires, shall vanish before the blest visions of immortality. Does it never seem strange to you, Gracie, that the things of this world so engross our minds? Transient pleasures which are but for a moment—how we toil for them! how we fret when they are beyond our reach! how seemingly forgetful we are of that which should be the end and aim of our being! How bowed down are our minds!

I sit at my chamber window and watch the stream of faces, as they glide by. How unintelligible are many of those thought-written brows! How eagerly do we gaze, to catch a glimpse of the veiled heart beneath! and yet we, who are acquainted with the emotions, the hidden springs that swell tumultuously in our own bosoms, can imagine the music, the discord that exists in all human souls.

You will, doubtless, ask me, Grace, why I am not one of the many who go to the house of worship this day. Why, I prefer the solitude of my chamber to listening to the deep-toned voice of one of God's servants, earnestly exhorting his children to seek that peace that cometh from above, that passeth human understanding. Uncle asked me that same question this morning. I have always evaded giving a direct answer, heretofore, when interrogated; but I knew by the calm, searching glance of his dark eyes that he would know the truth. So I told him frankly that I respected the pride of my aunt and cousins too much to accompany them to church; that if I were among entire strangers, it would be different—then my plain Quaker-like appearance would affect no one—not even myself; for I cared not for such trivial things, only as they pleased or pained my friends. My heart could sing hymns of thanksgiving of joy in any garb. He smiled, Gracie. I hardly know what he thought, for he made no reply; but I think he understands, sympathizes with me. I sincerely hope that big bump of generosity will not be allowed to disturb me. I am sorry I had to tell him, but how could I help it?

June 16.—Just as I feared, Grace. Uncle's generosity has acted. With the bonnet—a pretty little affair, trimmed with white ribbons,—came this slip of paper: "Julia must not be too proud to please her uncle; oblige me by accepting the enclosed," which proved to be a fifty dollar bill. I went immediately to the study, where he spends his mornings, to return the money. I did not want it, but he was apparently very busy with his newspaper, and would not hear a word; so, half-laughing, half-crying, I have come back to my room. What shall I do, Gracie? If it were not for a pair of blue eyes, a singing voice, that dwell beneath our home-roof, for whose welfare I have left you, loved ones, I could not brook all these things. Little Mag will never be able to buffet the world's rude ways alone; I must clear a path for her. When I think for what I have come here, I quite forget my pride, my restlessness. I can work forever with such an incentive to urge me on, and call it all pleasure. Here comes Georgie, with a face full of interesting items. Remember me as ever yours, JULIA.

July 30.—Dear cousin, I have come to you for rest—I am so weary. Do not think I am about to inflict upon you a fit of the "blues." Ah, no! but I thought a sight of your fresh, cheerful countenance, even though it had to come to me through the medium of the imagination, would do me good. I wanted to look into your brown eyes, to feel their kindly glance. It seems a long, long time since I left you. The glare and glitter of city life is so tiresome; we find so much tinsel beneath the show of pure gold, that we cannot help longing for the real, the true.

I know there are pure loving hearts that throb beneath the touch of fashion's magic fingers; but they are so covered up, buried so deep in finery, that we are quite apt to lose our way in seeking them. Georgie is such an one. At times the goodness, the truthfulness of her nature gleam forth in such beauty that it startles you, coming, as it does, from so unexpected a source,—times when she loses all thought of mere self, when her soul seems to drink in living inspiration,—times when the spirits of mercy and love lead her where they will; and children's cries and mother's lips bless her, with mingled tears of joy and hope for the glad future.

Evening. Aunt Ina still remains the condescending lady whom I first met, though I do not think her feelings are as cordial as then. Maria dislikes me thoroughly, which is very evident, except in her father's presence. He is loved and feared by the whole household; even Aunt Ina never opposes him. To-morrow I am to go to Cousin Marcia's. Aunt is apparently in a great hurry to have me away—why, I cannot imagine. You know how anxious she was to have me come. However, I am quite delighted with the idea. It is a pleasant place—a very paradise of flowers and trees, about three miles from the city. I have never spoken to you of this cousin, because I knew so little about her. She is the eldest of the family; was married when a mere child—some of aunt's maneuverings, I have understood. Her husband is nearly twice her age, but very wealthy, which, perhaps, will explain the whole. I send Mag a new sketch-book. You must criticise her work, now I am away. She has a fine taste; her pictures are bold and natural; but I fear she may grow careless. The dear child! God bless you all!
JULIA.

August 15.—Bright and early, dear cousin, was I up this glad morning, long before the dew-drops vanished. The air is redolent with the perfume of blossoms. O, these beautiful smiles of heaven! how can one be thankful enough for them? We breathe such an air of purity in their presence; their penciled leaves preach such sermons to our desponding hearts—"Behold the lilies of the field!" If God careth for these—if they are valuable in his sight, how much more precious are the lives of his children! for they shall bloom forever when transplanted by his hand, knowing no blight.

I have been very busy since I came here—very busy. Cousin Marcia said she sent for me to assist about some plain sewing; and did you know, Gracie, that plain sewing consists in everything but fitting dresses? Two rich brocades were to be finished immediately. Then was brought forward a little cloak of curious pattern. "Did I think I could cut and make one like it for Willie?" I would try. I succeeded beyond my most sanguine expectations. The cape and sleeves were to be embroidered. So I was a number of days in completing it. I overheard my cousin—accidentally of course—tell a rich neighbor she should save five dollars on that one garment.

Would you be rich, Gracie—would I be rich—if our souls were to be worn thus thread-bare in striving to save a few dirty coppers? O, they are poor indeed who begrudge the laborer his hire, who live as lives my cousin. You would blush at the meanness that walks these splendid apartments, could you look beneath that which is visible to the world—to that which greets my vision daily. I never felt more sincerely to utter the prayer, "give me neither poverty nor riches," than since I have been an inmate of this house. The breakfast bell rings, and I must bid you a hurried good-by.
JULIA.

September 4.—At uncle's again. Yesterday I was sitting in my cousin's back parlor, busily plying my needle, when my attention was attracted by hearing uncle's voice—"Get some one else, Marcia, if you are in such a hurry about your sewing. Julia is going home with me." A whispering voice answered. The dining-room opened and closed; I could only now and then catch a confused murmur. O, I did hope he would not go away and leave me; I did so long to hear his good honest heart talk once more,—so long to see Georgie,—that aunt, Maria, Marcia, were quite forgotten. I was not held long in suspense. Uncle's hearty laugh aroused me. "Come, child," said he, taking my work; "get your things quickly. The boys are waiting for us. Don't stop to fix up, or I shall be jealous, and an old man's jealousy—"

I heard no more, for I was half way up the stairs. I was determined to leave nothing. I would never return—no, never. Who did uncle mean by the boys? Fred was at college; had he come home? it must be. I had just locked my trunk, and was putting on my gloves, when Cousin Marcia entered. "Your wages, Miss Julia, I will pay you now; you may need the money; plain sewing, two shillings a day; four weeks, lacking three days."

I thanked her, took the vile stuff between the tips of my fingers, carefully enclosed it in a piece of brown wrapping paper, as if it had been an unclean thing. Don't exclaim, Gracie, for true as I am writing, I never thought of Cousin Marcia till I caught the angry, almost hideous brightening of her eye. She had seen all, understood and felt it keenly. I bowed, bade her good morning, and left, without one thought of envy. She was welcome to all the luxuries by which she was surrounded. I, a poor sewing girl, would not change places. I found uncle waiting for me, and with him two young gentlemen—one, too like the father not to be recognized at once. I think my cheeks flushed as I was presented to each in turn. Cousin Fred and his friend, Waldo Hamlin, a classmate, who hailed from the sunny South. New acquaintances seldom tend to make me feel at ease. I know not how it was, but before our drive was half ended, I could chatter and laugh as gaily as beneath the elm trees that shadow our home-land. "Here we are," cried Fred, giving me his hand; "mother, Georgie, where are you? All safe, you perceive, and captured a prisoner in the bargain."

I was met by a look of unexpectedness by the whole trio. The dimples were fairly dancing about Georgie's mouth, though the lips were firmly pressed together.

"We are glad to see you," said Maria, bowing slightly and returning to her book.

"Yes," said aunt. "I was telling Mr. Mussey, this morning, we must send—"

A look from said gentleman left the sentence uncompleted. The silence that followed was a little embarrassing. Georgie stole to my side. "Come to my room," said she, in a low undertone, "until you are rested; you look so pale and tired."

I rose mechanically, and followed her.

"Dear cousin," said she, as soon as we were out of hearing of the drawing-room voices, "you would mind them, will you? I am so glad you have come, and somebody else is glad, too—somebody who has asked me all about you; now, wouldn't you like to know?"

"No, Georgie; I rather you would not tell me."

"O, Julia, how strange you are! But did you know I have not been good once since you went away? Mother and Maria keep me so cross—so out of humor with myself, them and every one around me. Don't you think, Julia, Maria already monopolizes all of Mr. Hamlin's time? He hardly speaks to me. 'Tis books, poetry and sentiment from morning till night. I do so tire of such things. Don't scold!" said she, putting a white hand over my mouth, as she saw I was about to make some reply. "Why I should actually explode if I didn't talk to you, father and Fred, occasionally. I believe you all love me, if my head isn't filled with those hard, outrageous sayings that pucker Maria's mouth into such execrable twists."

I can't tell you, Gracie, half this little chatter-box said. I know that she would curl my hair instead of letting me braid it, that she insisted its red hue was only a rich auburn, and that she whispered a thousand flattering things in my ear, one of which I cannot remember well enough to tell. I know that the evening passed pleasantly. Uncle read his newspaper; aunt lounged on the sofa; Maria and Mr. Hamlin were discussing some author in one corner, while Fred, Georgie and myself were studying the language of a huge bouquet in another. I would say more, but I hear Georgie calling me. Truly yours,
JULIA.

September 30.—I am not, my own dear Grace, feeling very bright or remarkably happy this evening. I believe all the music, which usually keeps such a singing in my heart, has died out, only leaving a faint echo—the memory of happy hours passed, never to return. Fred requested an interview with me in the library this morning, and, Gracie, he asked me to be his wife, and I said no. O, with how much more calmness was it uttered than it is now written! Did I not love him? Yes, better than life; but I would never marry a man by whose side I could not stand proudly—his equal.

Georgie has just left me, with smiles and tears. She told me the glowing promises the future has in store for her, as the bride of Mr. Hamlin. Poor Maria! how will she bear all this?

Later. The darkness of night ushers in the gladsome day. How often are our drooping spirits, when shadowed by a mighty darkness, relieved by some unexpected ray of light that sheds a halo upon our whole future. Yesterday the gloom was impene-trable; not a beam cheered the way before me. To-day the whole world seems filled with joy, and uncle, dear uncle, is the blessed cause of all. This morning he joined me in my early walk about the garden. I think my face must have evidenced my heart's bitterness.

"You here, Julia?" said he, laying his hand on my arm; his voice was tremulous from inward emotion. "You are not happy, my child; may I guess the cause? My boy has told me all. Is it not false pride that builds a barrier between you and earthly happiness, that would destroy all the beauty and bloom of another's life? Long have you been the adopted child of my heart; why not give me the right to call you my own? Georgie soon leaves us to gladden another home. Maria," and his head bent low upon his hands,—"Maria, my poor girl, eloped last night with her German music-teacher."

O, how I pitied him! but what comfort were my weak words? She has hunched her frail back upon the moulded waves of uncertainty; she has heedlessly flung aside all the love, sympathy and protection of her home. Heaven help her! Before we parted, uncle succeeded in convincing me it was my duty to remain, to bring my mother and little Mag here. "I am rich; I can care for you all," said he, as he relinquished my hand at parting.

October 20.—No news from Maria. Aunt Ina has been quite sick; over-anxiety brought on a high fever. I did all I could for the invalid by my far off attentions; I dared not intrude by a too near approach; I feared the old dislike. To-day I thought she slept, and I stole softly into her room. I gazed upon the sad, troubled face. O, I thought if she would only let me love her!

Slowly she opened her eyes; a faint smile lit up the angular features. "I was about to withdraw, but she beckoned me back."

"My poor Julia," said she, "how pale you look! Do you know that your presence does me good? I have not slept through all your silent watches; but I was selfish; I longed to have you near me. Can you, will you forgive the past?"

Gracie, 'twas so sweet to clasp that hand in mine,—to feel that henceforth no coldness, no distrust could steal between us. It hardly seems possible that the proud, aristocratic woman whom I waited upon a few weeks since, and the gentle, childlike being that now leans so trustingly upon my care, are one; but as it is. Sorrow and sickness have broken the outer crust of worldly selfishness, that once so steeled her heart from all true sympathy.

October 25.—Fred has appointed the 30th for our visit home. What a thrill that word brings to my heart! "Home, sweet home!" We are all very quietly happy here. A long letter has been received from Maria, expressing, however, no regret for the step taken. Aunt Ina, pale and languid, sits in her easy chair, with Georgie at her feet, a world of tenderness beaming from her blue eyes. Uncle, all care and devotion, anticipates the invalid's slightest wish. I think, dear Grace, she is beginning to appreciate him. Fred and Waldo, when not too busy with their own affairs, entertain us with reading. Georgie is becoming quite an attentive listener. We shall raise her sadly. To-night she gives her hand to Mr. Hamlin. My bridal must take place in the little cottage on the hillside. Wish me joy, my cousin, for I am very happy.
JULIA.

PRESENT QUEEN OF GREECE.

The queen is a woman of thirty-five, who will not grow old for a long time; her enlancement will preserve her. She is of a powerful and vigorous constitution, backed by an iron health. Her beauty, famous fifteen years ago, may still be perceived, although delicacy has given way to strength. Her face is full and smiling, but somewhat stiff and prim; her look is gracious, not affable. It would seem as though she smiled provisionally, and that anger was not far off. Her complexion is slightly heightened in color, with a few imperceptible red lines which will never grow pale. Nature has provided her with a remarkable appetite, and she takes four meals every day, not to speak of sundry intermediate collations. One part of the day is devoted to gaining strength, and the other to expending it. In the morning, the queen goes out into her garden, either on foot or in a little carriage, which she drives herself. She talks to the gardeners; she has trees cut down, branches pruned, earth leveled. She takes almost as much pleasure in making others move as in moving herself, and she never has so good an appetite as when the gardeners are hungry. After the mid-day repast, and the following siesta, the queen goes out riding, and gets over a few leagues at a gallop to take the air. In the summer, she gets up at three in the morning, to go and bathe in the sea of Phaleron; she swims, without getting tired, for an hour together. In the evening, she walks, after supper, in her garden. In the bull season, she never misses a waltz or quadrille, and she never seems tired or satisfied.—Boston Post.

IMBECILITY OF THE SULTAN.

It is said that the sultan has almost reached the limit at which he can be no longer held responsible for his actions. The life which this unhappy sovereign has led from boyhood, has made him, at thirty-three years of age, not only prematurely old in body, but almost prostrate in intellect. All energy of will is gone; how long understanding will remain is a question which no one can answer. He is entirely ruled by a race which it would be an insult even to Naples to call a Cananilla. His wives, eunuchs, his pipe-bearers, his daughters, do with him whatever they please. He has his fits of rage—his hours of despondency. He changes his mind as often as those who surround him urge him to change it. Such is the sovereign who, at this time of danger and transition, governs the Turkish empire, just saved from the grasp of a hostile potentate, and still occupied by the armies of two powerful allies.—Times.

NATURAL ACTING.

The following remarkable anecdote is extracted from "An Essay on the Science of Acting."—In the town of North Walsham, Norfolk, 1788, the Fair Penitent was performed. In the last act, where Calista lays her hand on the skull, a Mrs. Berry, who played the part, was seized with an involuntary shuddering, and fell on the stage. During the night, her illness continued; but the following day, when sufficiently recovered to converse, she sent for the stage-keeper, and anxiously inquired where he procured the skull. He replied, from the sexton, who informed him it was the skull of one Norris, a player, who, twelve years before, was buried in the graveyard. That same Norris was her first husband. She died in six weeks.—London Globe.

ALEXANDRE DUMAS.

The accompanying engraving is from a drawing made for us by Barry, from a photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case of this city, and is an admirable and reliable likeness of the noted French author as he looks at the present time. Few literary reputations are more extensive than that of this author; he is read and relished in every part of the world. He was born at Villers-Cotterets, in the department of the Aisne, France, June 24, 1803. His father, Alexandre Davy Dumas, a distinguished officer of the first French revolution, was the son of the Marquis de la Paillette, a wealthy planter of St. Domingo, and of a negress, and born in Jeremie, March 25, 1762. He entered the French service in 1788 as a captain of dragoons. A brilliant action procured his promotion, and he became successively lieutenant, colonel of hussars, brigadier general and general of division. He was at one time commander-in-chief of the army of the Alps, and distinguished himself both in Italy and Egypt. On his return from the latter country, on account of ill health and wounds, his vessel was forced by stress of weather to put into a Sicilian port, and he was incarcerated in a dungeon, where his sufferings were very great. He came out of prison with shattered health, and died in suffering and poverty in 1807. On his death, young Dumas, who had hitherto led an idle life, came up to Paris to seek employment, hoping to obtain aid and countenance from his father's friends. He met with some rebuffs at first; his father's friends having almost forgotten the general, and showing themselves sufficiently indifferent towards himself. He succeeded, however, in interesting General Foy, the deputy from his department, in him, and through his instrumentality procured a situation in the secretary's office of the Duke of Orleans (Louis Philippe) as despatch clerk, at a salary of 1200 francs a year—to him a fortune. And it is worthy of remark, that he obtained this situation solely by the elegance of his penmanship—the only accomplishment he then possessed. For three years, besides performing his official duties, he studied with intense zeal to remedy the defects of his early education. Some of his early literary attempts were farces, one of which, "Wedded and Buried," met with a certain success. He pretends that the performances of an English company of actors at Paris, by drawing his attention to Shakspeare, first fired his literary ambition, and that, in writing for the stage, he followed Shakspeare as his model. But no one of his numerous pieces is in the slightest degree Shaksperian, except in the violation of the classic unities. Dumas is destitute of idealism, of comprehensiveness, and of depth, but is particularly happy in stage arrangements, in producing interesting situations, and in the impetuous and stirring rapidity of his action. He is impetuous rather than energetic, feverish rather than warm, sensual rather than passionate, a stranger to the inner mysteries of the heart, but familiar with all the caprices of that other portion of the human organization which M. de Maistre calls the "brutal." His first successful play, Henry III., performed at the Français, the leading theatre of Paris, yielded him thirty thousand francs. "Feasted and invited by all Paris, M. Alexandre Dumas feasted and invited all Paris in return." As if bewildered by his sudden transition from 100 francs a month to

ALEXANDRE DUMAS.

30,000, he plunged with ardor into exaggerated luxury. He wore fantastic coats, glittering vests, gold chains, gave dinners à la Sardanapalus, broke down a great quantity of horses and made love to a great quantity of ladies. Having once established a literary name, Dumas followed the vein he had struck to its fullest extent, and poured out plays, tragedies, melodramas and farces with more than the rapidity of Scribe or Lope de Vega. When his dramatic reputation waned, he took to writing romances, travels, histories, essays, poems, in masses. As an instance of his productiveness we may mention that in a year, 1840, he published twenty-two volumes 8vo. And ever since then he has been driving the quill. A French writer says: "Attacked by the deplorable contagion of literary manufacturing, the leprosy of the age, M. Dumas, we may and ought to say it, seems now devoted body and soul to the worship of the Golden Calf. On the bill of what theatre, even the meanest, in what shop, in what enterprise of literary grocers, have we not seen his name figuring? It is physically impossible for M. Dumas to write or dictate half of what bears his name. It is a sad thing to contemplate the decadence of a man well endowed in certain respects, but destitute of the intellectual conscience called taste, which maintains a writer's dignity, and who cannot long resist the murderous career of literary job-work." Dumas is certainly a clever storyteller, and a vivacious, picturesque writer. But it is now perfectly well understood that he never wrote one tenth of the works he put forth as his own. His most popular romances are the productions of other brains. The "Three Guardsmen," so popular in England and this country, with its continuations, were furnished him by a M. Maquet; but Maquet himself cheated his employer, for he stole the greater part of his work from some old published memoirs. Writers of talent, unknown to fame, who could not get a bookseller even to look at their MSS., have ever found in Dumas a ready and probably a liberal purchaser. Their productions, stamped with the name of A. Dumas, were sure to sell. It is thus that this distinguished "author" has been enabled to supply the public with whatever quantity of literary wares they demanded, and in certain specialties the house of A. Dumas & Co. have monopolized the market. Alexandre Dumas has a son who has produced some very popular plays and romances.

HUT OF A CALIFORNIA MINER.

The accompanying engraving represents the interior of a hut belonging to a party of California miners, and is sketched from the life. But that represented by our artist is a perfect palace compared to some of the rude shelters under which the gold seekers repose their weary bodies. It has a comfortable fireplace, and berths fully equal to those of the forecabin of a merchantman, or indeed the cabin of many of our coasting vessels. The furniture, to be sure, is rather scanty—boxes and barrels supplying the place of chairs, lounges and ottomans. The candle-sticks are rather primitive, being neither more nor less than empty junk bottles. There is no tool-house, and the picks and spades are heaped promiscuously on the parlor floor. But what of this, so long as the ore is abundant? So long as the sand and the quartz yield their auriferous deposits freely to the adventurer, and so long as his health is robust, he can afford to wait until his earnings purchase him ease and comfort in the old Atlantic States, or in the great cities springing up on the Pacific. The gentleman with the cigar and pistol appears to be a visitor, to whom the miner is exhibiting a huge lump of gold he has found, on which another miner is expatiating to the guest. One poor fellow, wearied out with his day's toil, is asleep in his bunk. But the flame is roaring merrily up the chimney, and the miner, engaged in the preparation of a "savory pottage such as Esau loved," will soon probably announce that the soup is ready, and we will venture to say it will be partaken of with appetites such as even a city alderman might envy, for as hunger is the best sauce for dinner, their hard labor and out-door exposure prepares them to partake of food with a keen relish.

A GREAT ARTIST.

Nature is a great painter—and October the season for her grand annual exhibition. With all North America for her canvases, she has ample scope for breadth and graceful pencilling. And then what a palette she sets! What infinite variety and splendor in her autumnal tints! It seems as if with a miller of unapproachable power she had ground up topazes, and emeralds, and rubies, and cornelians, and amethysts, and sapphires, and lumps of lapis lazuli, and the pure yellow gold of California, to form her chromatic scale. Vain the attempt to imitate her coloring, unless we could snatch the rainbow from the evening cloud, separate its subtle dyes and manipulate them on our palettes. Let us step just out of the city limits, and glance at her handiwork. Look at that glorious sugar-maple standing forth in the sunshine. Every leaf is a masterpiece; for in every leaf there is a gradation from pale yellow to glowing crimson. And there stands a walnut, with all its foliage of beaten leaf gold. And there is a vine blazing with scarlet that no verbenas can match, so reflected in the calm stream that creeps beneath it, that it seems as if the much talked of problem of setting a river on fire had been solved at least. Note the Indian red of the oak leaves contrasted with the bronzed hue of the cedars, and the vivid green of the white pines. See the vines trailing their purple and red glories along the gray old mossy trunks; and then, in one sweeping glance, take in the whole panorama of gloriously-tinted scenery melting into the blue ethereal distance, and blending on the horizon with the delicate sky, and you will confess that nature is a great, an unapproachable artist.

A VAST GRAVEYARD.—The number of persons who have existed since the beginning of time, is 36,627,843,275,075,845—we like to be exact—and it is estimated that the whole surface of the globe has been dug over one hundred and twenty-eight times to bury its dead.

A PROFESSIONAL BEGGAR.—A professional beggar, named Garnier, who lately died at Troyes, France, apparently in the utmost destitution, was found to have been possessed of property worth two or three thousand dollars.

POETRY.—The true test of poetry is the impression it makes on the memory. A thrilling lyric is remembered with scarcely an effort of the mental powers.

A COMPLIMENT.—La Hire said to Charles VII., of France, "Sir, it is impossible for any one to lose a kingdom more gaily than yourself."

AUTUMNAL AMUSEMENTS.

With the long evenings comes a train of popular amusements provided by the caterers of the many-headed for their delectation and—their money. The concerts and the lecture-rooms open their doors, and the dramatic temples fling wide their portals. Old Puritanic Boston is amply provided. First in the field was our friend Kimball, with his well-drilled company and his popular repertory. Then the Howard unbarred its gates; and the National, with the old pit restored, and the beautiful and magnificent Boston followed. Certainly every shade of taste must be gratified; even the old l'Esprit-guer ought to find something to amuse him—the man who dwells upon the past glories of the Boston stage, and to whom the memory of the past is brighter than the most gorgeous vision of the present.

It is something of a bore to visit a place of public amusement in company with one of these old fogies. Ask him what he thinks of the actors, he will turn an inquiring gaze upon you and say—"Actors! actors! my dear sir—I don't see any actors. These people are merely players." You venture to point out to him Warren, the inimitable Warren, the artist, who demonstrates, by the way, that a low comedian may be also a scholar and a gentleman. "Very fair," says the fossil, "but, my dear sir, you forget that I remember Thwaites. Ah! there was a Tony Lumpkins! Goldsmith must have prophesied Thwaites when he wrote 'She Stoops to Conquer!' You fare no better if you point out the most charming actress on the boards. To this en quart, he parries with the terce of "Mrs. Darley, sir!" You compromise the matter by regretting Mrs. Barrett—"poor lost Ophelia!" "You are only partly right," retorts the incorrigible. You mourn Mrs. Barrett—I regret Mrs. Henry, the same, and yet how different. There, sir, en emboupoint and age had injured the Medicean contour, was a combination of grace and elegance such as never, yes, never beamed upon the world before. Her Mrs. Oakley and her Lady Teazle, sir, were high-bred ladies, fit for the drawing-room or the throne! When shall we see her like again? Never on this side of Lethe. Never! never! It is all 'leather and prandella' now." "But the scenery!" "What do you know about scenery! You never saw Worrall's!" "But the dancing!" "Dancing! dancing, sir! You don't call bounding, and vaulting, and whirling, and cringing, and wriggling, and postere-making, and ground and lofty tumbling, dancing, I hope. Sir, dancing went out of the world with the minuet de la cour, and high-heeled shoes and hair-powder!" "Then, permit me to ask, my dear old friend, why you are here to-night?" "Force of habit, sir, mere force of habit. My enjoyment lies in the past. And the brightness of my memories is heightened by contrast with the gross, degrading humbug of the day." Whereupon the old fogey leaves you, to wonder whether he doesn't sleep in a sarcophagus, and wrap himself up in the swaddlings of an Egyptian mummy some two or three thousand years old.

A "TURN COAT."

It is amusing to trace the origin of popular expressions, and fortunately there are plenty of amateurs always happy to delve into the records of the past, deeming no matter trivial which bears the stamp of antiquity. To one of the antiquarians of the Scots Magazine we are indebted for an explanation of the opprobrious epithet turncoat. It took its rise from one of the first dukes of Savoy, whose dominions lying open to the incursions of the two contending houses of Spain and France, he was obliged to temporize and fall in with that power that was most likely to distress him, according to the success of their arms against one another. So being frequently obliged to change sides, he humorously got a coat made that was blue on one side, and white on the other, and might be indifferently worn either side out. While on the Spanish interest he wore the blue side out, and the white side was the badge for the French. From hence he was called Emmanuel, surnamed the Turncoat, by way of distinguishing him from other princes of the same name of that house.

JUSTICE IN HAVANA.—A few weeks since a man in Havana, in debt to a woman, gave a lottery ticket in pledge, with the privilege of redemption. He soon returned with the money, but the woman, having found out in the interim that the ticket had drawn a $30,000 prize, refused to surrender, and was summoned before the alcalde. That functionary said that the ownership of the ticket was a difficult matter to decide, and so he would settle it by giving each of the parties 10,000 dollars, keeping $10,000 for his trouble. And actually in this way the affair was settled.

PRACTICE AND THEORY.—Socrates, remarks a distinguished writer, invented morality; yet others before him had put it in practice. Aristides had been just before Socrates had explained what justice was. Leonidas had died for his country before Socrates had made patriotism a duty. Sparta was abstemious before Socrates had praised sobriety; and Greece abounded in virtuous men before he had pronounced the eulogy of virtue.

DECIMAL CURRENCY.—The bankers in England have decided against the proposed change of sterling to decimal currency. They say of the innovators, like Rolla to the Spaniards, "We seek no change, and least of all such change as they would give us," meaning by change, dollars and cents, of course.

A QUERY.—Why should the orange-blossom be chosen as the bridal flower in preference to the lily of the valley, the snow-drop or the jasmine, which are quite as beautiful?

TRUTHFUL.—The most ingenious equivocation is as criminal in the eyes of the Deity as the grossest fabrication.

A STORY OF A "YIDDER."

Artists sometimes have queer customers, and they certainly enjoy excellent opportunities of studying human nature, albeit the weakest side of it is too often exposed to their observation. Smith tells a rather amusing story of Joseph Nollekens, the English sculptor, one of the bluffest and bluntest fellows in the world, and withal a man of brilliant genius, perhaps unrivalled as a sculptor of busts. Patronized by the most eminent men of the Anglian age of England, the zenith of his career compensated for the hard struggles of its commencement. One day a widow in the deepest mourning weeds for her husband, came drooping like a willow to the sculptor, desiring a monument, and declaring that she did not care what money was expended on the memory of one she loved so fondly. "Do what you please," were her parting orders, "but O! do it quickly." Nollekens went to work, made the design, finished the model, and began to look for a block of marble to carve it from, when in came the lady, who had been absent some three months. "Poor soul!" said the rough, but good-hearted sculptor, when she was announced, "I thought she would come soon, but I am ready." The lady entered with a light footstep and a lighter heart. "Ah! how do you do, Mr. Nollekens? Well, you haven't commenced the model," "Ay, but I have, though," answered the sculptor. "And there it stands, finished." "There it is indeed," said the lady, dropping into a chair. A silence of a few minutes ensued, which was broken by the lady. "These, my good sir, are, I know, early days for a change," she said, glancing at her dress, from which a good portion of the crape had disappeared; "but the fact is, since I saw you, I have met with an old Roman acquaintance of yours, a very charming man—who has made me—I hardly know what to say—an offer, and I don't know how he would like to see in our church a monument of such expense to my late husband. Indeed, on second thoughts, it would perhaps be considered quite enough if I get our mason to put up a marble tablet, and that, you know, he can cut very prettily." "My charge, madam, for the model," said the sculptor, "is one hundred guineas." "Enormous!" exclaimed the lady. But she drew out her purse and paid.

OUTSHINING US.—A Paris correspondent of the Transcript writes that the Grand Hotel du Louvre is about five times as large as the St. Nicholas, at New York, and fitted up in a style of palatial splendor. Now the New Yorkers must go to work and build a house five times as large as the Hotel du Louvre.

COMMEMORATIVE.—A monument to the Martyrs of the Revolution is in process of erection in Trinity churchyard, New York.

THE DISENTHRALLED.

BY WILLIAM O. EATON.

SOMETHING of pain was in the warm smile of Mr. Atherton, as sitting in the parlor with his wife by his side, he watched the gambols of two children on the floor. They were a boy and a girl, the latter about four, and the boy of six years. The glossy, light curls of the younger, and her deep blue, laughing eyes, certainly contrasted strongly with the dark, wavy hair of her youthful playmate, and his pensive, but glowing hazel eyes, from which orbs there seemed to pour forth, in the midst even of their frolics, a melancholy intelligence unusual to youth. His mirth, too, seemed subdued, while hers was unconstrained—the very soul of unchecked gladness; and at every brief pause in their sport, she would look up into his dreamy, dark eyes, in silence, as if wondering what his thoughts might be, which then made him look so abstracted.

"See, how the innocents gambol, Marianna, on the golden threshold of life! How fresh and fair all seems to them; and yet a few years will put shadows into those beautiful eyes. Even now the boy seems to have caught a glimpse of the future. How thoughtful he looks at times. O, whatever he may know of the future, may he never know the past."

The father sighed so deeply, that the boy looked round earnestly at him.

"Father, what makes you sigh? You tell me when I sigh that it is not good for me."

"Bless you, boy, may you never have the cause that I have!" replied Mr. Atherton, placing his hands fondly on the boy's head. "There, Edgar, run you and Flora into your play-house, while your mother and I are talking alone together."

"Come, Eddy!" exclaimed Flora, rising from the carpet, as fast as she could, and taking him patronizingly by the hand, "come and pay in the play-house."

And the youthful twain went off together.

"Marianna, the time which has passed since that hour of agony, does not obliterate my keen remembrance of it. O the curse of passion! O the bitterness and restlessness of remorse!" He struck his breast and swayed his head to and fro. "I cannot bear to think of it. The boy's own eyes seem to reproach me, as if he knew all, or as if there were some sleeping spirit within him, which occasionally awoke, and looked out from his face upon me to keep alive those pangs!"

"Be calm, Albert," said his wife, much moved at his agitation; "this melancholy is wearing you away. Do not give up to it. Perhaps change of scene would be good for you. What is done cannot be undone, and we are doing our best, are we not, to atone for what is past!"

"Bad's the best, Marianna, bad's the best. I never shall know happiness again."

"Before God," returned his wife, "the works of the penitent are accepted sacrifices, even if not wholly sufficient; and time—"

"Time! Time!" interrupted he, shaking his head despairingly, "how little it has yet done to quench this fire, and bring our former happiness. Ah! when we first met!"

Her efforts availed little, and she relapsed into brooding, anxious silence.

It was but a few days afterwards, when Mr. Atherton informed his wife that business was to call him across the Atlantic, business which, if successfully carried out, would bring them a vast increase of fortune. He should be gone for at least a twelvemonth.

"Will you go?" asked he.

A dread of the water had always been a part of her nature, and the thought of such a mighty voyage filled her with horror.

"Across the ocean! I should die with fear," she replied. "Besides, my health, Albert, is so slender, that even if the passage were safe in other respects, I feel that my constitution would be utterly shattered by it. I never can undertake such a thing. But will it be so very profitable to you?"

"I am confident of it," he replied, "and the only drawback is the separation which it would cause, should you resolve to remain behind. And yet, it would be but a year."

"Perhaps it will be for the best," she returned, after a long pause; "and you know that I will be faithful to the children during your absence, and that will lessen your anxiety."

"The children! Flora's tender years and the necessity of your being with her, demand that she should remain with you. But I can never part with Edgar—never! If I go, he must go, too. I could not live unless he was daily under my eye. Let Flora stay with you, and Edgar go with me. It will be but a year, and his education will lose nothing by it."

It was so agreed. The day of parting came, the long and tearful farewell was taken, and Mr. Atherton and Edgar set sail for England.

A mother's love! How many truthful tributes have been paid to it by the children of fame, in anodyne language. How many equally truthful, yet unwritten tributes, have been given to that holy instinct, by the millions who have shared, lost, then only fully appreciated, and "mourned because they found it not!" Of all loves the most unselfish, of all it is least often weighed in the balance and found wanting. Thus they whose tenderest youth was orphanage, as they never felt its value, have never truly mourned the loss of the truest instinct upon earth.

How watched that gentle mother over her prattling daughter, while the father was far away. By day her sole living memorial of him, by night her last communion, as she sank, from prayer to God, into the slumbers that He guarded. It was a long year to her. The longest she had ever known. Long, not from the cause, of which Campbell sings—

"Heaven gives our years of fading strength
Intermingling fleeciness,
And those of youth a seeming length
Proportioned to their sweetness;

for hers were of a bitter protraction, and often would she sit and sing, to while the time away, with her fair child folded to her bosom, that song, so ripe with sad sweetness, so full of memory to many a yearning heart,—

"Thou over the world, and I at home,
The one must linger, the other must mourn;
Yet our hearts will flee
O'er the sounding sea,
Mine to thy bosom and thine to me.

"I watch the skies, by the stars' pale light,
Till the gray dawn breaketh on gloomy night;
And the wind's low tone
Hath a whispering moan,
Which goes to my heart, as I weep alone!

"With the morning's light, O would I could see Thy white sail far off on the breaking sea,
And welcome thee home,
O'er the wild waves' foam,
And bid thee no more from my side to roam!"

The long year wore away and still her husband came not. Tidings she had, from month to month, but none of surety that he would soon return; and now a letter came announcing the almost deadly fact that his presence abroad was yet demanded, for one year more. It nearly crushed her spirit, and she lathed the young girl's face with tears, as often she looked up to ask, "Will papa come?" Yet no suspicion of her husband's fidelity passed into the pure sanctuary of her confiding heart. Her grief was that loneliness of soul which those alone know who have had their fill of love, then find the garner empty! Consumption, to which she was predisposed, set rapidly in; and towards the close of the second year she would often say, with a premonitory smile:

"I know that I shall see him, but it will be only to die in his arms. Yet that will be a blessing. Poor Flora! Poor Edgar!"

Her husband crossed the sea at last, but Edgar came not with him. He had entrusted him to the care of tried friends abroad, and he was to be educated at a foreign university. For his tuition Mr. Atherton was enabled to pay roundly, for the two years of his agency abroad had been of almost unexampled success, in his sphere of business—yet, fortune dearly purchased!—with fortune's rays upon him, he came home to enter into the night gloom of death! Three days after his arrival, he pressed to his shuddering heart the spiritual bosom of his clay-cold wife! As he drank in her expiring breath, as he kissed the last accents from the lips, then closing forever, as he caught the last remaining sparkle of those eyes, no longer to interpret her fidelity to him, what to him were the riches he had accumulated, or all the wealth of the world? For him its greatest treasures were lost to all but memory!

She had placed little Flora's hand in his, just as she died, and faintly uttering, "Albert, Edgar, Flora," she bowed her head upon his breast and died.

"Mama is sleepy," said the child.

She slept the sleep that has but one waking; a happy sleep to see in one like her.

During the years of Edgar's stay abroad, Mr. Atherton repeatedly crossed the ocean upon business, and made long sojourns with the youth, who was rapidly growing in mind and body under the most promising influences. Flora's education received no less attention, and each of the children looked cheerily forward to the day when both should meet to be separated by the waste of waters no more. Her mother's aversion to the sea was inherited by the daughter, else she had seen her brother long before. His education completed, Edgar went upon his travels, and after a short stay in Paris and London, with Mr. Atherton, they sailed for America.

"And how does my sister look?" asked Edgar, as Mr. Atherton referred to her accomplishments, but not to her personal appearance. "You seldom, in fact never, have given me any details, father, by which I can determine whether she is short or tall, blonde or brunette—though I can remember her little golden curls well enough, even through the long lapse of time, and the dusty lane of books which have intervened, since I left my native land. My poor, dear mother!"

"You must remain in the dark about this, Edgar, until I see fit to present her to you," said Mr. Atherton. "It may be that you will not see her when we first arrive. Perhaps not till a long time afterwards. We have, within a short time, changed our residence from New York to Boston, and as she often makes very long visits there, we may not see her at once. However, we shall see."

Their arrival in sight of the long-sought shore was hailed with rapture, by Edgar, inferior only to his ecstasy when the carriage drove up to Mr. Atherton's residence.

As had been intimated to him, Edgar found Flora absent, and not even the promised fascination of the ball, which was given by Mr. Atherton, a few nights afterwards, in honor of his return, could quell Edgar's impatience to behold and embrace his beloved and unforgotten playmate, Flora.

"She will possibly be here this evening," said Mr. Atherton to him, as the festive lamps were being lit. "These joys will fitly come together."

The welcome of the graceful, comely young man was such as might have been expected under the circumstances which marked his return. Only one thing was wanting to complete his happiness in that jubilee, and that was—the presence of his sister.

As he sat, at one period in the evening musing sadly over his disappointment, and wondering whether she really entertained any affection for him, his eyes were suddenly attracted by the appearance of a young and graceful maiden, whose superior charms of person and manner made a deep impression upon him. He wondered he had not observed her particularly before, among the throng of fair guests who had been presented to him; and attributed it solely to his absence of mind, in the thoughts of Flora.

"What do you think of her?" asked Mr. Atherton, with a smile, he having slyly stole behind Edgar, to watch his motions.

"Superb!" exclaimed Edgar. "What a figure! What a head! What an eye! and gait! Introduce me again, father, for I—"

"Miss Flora Atherton—your brother Edgar!" was his father's reply, as he placed their hands in each other, while tears of joy streamed down his cheeks. "I supposed you needed an introduction, for you have not met before for thirteen years."

In an instant the twain were buried in each other's embrace, while the gala crowd looked on with many a moistened eye. It was a meeting worth looking upon, the brightest of that scene of brightness; and hearts that felt the affection burning there, so long disordered by old Ocean, now united by his aid, throbbled with pride that theirs, too, were human bosoms!

Was it sorrow for his mother's death, which, not more than a month after the night above-mentioned, weighed so heavily upon Edgar, that everybody noticed it? That could not be—such a long time had passed since that sad event. Was he yearning for the society of dear companions left abroad—perhaps some fond, female heart, to which he had pledged his faith? Possibly. But to Mr. Atherton's inquiries he gave no satisfactory answers. He had grown gloomy, and none but himself knew the cause.

But finally his father divined the reason, or thought so; for in the presence of Flora, Edgar's manner partook of so much more than a brother's tenderness, while he looked upon her with such an air of loving sadness, more than of an ardent, hopeless lover than with the proud and gay affection of a doting brother, that Mr. Atherton surmised the existence of that rare anomaly—he loved his sister—but not with merely fraternal affection!

Alas! that it was so! Alas for Edgar, that after his long exile he should come to the garden of promised happiness, and find its gateway closed. Alas that he should feel the immortal truth and sorrow of that song, where Byron breathes the lamentation of all blighted hearts:

"O love, what is it in this world of ours
That makes it fatal to be loved? Ah why
With cypress branches hast thou twined thy bowers,
And made thy best interpreter—a sigh?"

To be the helpless slave of such a passion was Edgar's lot, and while he hourly bled and groaned beneath the thralldom, two others suffered also.

With the quick eye of woman in such matters, Flora was not long in discovering the truth—though had they been always reared together, the idea would have never entered her imagination. But as it was, fate seemed to place him in the light, more of a lover than a brother, and she felt, and blushed to own it to herself, that her own heart was far from being irresponsive to his. Yet she saw the dread, inexorable barrier, and essayed to hide herself from herself.

Not the least anguish in that family—to the shallow-judging world apparently so happily situated—was experienced by Mr. Atherton—in his case, old wounds as well as new, framing the grinning skeleton of his misery! There had been one act of his life which had placed them all in their present position; and as they daily presented their sad aspect before him, his pangs became unutterable, and he at last resolved, by a great hazard, either to increase or end them; and this hazard was to be a sacrifice, in either event.

Calling Edgar into his study, one morning, he addressed him thus:

"Edgar, sixteen years ago, in a distant section of this land, chance threw me into a convivial party. Some of the members, influenced by wine, were rude and quarrelsome. High words were followed by blows, and being struck by one, in whose behalf I interfered, I returned the blow. We were parted. A challenge and a duel ensued. My adversary fell by my hand. Dying on the field, he stretched forth his hand to me and said, 'Atherton, I die. As freely as I hope God's pardon, do I pardon you! The blame was mine, or rather in the cursed cups which made us mad. But let that pass. My home is distant, my relatives scattered, and I have no immediate one, but my poor boy. A dying father asks of you this favor. Take him, care for him, love him as your own, be all I would have been to him, and as you shall prove a blessing to his orphanage, so shall my blessing be on you!'

"I promised, kneeling by his side. He died. The whole affair was conducted with such honest secrecy, that no clue was obtained to the chief participants, who fled to different parts of the country, full measures being taken for his proper burial. For me, I have fulfilled my vow. I took the boy, and the world has never known him since save as the son of Albert Atherton!"

"My God! My God!" said Edgar, with a groan, clasping his temples wildly, his face pale as marble.

"Edgar, do you forgive me?"

Without another word, the unhappy young man walked hastily from the room, followed a few paces by Mr. Atherton, who then suddenly paused, and retracing his steps, dropped into a chair.

"His father's murderer! How can he forgive me? It was a desperate risk; yet he loves Flora, and she loves him; and I thought it better, to give them happiness, to hazard all on this terrible disclosure. Perhaps I was wrong. O God grant that I was not!" And bowing his head upon a desk, he prayed for Heaven's forgiveness, and for Edgar's. Ere he had closed, he heard a quick step enter the study. He looked up. It was Edgar, his face red with weeping.

"Forgive me, Edgar."

"Father, I do!"

They rushed into each other's arms.

Not many months elapsed ere a glorious bridal took place, which celebrated the enfranchisement of three who were diseuthralled.

RAISING THE WIND.

A new way of "raising the wind" was resorted to by a lady in a railroad car, in the State of New York, a short time since. Shortly after the train left Schenectady, the lady approached a well-known citizen of Albany, and told a very pathetic tale in regard to her sad condition, stating that she had been robbed of her porte-monnaie at the Schenectady depot, and was entirely destitute of means to reach her friends in the West. A genteel looking fellow pretended to feel interested in her case, and solicited aid from the other passengers. Soon a handsome sum was raised for her, but to the surprise of the passengers, after passing the next station, the lady and gentleman had disappeared.

A SAD REALITY.—There is a young daughter of a titled English aristocrat living in Albany, New York. The returns from the wheat harvest of the United States, says the New York Journal of Commerce, are now complete, and it is settled that the crop is of most excellent quality, and if not the largest ever gathered since the settlement of the country, is at least above the average, and will yield a large surplus beyond the supply of our domestic wants.

When the mother awoke in the morning, she missed the child, and looking for it, found it hanging dead.

She had never married, and for several years before her death was completely blind.

The size of the steamers ranges from 78 to 1800 tons; of the propellers, from 263 to 800; the barques from 380 to 603, and the schooners from 50 to 531. The total steam tonnage of the vessels built is 12,912; sail tonnage, 33,461.

SUMMER HOUSE AND PAGODA IN THE ISLAND OF WHAMPOA.

The landscape herewith presented is strikingly typical of Chinese scenery and architecture. The pagoda in the background differs from those we commonly see in pictures, and at the same time throws an instructive light on the word "pagoda" (pagoda), which, in its graphic signification, implies an edifice composed of successive joints or stories. In the summer house the duet of celestial friendship is being performed. Two old acquaintances are seated upon a stool of bamboo, at the end of a table that rests on four pillars, which are carved and bordered after the taste of the country. On this table the kin, or Chinese lute, is placed, which, by its antique and melancholy sounds, helps the performer to retrace the fabled annals of his country, ere degeneracy had seized upon the sons of men, and rendered them less happy and less wise. By turns they admire the severity of moral truth, feel the witchery of gold, splendor and sunshine, and sigh for the ineffable nonchalance of ease and retirement. This is no unfair description of social intercourse in China. Their genteel minds are not too sensual not to catch the lure of indolence and voluptuousness, and too much harassed by a cruel and hypocritical magistracy not to long for some sequestered nook where the vulture's eye of the public informer could never reach. The architecture of the inhabitants of China is perfectly unique, and is based on a different principle from that of any other nation. All their buildings have a marked character of their own, and their nationality is recognizable at a glance. The principle of Chinese architecture is considered to have been founded on the construction of a tent, the fragile dwelling of the roaming tribes who first peopled China. It has been remarked that many Chinese buildings would stand even if the walls were to fall, inasmuch as, independent of the walls, the roof rests upon a timber framework. The combination of colors, varnish and gilding helps to give that holiday appearance which the shape of a Chinese building seems in itself almost fitted to impart. There exists a curious sort of architectural police in China whereby each man is bound to content himself with a particular kind of house according to his rank in life. A prince of the first, the second or the third degree; a noble of the imperial family; a grandee of the empire; a president of a tribunal; a mandarin, a citizen—all are bound to observe certain regulations concerning the area of ground to be covered by a dwelling-house, the number of courts and rooms, the height of the ground level and of the upper story, and of the appearance presented towards the street. The origin of architecture has formed a theme on which many learned men have written and discussed. That man would form a building to shield himself from the weather, before he sought to give it beauty of appearance, is natural enough; but when, and where, and how the transition took place from convenience to beauty, or the combination of the two, is not easy to determine. Mr. Hope, taking the central plains of Tartary as a starting-point, imagines the roving hordes of that country to have spread themselves by degrees eastward to the country now known as China, and southward to Hindostan; the first of these were built after the model of tents, the latter took their architecture from caves.

HARBOR OF DOVER, ENG., FROM THE WESTERN HEIGHTS.

The view of Dover harbor herewith presented, is purposely taken from an eminence, which accounts for the height of the horizontal line in the distance, in order to show the formation of the harbor, which is wholly artificial. Its extent and excellence are signal proofs of the liberal scale upon which all operations connected with commerce are conducted in Great Britain. The town, as will be seen from the accurate drawing of the houses and streets, has not much to boast in style, being quite plainly and irregularly built. Dover is one of, and the principal station and seat of government of the Cinque Ports. It is in the county of Kent, at the terminus of the south-eastern railway, 66 miles east-southeast of London. Its population is not far from 23,000. The town consists mostly of a collection of old streets on the north side of its harbor, and a long street on the banks of a small stream, the whole enclosed and backed by chalk downs, on which are the castle, citadel, and several strong detached forts. On the west, the railroad enters the town through a tunnel cut into the cliffs, which here abut into the sea. The castle is a collection of formidable works, occupying 35 acres, and it is supposed to date back as far as the Roman occupation of Britain. It contains Roman and Saxon towers, a spacious keep, forming a bomb-proof magazine, and barracks for 2000 men. The other principal edifices are a military hospital, the two parish churches, a handsome chapel of ease, numerous dissenting chapels, a synagogue, the town hall and jail, the hospital Maison-Dien, custom house, work house, theatre, assembly rooms, museum, baths, docks, bonding warehouses, and numerous excellent hotels. The harbor consists of three basins, the outer one enclosed between two piers, one hundred and fifty feet apart. Large sums have been expended upon it in different reigns, since Henry VII., but its entrance is unfortunately impeded by a shingle bar. Operations are in progress to establish here a harbor of refuge, by throwing out jetties of great magnitude still further into the sea. The works authorized by the government will cost $12,500,000. Dover has continual intercourse with Calais and Boulogne in France, by steamboats, the distance being about thirty miles. The passage is frequently rough and unpleasant. It imports large quantities of eggs, fruit, and other rural produce, from France, and has a thriving coasting trade and fishery. Ship building and the manufacture of sails, rope and paper, form the business of a considerable portion of the inhabitants.

TUFTS (UNIVERSALIST) COLLEGE, SOMERVILLE, MASS.

The accompanying engraving presents a correct representation of the Universalist College in Somerville, with the adjacent buildings, sketched expressly for us at the time of the recent celebration of its first anniversary. It has opened under favorable auspices, and no efforts will be spared to render it one of the most flourishing and effective institutions in the country. It owes its existence mainly to the liberality of Charles Tufts, Esq., of Somerville, while other individuals have contributed largely to its establishment. Rev. Mr. Chapin, in his address at the anniversary, spoke in fitting terms of Mr. Tufts's well-directed generosity. He said:—"Dollars are worth nothing till they are sent forth on their mission of love to mankind. Providence has made Mr. Tufts deaf, so that he cannot hear the praises of men, but he can listen to the praises of angels. Who would not hear the inward voice speaking to his noble heart? The desire of all men is to project themselves into the future, to build the bridge and span the arch from themselves to immortality. Some sought historic fame, others pride themselves upon wealth, but more wise is he who lays up in future ages an immortality by building up columns in God's temple, by assisting to rear the edifice of eternal truth. He who touches the springs of thought, sets in motion an agency immortal in its consequences." From the treasurer's statement, we learn that the property of the College consists of sixty-eight acres of land, the gift of Charles Tufts, Esq., of Somerville; a bond given by Silvanus Packard, Esq., of Boston, upon which the income, one thousand dollars per annum, is paid quarterly; the college building, erected at a cost of $38,000; the boarding-house, erected at a cost of $9700; the president's house, which cost $3600, of which was defrayed by special subscription, $1849, making the cost to the college, $1751; a bond of the Passumpsic Railroad Company, $1000; besides notes amounting to $3700. The whole amount subscribed to the first of August last, exclusive of the land, is $77,000, including Mr. Silvanus Packard's bond for $20,000. The total ordinary expenses of the college are $4450; the annual income is $3400, leaving about $2000 to be made up annually at present. Mr. Packard has offered to give $10,000 annually for three years, provided a like sum is contributed from other sources. Messrs. George W. Gage, of Chicago, formerly of Massachusetts, William Savory, of South Carver, Jesse Murdock and Thomas A. Goddard, have pledged themselves to contribute a large sum each, making $5000 already secured. B. B. Mussey, Esq., has offered to give $10,000 the third year. Mr. Packard has intimated that if his proposals are accepted, he will continue to contribute till he has reached the sum of $100,000. The Universalist denomination, within the past ten years, has raised nearly half a million of dollars and devoted it to the cause of education. The establishment of this college, the purpose of which is to give a thorough classical and practical education to the students, is a great step in advance. The president, the Rev. Dr. Ballou, is universally known and respected as a man of high character and attainment, and particularly well fitted for the post he occupies. He is aided by earnest and cultivated men, who are determined to bring their institution to the front rank. The site of the college is well chosen. It stands on a lofty eminence, commanding an extensive view, and, notwithstanding its vicinity to a great city, is far enough removed from the noise and turmoil of business. We cannot but think that a brilliant future is before it. The large and increasing denomination of Universalists feel the deepest interest in its welfare. The number of students already gathered within its walls is large for an institution in its infancy, and there is every reason to suppose that it will be soon crowded even to its utmost capacity. But as the demand increases, so will the means of supplying it be multiplied. We have already seen the liberality that has been manifested by individuals for its support, and their example will be followed by that of others. Before many years have elapsed, Tufts College, fostered by the liberality and zeal of its friends, and the energy of its president and professors, will exert a widespread and commanding influence.

THE LOST HEIR:

—OR, THE—

YOUNG AMERICAN SOLDIER.

A TALE OF 1812.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

CHAPTER XVI.—[CONTINUED.]

The party had turned into the avenue which led into the house, and every moment she expected to behold him who, in her eyes, was hateful and ugly above all others she had ever seen. But he was, at that moment, closeted with a man who had arrived only fifteen minutes before, with whom he was discussing a question involving an affair of grave and momentous import to himself.

It was a relief, instead of his sallow, oleaginous visage, surrounded with its stringy hair, so damp as to appear as if glued to his forehead, to see the frank, genial countenance of a handsome matron beaming upon her from the open door. Numa stood ready to assist her in alighting from her horse, and the next moment she found herself encircled in the arms of her whose pleasant, smiling face, so different from that she had expected would greet her, caused her heart to go out towards her, and enabled her to find relief in tears.

"My poor child," said Mrs. Grey, "I knew that you didn't come here voluntarily, the moment I saw your sad, sweet face."

"Is he here?" said Bessie, in a voice broken with sobs.

"You mean Mr. Withers?"

"Yes."

"He is, though for the present you won't see him. He has business to transact, he said, which might require his attention for an hour or more."

"Why don't you call him Squire Withers? He is a great man—he is rich," mumbled a voice close behind them.

Bessie started and looked up.

"It is old Elsie," said Mrs. Grey. "Her mind is a little wandering at times. But let us go in; the air is cold."

"Is this where you keep?" said Bessie, as Mrs. Grey placed a chair for her near the fire.

"No; a fire was ordered here on purpose for you."

"O, let me go with you; I had rather not stay here."

"You shall, at least for the present."

"Are you the lady that is to be mistress here?" said Elsie, coming up close to Bessie, and looking her keenly in the face.

"No, I shall never be mistress here," Bessie replied.

"You will be. I know better than you do. There will be a brave house-warming, too, and you'll be as sweet a bride as Florence Dale was, when she came here, more than five-and-twenty years ago. I lived then in a little cottage just beyond the woods; you can see from the window; but I had lost my son before that. My son used to work for me, and help support me and my little granddaughter; but after I lost him, Squire Withers found me in bread. It was bitter bread, though; it had tears on it. After a while, my heart grew hard. There were no more tears after that. I've led a merry life ever since. I must go now. I should like to stay and keep you company, but it is a busy day with me."

Through the door she opened to leave the room, came sounds of rude and boisterous revelry.

"The men who were sent to meet you, and as many more, are in the great hall," said Mrs. Grey.

"Are they not British soldiers?" inquired Bessie.

"I think there can be no doubt of it, and if Mr. Withers knew what was for his own interest, he wouldn't permit them to be here."

"Who was that old lady," said Bessie, "who left the room a minute ago?"

"Her name is Elsie Cawley. Nothing is known of her early history. I was a child when, by the permission of Mr. Percival, the former owner of this plantation, she came to live in a little house a short distance from here. She brought a child with her; she called her grand-daughter, and it was generally thought it was through the influence of Mr. Withers that Mr. Percival permitted her to live where she did."

"She spoke of losing a son."

"Yes, but it was before she came here; and by the strange way in which she always alludes to the subject, it appears to have unsettled her mind."

"Does she still live where she used to?"

"No; she lives here now, and has ever since her grand-daughter was married. It was by the invitation of Mr. Withers that she came. We all thought it strange, for he was never charitably inclined; and ever since she has been here, he avoids her as much as possible."

An hour from this, they heard the door of the next room open. Bessie turned pale. It was Withers, she knew, by the soft, stealing steps, as they drew near the room where she was sitting.

"Don't leave the room," said she, imploringly, to Mrs. Grey.

"No, not unless he commands me to," she replied.

By this time, Withers stood in the doorway.

"Good day, Miss Hamlen," said he. "I am glad to see you enath my humble roof."

"If you had a spark of either honor or humanity about you, on a single feeling which would not dishonor a gentleman," she replied, "you would be incapable of feeling pleasure at what gives me so much pain."

"O, you are a little homesick. That is a feeling which will soon wear off."

"Never while I am beneath a roof which you call yours. If I thought myself capable of being otherwise than miserable, thus situated, I should despise myself as much as I do the owner."

"If you have a taste for such sancy petulance, you may as well indulge it while you can. But of one thing you may be certain—I never undertook to bring about anything which I had set my heart on in which I was foiled. Sooner or later, I accomplished it."

"Even what you are pleased to term sancy petulance," said Bessie, "is preferable to cringing sycophancy."

"Rest content on that score. You will find no occasion to complain of cringing or flattery. I never make use of either, unless to subserve some purpose."

"I am certainly much obliged to you for the assurance."

Withers took no notice of this, except by one of his peculiar smiles.

"It is now," said he, "over seven years since your late father and I had some important business transactions together, and it so fell out as to make it in my power to ruin him. Instead of that, I advanced him a certain sum of money, which enabled him to stem the tide. He was profuse in his protestations of gratitude, and in promises to refund what I had let him have, at an early day; but I gave him to understand that there was one mode of payment, and only one, which I would consent to."

"What was it?"

"I told him that he had a daughter, and that when she was old enough, I should claim her hand."

"And what did he say?"

"He consented."

"Unconditionally? Did he say nothing about my consent being gained?"

"There was something said about it, but he soon found whom he had to deal with, and as he knew he had no means of paying me, was obliged to let me have things my own way."

"And you were so ungenerous as to take advantage of his embarrassment?"

"I kept an eye to what I considered my own interest. You can give it whatever term you please."

"It was my father's land, it seems, rather than his daughter's hand, that you had in your mind when you made the bargain."

"As you were an only child, I, of course, didn't expect that you would be a dowdless bride. He never told you about this bargain, I suppose?"

"He never did. The reason he assigned for wishing me to receive your addresses was a very different one from what you have mentioned. As you don't deny that your chief object in making the condition you did, was to ultimately put you in possession of my father's domain, I will willingly make over to you what claim I have on it, which will certainly be much more valuable to you without the incumbrance than with it."

"You forget that, as a minor, any transaction of that kind would be illegal. No, Miss Hamlen; the sure way is always the best. I have succeeded in removing you from all such influences as would be likely to be adverse to my success, and I've no doubt but that your good sense will soon induce you to listen to reason."

"Permit me to assure you, sir, that you are entirely mistaken, if you expect me to regard you otherwise than I do now."

"Unfortunately," said Withers, after making this last remark, "I am obliged to devote myself to business, just at this time, more than usual, which will deprive me of the pleasure of spending as much time in your company as I could wish, and which I regret more on your account than even my own."

This was evidently intended to provoke some angry rejoinder, but Bessie had already been betrayed into a more bitter manifestation of those feelings which she entertained towards him than she had intended, or, as she imagined, was altogether consistent with self-respect. She, therefore, remained silent.

What Withers had told Bessie relative to relieving her father from pecuniary embarrassment, by placing such funds at his disposal as were required for the purpose, was true. It was true, also, that he made a proposition concerning herself, of the nature he had specified, but he should not have forgotten to mention that the debt was fully cancelled, four years after it was contracted. The money was received by Withers very reluctantly, who, counting on Mr. Hamlen's easy disposition and careless habits, had considered the debt as a guarantee to the ultimate possession of the coveted estate.

He never forgave Mr. Hamlen for insisting on paying him, and subsequently, by secret intercommunication with one of the enemy, who proved a disgrace to his brother officers of the English navy, he matured a plan by which he succeeded in so working upon Mr. Hamlen's fears as to wring from him his consent, to save his property, and it might be, even his life, by the sacrifice of his daughter's happiness.

Two hours after Withers had withdrawn, as Bessie and Mrs. Grey were sitting together, a girl came to the door and said that there was a pedler in the outer room, who wanted to know if the ladies did not wish to purchase something. Mrs. Grey sent word to the pedler that she would be there in a minute or two, and then turned to Bessie.

"Won't you go and look at his wares?" said she.

"I believe not, as I don't wish to make any purchases," was Bessie's reply.

"You had better go. Who knows but that it may be some one by whom you can venture to send a message to some friend of yours."

This suggestion at once made her determine to go. The thought even struck her that it might be Wilton Richmond, who had resorted to this method to obtain access to her. A single glance, however, as she entered the room where he sat with a middling-sized trunk, containing his wares, at his side, showed her it was not Wilton. He was much stouter, though, as he sat, apparently not so tall, and, at least, a dozen years his senior.

At the approach of Bessie and Mrs. Grey, he threw back the lid of his trunk, and began to spread out muslins, laces, ribbons and trimmings of different kinds, together with other light and fanciful articles, such as form the decorative part of a lady's wardrobe.

Bessie wished for nothing herself, but as she had a well filled purse in the reticule which hung on her arm, she could not deny herself the gratification of making a few trifling purchases for several of the servant girls, who hovered near with glistening eyes and smiling lips.

Each was made happy by a few yards of gay ribbon, or a still gayer kerchief, whose crimson and yellow hues would appear still brighter in contrast with the sable brows they were destined to adorn. They were accepted with eager manifestations of delight, when they withdrew to a distant part of the room to examine them more critically, and forestall the pleasure they anticipated in wearing them, by planning in what manner their vivid colors could be displayed to the best advantage.

Bessie made one more purchase—a few yards of fine thread lace, which she intended as a present to Mrs. Grey, whom she had seen examining it rather wishfully, but when urged by the pedler to take some of it, hastily returned it to the place whence she took it. Bessie imagined, as was truly the case, that the high price demanded exceeded her means. She contented herself, after Bessie had made her purchases, with procuring a supply of pins, needles and sewing-silk.

"Is there anything more you would like?" said the pedler, after she had selected what she wished.

"Nothing more," she replied.

"You certainly will like something more," said he, addressing Bessie.

But she answered in the negative, and was about to turn away, when he handed her a small package done up in brown paper.

"Please examine what is in it," said he. "I think what you find will suit you."

Bessie, having untied the piece of twine which fastened it, she caught a glimpse of her own name on the back of a little white package compactly folded.

"I should like it," said she. "What is the price of it?"

"Examine it before I name the price, so as to be sure you ain't mistaken as to its quality. There is no objection to your taking it to your room, if you wish," he added, looking towards Mrs. Grey.

Bessie understood what the look meant.

"She is my friend," said she. "I can trust her."

"I am to wait till you read it."

Bessie unfolded the paper, and found, as she already was well satisfied, by the hand-writing of the superscription, that it was from Wilton Richmond.

"You may well imagine my surprise," it said, "when, on returning to Mr. Ashmore's, I found you were gone. My surprise was changed to the most lively alarm when I found that you had been made to believe that the messenger had been sent by me, for at first I imagined that by some fortunate chance you had fallen in with some friend."

"Mr. Ashmore furnished me with a fresh horse, and I was so fortunate as to come across the Indian lad I requested Edith to write to you about, who saw a man and a young lady, who, I knew by his description, must be you, take the road which led to the plantation of Withers, and where, he said, there had recently arrived as many as a dozen British soldiers."

"As I had been there myself this morning, I fortunately know some of the localities of the place. At a certain point, sweeping back in the form of a crescent from the shore of the river, which you can see by looking from one of the west windows, is a broad belt of trees and shrubbery, which, in the summer time, must be so dense as to be impervious to human foot, as well as impenetrable to the eye, and which now, though half despoiled of its foliage, must screen from the view of persons, in or near the house, any object by the margin of the river, even in broad daylight. This evening, at eight o'clock, I will be there. A boat will be ready to put us across the river, where horses will be in waiting."

"A pedler, a man worthy my confidence, will hand you this. Send me word by him, if you think it possible to meet me at the place designated. You may trust Mrs. Grey, who may be able to do something towards favoring your escape."

Bessie tore off a portion of the paper which had been left blank, and with a pencil wrote thus:

"I will do my best to meet you at the place and time you mention. If I am prevented from being there as early as eight, still don't give me up under an hour from that time."

Just as Bessie had handed it to the pedler, old Elsie entered by the outer door with the same covered basket on her arm that Wilton had seen her with.

"Ah, here is a parcel of brave trumpery," said she, coming forward, and peering curiously into the pedler's trunk, the lid of which still remained unclosed.

"Will you buy something?" said he.

"No; my day is over for such trash. The time has been when I flaunted my feathers and my ribbons with the vainest and the merriest. What have you here in these rials?"

"Essences."

"Is there any essence of hellchore, or the deadly nightshade?"

"No; I have no poisons."

"I will distil you some, then," and going up close to him, she raised the lid of her basket. "Look," said she, "here are roots."

I dug them long ago, when the sweet dew of a summer's night was on their branches. But it didn't sweeten them; it only made them the more deadly. Say, shall I distil some of 'em for you?"

"No; I don't deal in such kind of wares." And having by this time put in order the disarranged contents of his trunk, he passed the broad leathern strap attached to it across his shoulders, and saying to Bessie, as he passed her, "May you prosper, fair lady," he left the house.

"Wont you come with me?" said Bessie, to Mrs. Grey, as she turned to leave the room.

"You have received a message from some friend," said Mrs. Grey, when they were in an apartment by themselves.

"I surely am not wrong in thinking I may trust you," said Bessie, looking wistfully into the pleasant and compassionate face regarding her, instead of answering her question.

"May evil befall me and mine," she replied, "in the same measure that I willingly bring harm on you."

"Read this," and Bessie handed her the missive she had received from Wilton.

"The writer says he left here this morning," said she, having finished its perusal. "It must have been Wilton Richmond, for I see that the note is signed with the initials of his name."

"Yes, Wilton Richmond wrote it. He says, as you see, that I may trust you, and that, perhaps, you can favor my escape."

"I will do everything I can, but nothing can be reckoned on beforehand with much certainty. If Mr. Withers should happen to be at leisure this evening, and feel disposed to bestow on you his company, I hardly know how the affair can be managed."

"What o'clock is it?"

"Almost five."

"Only a little more than three hours, then, to the time appointed. It will be long enough. I wish it were only one hour instead of three."

"There will be less than one hour of daylight, and there is some preparation to be made. The first thing to be done is for you to learn the way to the place of meeting. But then what might appear plain by day, would be very different with nothing but starlight to guide you. It will never answer for you to attempt to go alone."

"What shall I do? Can you go with me?"

"I think I had better not. If Withers should inquire for you, I can excuse your absence better than any one else. We must take Numa into our counsel. He must be ready at the moment to guide you to the spot."

"Can he be relied on?"

"Yes, and without the shadow of a fear, as far as depends on himself. He loved his old master, but has little good will for this one. I will go and speak to him about it, as I may not have another opportunity."

After an absence of a few minutes, Mrs. Grey returned.

"Is he willing to go with me?" inquired Bessie.

"Yes, you may depend on him. And now, if Mr. Withers only keeps out of the way, and old Elsie shouldn't rise up like a ghost in your path—for somehow she is always sure to be where she is least desired,—I think there will be nothing more to fear."

"Two such ifs in the way, as those you mention, will be hard to get over."

"We will hope, that when the moment arrives for you to go, that neither of them will be in the way. Withers, I have no control over, but if I can only get Elsie seated in the chimney corner smoking her pipe, she will be in no hurry to leave her comfortable quarters. But I forget to tell you that there was some baggage brought here yesterday, which Withers, when he came, ordered to be placed in the chamber, which, since your arrival, he told me must be prepared for you. It belongs to you, no doubt, and there may be some things, such as can be made into a small bundle, which you would like to take with you. We will go, if you please, and see if it belongs to you."

"We shan't be likely to encounter Withers?"

"No; he is in a distant part of the house, quite remote from the apartment designed for you."

Mrs. Grey had a reason apart from the one she assigned in wishing Bessie to go to that chamber. It was the one containing the portraits of the Percival family, and now that she knew that she was acquainted with Wilton Richmond, she wished to witness the effect which would be produced on her by the striking resemblance he bore to Mr. Edgar Percival and his son, particularly the latter.

"You see what a silent company you would have had gathered round you, if you had remained here to-night," said Mrs. Grey, as they entered the chamber.

As she spoke, she drew aside one of the window-curtains, admitting the sunshine, which lit up one of the portraits with a sudden effulgence. Bessie involuntarily stepped quickly back; for while it seemed to have been quickened into instant life, she almost thought that Wilton Richmond stood before her.

"Whose portrait is this?" said she, having for some time regarded it in silence.

"Thomas Percival's."

"And this?" pointing to the next.

"His father's."

"They would either of them answer for Wilton Richmond's portrait. You surely couldn't help noticing the resemblance when he was here?"

"I did think he looked like them."

"Isn't it singular?"

"Perhaps it is, but we often meet with things there is no accounting for. I am sorry that I didn't think of them sooner; you might then have examined them at your leisure."

"I should like to look at them longer, but I've no time to spare now."

Bessie found that the luggage referred to was here, and selecting a few things which she could not well do without, she and Mrs. Grey left the chamber. In a few minutes supper was ready, and Withers again made his appearance.

"I hope you haven't been lonesome?" said he, addressing Bessie. "It cannot be possible that you have regretted more than I my inability to give you my poor company."

This was said in a mocking way, which Bessie did not think herself called upon to answer. Little was said during the meal. It was with feelings of dismay, when they rose from the table, that Bessie saw Withers seat himself in a chair near the fire, as if he intended to remain for the evening.

Time went on. It was more than half an hour since the old clock in the hall struck seven. Bessie began to grow alarmed, as well as impatient.

"You look tired, Miss Hamlen," said Mrs. Grey, wishing to give her an excuse to retire.

"I am tired," she replied. "I should like to go to my room."

"I shan't excuse you till nine," said Withers.

Before Bessie had time to say anything in answer to this, old Elsie opened the door and thrust her head into the room.

"You are wanted," said she. "Come—come now," and she beckoned to Withers.

"What does the old hag want?" he muttered between his teeth.

"What is that you say?" said she, sharply.

"No matter what," he replied, rising from his chair.

"Did you hear what I told you? You are wanted."

"I must humor her, I suppose," said Withers; "but I will be back soon."

It was with evident reluctance that he left the room, but for some reason, he did not seem as if he considered it prudent to disobey Elsie's request, or rather command. After he was gone, Mrs. Grey rose, listened a moment, and then softly opened the door, which he had closed behind him.

"Couldn't you have waited an hour or two?" demanded he, in angry accents, as could be plainly distinguished both by Bessie and Mrs. Grey.

"I could wait, but fate wot," was the answer.

Mrs. Grey remained at the door a few moments longer, and listened, then softly closed it.

"They've gone to his room," said she. "Now is your time. The soldiers are at supper in the hall, so that you will be free from the danger of encountering them."

It took Bessie but a short time for preparation. Numa was near at hand, waiting for her. There was brief time for the interchange of friendly adieux; a fervent clasp of hands, and the words, "God bless you, my child!" uttered with heartfelt emphasis by Mrs. Grey, and Bessie turned away, and joined the faithful Numa.

It was very dark, the sky so clear in the morning, being now nearly blotted from view by dark, drifting clouds, through the skirts of which, only now and then, a star was visible.

This was considered favorable, rather than otherwise, for through gloom so dense, even should any one chance to look from a door or a window, there would be little danger of being seen. Numa was familiar with every inch of the ground, and with steps so firm and elastic that they would have done no discredit to a much younger man, while he cautioned Bessie to keep a firm hold of his arm, he pursued his way.

They soon reached the belt of woodland, on the opposite side of which was the spot where Wilton had told Bessie he would wait for her. They were obliged to keep along the edge of this for some distance, the trees and shrubbery being so thick and tangled that a rabbit could have scarce found space for ingress.

"A few rods more and there's an opening," said Numa. "I came before dark and cleared away a few straggling branches which crossed the path."

At the moment he ceased speaking, voices were heard in the distance, and looking back, they beheld the red glare of torches.

"My flight is discovered," said Bessie.

"Never mind; ten more steps, and we shall reach the path."

"But if Wilton shouldn't have come?"

"There's little danger of that. Here's the opening."

"Leave me, and let me find my way alone."

"Not till I can leave you in as safe hands as mine."

"Wilton! Wilton!" cried Bessie.

"I am here," was the answer to her call.

He had heard them coming, and had met them midway in the path which led through the woods.

"Now, Numa," said Bessie, "you must return, and take with you my heartfelt thanks."

"Yes," said Wilton; "they may not have missed you yet. You can manage to go back a short distance without being seen, and then mingle with the pursuers."

"Yes—yes," replied Numa; "there'll be no trouble about that. Good-night, and I hope still to see the day when I shall again see a Percival at the head of yonder house."

In a minute from the time they parted with Numa, Wilton and Bessie stood on the bank of the river.

"Harefoot!" said Wilton.

"Close at hand," was the answer, and a boat shot from behind a clump of tall reeds, and almost in the same breath, the keel grated on the silvery sand.

"We must be quick, Bessie, or they'll be upon us," said Wilton; and snatching her up in his arms, he placed her in the boat.

The same moment, was heard a crash of brushwood, and the opposing limbs of trees, and then more than a dozen men, one after the other, dashed into the little area. The torches had been extinguished, as otherwise they could not have broken through the barrier of interlacing branches, which had to be forcibly turned aside, or cut away at every step.

"Seize him—seize him! Down with him, Tiger!" exclaimed Withers, speaking to a large, fierce mastiff which he had taken with him.

The dog darted forward with an angry growl, but the boat was already afloat.

"Fire upon them!" he cried, in a voice half choked with rage.

"But the lady, sir," a voice was heard to remonstrate.

"Who cares for the lady? Do as I bid you!" was the angry response of Withers.

"If we fire, it will be at random. We can't see the boat."

"Wait, then—wait a minute. Some one is coming with a torch."

He had scarce ceased speaking, when one of the servants with a torch, who knew where the path was, stood in their midst.

"Spring forward, and let its light fall on the water," commanded Withers, "and let those which were put out be relit."

In less than half a minute, the red glare of a dozen torches was thrown on the river, revealing the fugitives. The boat had already nearly reached the middle of the stream, and was skimming like a bird over the waves.

"They are within musket-shot yet," said Withers. "Is there no one among you who can send a bullet through that fellow's head?"

"Which one?" inquired one of the men.

"The one at the right hand. If you will do it, more gold shall be counted out to you before the rising of another sun than you were ever the owner of in your life."

"I could do it easily, sir, if the light of the torches wasn't so unsteady."

"Waste no time in words. Do your best."

The order was obeyed, but the boat still kept on with the same speed as before, and the monotonous dip of the oars, in the momentary silence that ensued, could be distinctly heard. Withers uttered a bitter imprecation.

"If one bullet wot do, let us see what a dozen can do. Take true and steady aim, all of you, at hón. If the girl is hurt, it wot be your fault nor mine."

As far as could be seen to the contrary, in the flickering, uncertain light, the command was obeyed to the letter. Not a single shot, however, took effect, more than one having been purposely caused to swerve by the hand that sent it. Had this not been so, there would have been little chance for the fugitives to escape unharmed; for though they distinctly heard the order given by Withers, the small, shod boat, with the exception of Bessie, left them fully exposed. For her alone there was room to crouch down in such a manner as to be partially screened, though had not Wilton's strong arm directed the movement, she would have had no other thought than to share the danger.

Although, as has been said, not a single shot took effect, more than one bullet whistled by, within a few inches of Wilton's head, and one, after dancing along the waves, struck the oar which he held with so much force that it must have been hurled from his hand had his grasp been less sure and firm.

"From these leaden messengers, we have nothing more to fear now," said Wilton; "for although the opposite shore, even, is hardly at a safe distance, before they can reload, we shall have time to round yonder point, when a bold shore will be interposed between us."

"Do you think we shall then be out of danger?" asked Bessie.

"They may pursue us, for there's a bridge half a mile further up the stream; but our horses are fleet, and do their best, we shall have a good start of them. But I hardly think that Withers will run the risk of implicating himself as far as that. Some powerful, though secret cause, must have urged him to take the course he has, and if I am not mistaken, it will need all the cunning and duplicity, of which he is doubtless master, to escape the reward he so richly merits."

A few more vigorous strokes of the oars, and they had swept round the sheltering point. They were already close to the shore, and at a little distance from it, secured to the branches of some trees, three horses stood waiting.

"I hardly need ask you, Bessie, if it is your wish to go to Mrs. Woodhull's," said Wilton, as he assisted her to the saddle.

"That is where I should certainly like to go," she replied; "but if we were inclined to be superstitious, as I have twice failed to reach there when I imagined I was fairly on my way, I might now bear in mind the adage that exhorts us to beware the third time."

"We will brave the warning, for the sake of your being with those you can call your friends."

"Are you sure that you know the way?"

"I am to guide you," said the Indian lad.

"Yes—he is to be our guide," said Wilton; "for though I could find my way by daylight, I could not trust myself so dark a night as this."

"Have we passed the place yet where the bridge crosses the river?" said Bessie.

"No, though here it is, right at hand. After passing by that, our course will no longer lie by the side of the river."

Soon afterwards, on attaining a spot more elevated, they looked back. The mansion whence Bessie had fled, could now be descried, looming up, shadowy and indistinct, against the leaden sky; while in an adjoining court, by the red and gloomy light of several torches, horses were seen, and men hurrying to and fro.

"They are preparing to pursue us," said Bessie.

"There can be no doubt of it," was Wilton's reply. "Withers will do that in a solitary place, and under cover of night, which he wouldn't venture on in open day."

They had, by common consent, when they found that preparation was making to pursue them, quickened the speed of their horses, as much as the roughness of the way would permit. Before long, however, the path became comparatively smooth.

"Do you think, Bessie, that you could ride still faster?" said Wilton.

"You shall see," was her answer, and she broke into a hard canter, which, her horse being naturally the fleetest of the three, gave the others enough to do to keep up with her.

In a minute more, there would be a turn in the road, when the mansion of the Percivals could no longer be seen. Wilton checked his horse and looked back. The thought would force itself upon him that the name of Percival, rather than Richmond, was the one he was properly entitled to. All was now wrapt in gloom. From one window alone, shone a light. Those who had been seen preparing to pursue them, he well knew were already on their way. In a few minutes they could be heard crossing the bridge, but the sound, muffled and dalled by the distance, was more like the muttering of distant thunder than the sharp clatter of steel-shod hoofs.

Bessie, who had reined in her horse, when she saw that Wilton had checked his, well knew what the sound meant.

"Can they overtake us?" said she.

"If they do, they will have to heat a good mile first. Will they not?" said Wilton, appealing to their youthful guide.

"More than that," was the answer.

"Very likely, for I find that the road, since the last turn, again lies parallel with the river, so that the sound made by their crossing the bridge had a shorter distance to travel than they will have."

Once more urging their horses to their former speed, they proceeded in silence.

"We had better go more slowly now," said Wilton, at the expiration of something over half an hour. "You, Bessie, as well as the horses, will give out at this rate."

"I could do very well still longer," she replied; "but if I mistake not, my horse begins to droop."

They listened. Not a sound, save the low moaning of the wind, could be heard.

"Even if they have lessened the space between us," said Wilton,—"which I hardly think they have,—we shall gain nothing by tiring our horses."

"We shall soon come to a place where two roads meet, which will perplex our pursuers," said the guide.

"How long will it take us to reach Mrs. Woodhull's?" inquired Bessie.

"An hour."

"Do you mean if we go no faster than we do now?"

"Yes—I think we can."

"By that time it will be twelve o'clock," said Wilton.

"No matter," remarked Bessie. "Mrs. Woodhull, if you claim admission in my name, will hardly refuse your request, though it should be at an unseasonable hour."

It did not exceed the time mentioned by Harefoot when they were at Mrs. Woodhull's door. It was well that they arrived as soon as they did, for in less than five minutes after they were beneath the sheltering roof, from the clouds, which for the last half hour had been rapidly condensing, the rain commenced descending in torrents.

CHAPTER XVII.

A STRANGER'S WARNING.

FOR three months after an unsuccessful attempt by General Wilkinson to dislodge a detachment of the British, who had fortified themselves at La Colle Mill, there was no hostile movement of the armies of either nation.

This repose of arms gave the American officers abundant leisure for relaxation and social intercourse, and such pursuits as were most congenial. It was during this time that Mrs. Hamlen, at the earnest request of her brother (Mr. Grosvenor) and his daughter, consented to make them a visit. Bessie, of course, accompanied her mother, and Wilton was stationed so near by as to be able frequently to enjoy with them a social evening. Sedley Austin, too, having, at the head of his company under General Jackson, acquitted himself in a manner highly honorable to himself, in the series of engagements which took place with the Creek Indians, came to the North, giving his friends a pleasant surprise, to rest on his laurels and recruit his health.

But May had now come, and this golden episode in the heart-history of Wilton and Sedley and the two fair cousins to whom they were betrothed, was near its close. In a day or two, Wilton expected to join the army of General Brown, and a week or two later, Sedley was to return to the South.

The day was so bright, balmy and delicious that May seemed no longer a myth, but the dainty-footed, flower-crowned goddess celebrated in song. Wilton and Sedley were both expected at the farm-house by five o'clock. It was already three; and while Mr. Grosvenor and Mrs. Hamlen sat together enjoying a quiet chat, Edith and Bessie wandered away some distance from the house to a small and nearly circular bay, for its green borders approximated so nearly at the point where its waters mingled with those of Lake Champlain that it had often been a pleasant pasture for them, when they were children, to toss flowers across from one to the other.

The turf was soft and smooth as velvet, and the delicate sprays of some willows, which grew near the water's edge, drooped so low as, when swayed by a gush of the sweet May air, to brush the sparkles from the dancing waves. But these graceful willows did not all press so closely to the waters of the little bay. At one point, where a grape-vine had woven itself among their branches, they curved back so as to form a little sylvan bower, where the white blooms of the wild strawberry and the large purple violets were earliest found.

Here Edith and Bessie, after their long walk, sat listening to the silvery murmur of the ripples that broke almost at their feet, and watching the interweaving and enigmatic play of sunshine and shadow which fell among them. It was not strange that footsteps at the outer edge of the willows, though firmly planted, should have been so muffled by the soft and yielding turf as not to be heard. When they paused, and a small though toil-hardened hand clutched a portion of the feathery foliage and held it aside, and through the opening thus made, a pair of keen, almost fierce-looking eyes were fixed upon them, they still remained unconscious that any one was near. No wonder, then, taking into consideration the unsettled state of the times, that they were alarmed when an unfamiliar voice, scarce three yards distant, spoke to them.

"The name of one of you is Bessie Hamlen?" it said.

They both started to their feet. It was a woman's face which was peering at them so earnestly between the willow boughs, and when they saw this, their fears were somewhat relieved.

She repeated her question.

"One of you is Bessie Hamlen?" she said.

"Yes," replied Edith, who stood a little in advance of Bessie.

"Which?"

"I am the one you inquire for," said Bessie, stepping forward.

The woman remained silent for a few moments, and looked at her very earnestly. As she stood regarding her, Bessie and Edith examined her in return. She appeared to be about forty, and was coarsely though decently clad. She was not tall, and she seemed shorter than she really was, her form being rather full, with that appearance of compactness which is imparted by severe toil, when the health and muscular powers are such as not to sink beneath the burden. Her features were well cut, though her countenance was crossed by many of those harsher lines planted by a constant tax on the physical rather than the mental energies.

"You will hardly be willing to believe me," said she, when, at last, she appeared satisfied with her scrutiny, "but the time has been when I was as handsome as you are."

"I've not the least doubt of it," said Bessie, with a voice and manner which could not make the woman doubt her sincerity.

Her swarthy brow flushed, and a faint smile flitted across her features.

"I came to upbraid you," said she, "but I shall now only warn you."

"Of what?"

"Never to be the bride of Ishmael Withers."

"You hardly need warn me against that."

"I thought you were going to be married to him."

"No, never, with my own consent."

"Then he lied to me."

"Why should you feel so much interested about me as to wish to warn me against marrying him?"

"It wasn't that I cared for you that I came here to warn you. Once I was to have been his bride. He was then Mr. Percival's steward. When he came to be master instead of steward, he spurned me. It was then that I made a vow that no wife of his should ever pass the threshold of the princely mansion where I should now be mistress. No one knows—no one can ever know—the bitterness which, since then, I have carried with me locked up in my heart."

"That, then, is what made you come here?" said Edith.

"It did, though, at the same time, I had a longing to look on a face which he told me was the handsomest and the sweetest that the sun ever shone upon. I thought he said it to torment me. But she has a sweet face—one that almost any one might love."

"But this Withers—he is very ill-looking, as I have been told," said Edith. "How could you love him?"

"I thought him good then. It was before his vile and evil passions had set their mark upon him. His serpent nature had not shown itself. He did not fawn and crawl, and almost partake so far of the curse as to eat dust like one."

As she finished speaking, she bent down and looked earnestly forward.

"What do you see?" said Edith.

"Some young gentlemen are coming. I am no fitting company for you or them. Farewell."

Without waiting to hear what the girls said in reply, she turned away just as Wilton and Sedley, who had arrived sooner than was anticipated, approached at the opposite side of the willows. She turned away, but this was only a ruse, for she experienced an uncontrollable desire to witness the meeting between the maidens and the young men who had just arrived. She saw Bessie's face brighten as she bounded forward to the side of him who first entered the enclosure.

"How could you know that we were here, Wilton?" said she.

"We didn't know; we only suspected."

"We supposed you would naturally be attracted to what we knew was a favorite haunt," said Sedley. "Besides, while yet at a distance, we heard voices."

"One of which, we thought, belonged to neither of you," remarked Wilton. "We expected to find some one with you."

"We must have been mistaken," said Sedley.

"No, you were not," replied Edith. "Some one was here. She left at the moment you came."

"Who was it?" inquired Wilton.

"She was a stranger," replied Bessie. "We neither knew her name, whence she came, nor where she was going."

"I intended," said Edith, "to invite her to go home with us, and remain all night, if her own home was distant, but when she saw you coming, she hurried away."

"Wilton, you look sad," said Bessie. "Has anything unpleasant happened to you?"

"I was thinking of Cavendish and Weston, two of my young associates," he replied. "They have both fought by my side, and I was near Cavendish when he fell. Sedley and I had occasion to pass the place to-day, where they, and many others who fell with them, now rest. They lie side by side in a sweet, sequestered spot, something like this. Early flowers were blooming on their graves."

"I wish you had been there, both of you," said Sedley, "to have heard Wilton repeat that beautiful ode by Collins. It was always a favorite, but I never realized half its beauty before. The lovely images which it brings up throws such a charm around the spot of the warrior's last repose, that, while I listened, I could not help thinking that theirs was a happy, almost enviable lot."

"I wish we had been there," said Edith. "As we were not, Wilton must recite the ode for us. It is some time since I read it, and I am unable to recall it to mind fully."

"Yes—do, Wilton," said Bessie.

Wilton had one of those deep, mellow voices, full of pathos, which searches out and brings to view those finer and more subtle traits of fancy and feeling which could hardly have been realized so fully had the poem been read in the closet. A spell seemed thrown around them, as they listened to the perfect intonation and rich modulations of his voice as he recited the ode:

"How sleep the brave who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod,
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.

"By fairy hands their knell is rung;
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall a while repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there!"

The woman, who, unknown to them, had stood looking through the willows, when he had finished, turned away.

"She did not deceive me," she murmured to herself. "She had rather marry the poor soldier with his handsome face, than the rich villain with his handsome house. It may be that the handsome soldier and the princely mansion will, one day, both be hers."

That evening, at eleven o'clock, Wilton bade them all farewell, not expecting to meet them again for a number of months.

ROBBER TRIBES IN INDIA.

The Panjab frontier, in the northern part of Hindostan, has for a long time been infested by robber clans, who, dwelling in miserable villages among almost inaccessible rocks, have until recently made defiance to all the efforts of the British government to arrest their career of robbery. Recently, a band of these outlaws descended from their mountain fastnesses, and after murdering nineteen peasants, carried off a considerable amount of property. The English commander of the troops in the neighborhood therefore resolved to try a new expedient, rather than to advance against them as heretofore, in force. He established a strict blockade, stopped their trade, seized their supply of salt, caught a chief or two, and all their bullocks, and waited for distress to do its work. The tribe submitted. They possess much wood on their bleak hills; and they were ordered to bring in fifteen thousand mounds of firewood, and stack it on the scene of the murder. The savages found the labor almost intolerable. They pleaded for permission to pay in cash, but the request was refused, and for three months the tribe must work like convicts for the benefit of the public works. The wood was saleable in Kohat, so that they are paying the debt both in person and in property, and with interest. When this task is complete, the chiefs must be ransomed. This is a point of honor, and the ransom, like the fine, must be worked out. The lesson will not be speedily forgotten. While the clans have gained the plunder of a few horses and the pleasure which may accrue from nineteen successive murders, they have lost their chief and all their cattle, three thousand rupees, and the severe labor of three long months.—United States Gazette.

FINDING MONEY IN EGYPT.

A villager lately found some money in the bank of the Nile by accident, but not by happy accident; for what is good fortune in the West, is a misfortune in the East, so reversed is the order of things in the latter. The villager was in a boat, with three others, and mooring their boat into the bank of the river, stole in an earthen jar buried in the soil and containing money. Three of the trovers took some; the fourth, being a cautious man, and having his doubts as to the consequences, did not. The circumstance, of course, came to the ears of the nearest governor, and the men were all put in prison. First, they were all bastinadoed for keeping the thing from him; and next, because they did not produce as much as the governor considered they must have taken. The poor fellows gave up all; but why should the governor believe they had given up all, or that one of them had taken none? A little more heating and a little more imprisonment had the desired effect of producing more money, the unlucky finders being glad to take some from their own stores at home, besides what they had taken from the accursed jar in the bank, to satisfy the hungry and cautious governor.—G. T. Louth's Egypt.

A MORAL WELL POINTED.

Sophonius, a wise teacher, would not permit his grown-up sons and daughters to associate with those whose conduct was not pure and upright. "Dear father," said the gentle Eulalia to him one day when he forbade her, in company with her brother, to visit the volatile Laciada, "you must think as very childish if you imagine we would be exposed to danger by it." The father took in silence a dead coal from the hearth and reached it to his daughter. "It will not burn you, my child; take it." She did so, and behold, her delicate white hand was soiled and blackened, and, as it chanced, her white dress, too. We cannot be too careful in handling coals—even if they do not burn, they blacken. So it is with the company of the vicious.—Hervey.

DECISION OF CHARACTER.—Without it no man or woman is ever worth a button, nor ever can be. Without a man becomes at once a good-natured nobody; the poverty-stricken possessor of but one solitary principle—that of obliging everybody under the sun merely for the asking.

PRINCE FREDERICK WILLIAM.

The good looking young man, whose portrait, engraved from a photograph, faces us on this page, is Prince Frederick William of Prussia, an object of some interest just at present, from the fact of his being affianced to the Princess Royal of England, to whom he is to be married about a twelvemonth hence. These princely marriages are rarely affairs of the heart, the bride and bridegroom being merely the figures moved by statesmen on the great chessboard of politics. Yet these alliances are sometimes not purely dictated by policy, but are also affairs of the heart. We believe that the union of Prince Albert and Queen Victoria was a love-match; that of Louis Napoleon and the Countess de Montijo certainly was, for it brought him no political strength. The engagement between their prince and the daughter of Queen Victoria is very favorably received by the Prussian courtiers and people. They see in it another tie to a country whose name is powerful no less for its strength than its integrity. They boast of the virtue, uprightness and honor of the prince who is now the suitor; they laud the princess royal, and heap compliment upon all who strove to bring about the union. With the Prussians, the idea of this alliance causes quite a rage; with Britons, such matters are treated in a different way. The fire of the German is lost in the cold calculations of the Englishman, who resolves most matters to a condition of pounds, shillings and pence; and so soon as the proposition is put forward that the royalty of England be further alloyed by the royalty of Prussia, argues that as Prince Albert brought nothing in with him, the princess royal should take nothing out with her. These notions may be very mundane and coarse, but upon these points we are not at present expatiating. It is sufficient for us here to state facts. Another order of the public look with anxiety to the future bearing of the union; they fear lest the low political morality of Prussia embroil the English in disturbances neither necessary nor advantageous. These, however, are counterpoised by those who believe that if the princess royal be united to Prince Frederick William, the sympathies of the two countries will be more congenial, and the reasons for a peaceful and unanimous policy more urgent. In short, the opinions of England are so evenly balanced that, as a whole, she will neither be sanguine nor sorrowful. But on this side of the water, the matter is regarded simply with curiosity; for, fortunately, the marriages and divorces of royal families do not concern us in the least. We sympathize with the joys and sorrows of crowned heads only as they are members of the same human family, rank being with us a matter of perfect indifference.

WARWICK CASTLE, ENGLAND, FROM THE AVON.

We recently presented our readers with a view of this famous old castle as it appeared in the pomp and glory of feudal times, and we now sketch it in its present condition, with its towers rising above the wooded shores of the classic Avon. The point of view from which our sketch is taken is a favorite one with artists, as they have here a charming landscape with all the features arranged in perfect harmony. The history of the old pile is quite interesting. Warwick Castle stands on the northern bank of the river, some eight miles from Stratford. The era of its first erection is doubtful; and Dugdale, though he speaks but doubtfully, from the authority of Rous, ascribes it to a daughter of King Alfred, who, according to that monk, in the year 915 caused the dungeon to be made, which was a strong tower, raised on a high artificial mount of earth, near the river. "It appears," says the author of the "Memoirs of the House of Grey," "by Domesday Book, that the castle belonged to the crown in the time of King Edward the Confessor, as a special stronghold for the defence of the midland parts of the kingdom, and that Turkill was governor thereof for the king." Some remains of this ancient work were visible in Dugdale's time; the mount is still to be seen on the west side of the present castle. At the conquest, William employed Turkill de Warwick to enlarge and fortify it; for which purpose four the water falls over it as a cascade, under the castle walls. Warwick Castle, among many other objects of interest, contains a most magnificent marble bacchanalian vase, of astonishing dimensions, it being seven feet in diameter and twenty-one in circumference, which is encircled on the outside with fruit leaves and branches of the vine, the latter being entwined so as to form two massive handles with grotesque masks at the end of each; the whole being in exact proportion to the magnitude of the vase. This unique specimen of ancient sculpture was discovered in the baths of the Emperor Adrian, and presented by the Queen of Naples to Sir William Hamilton, the British ambassador at that court, by whom it was forwarded as a present to the late Earl of Warwick, who erected a splendid greenhouse for its reception. This fine old feudal castle is an object of interest to all travellers in England.

(Rous says twenty-six) houses belonging to the monks of Coventry were destroyed, but on its completion, he entrusted it to the custody of Henry de Newburgh, his countryman, whom he created Earl of Warwick. George Plantagenet, created Earl of Warwick by his brother Edward the Fourth, resided here, and began to strengthen and beautify this castle, and proposed many magnificent improvements; but being prevented by his imprisonment and death, it came to his son Edward, during whose minority John Hughford was appointed constable; and in the second of Richard the Third, Humphrey Beaufort, his son-in-law, was joined with him in that charge. From this time it continued long in the possession of the crown; but Edward the Sixth, in the first year of his reign, advanced John Dudley to the earldom of Warwick, granting him this castle, with divers lands which had belonged to the former earls. All these, on his attainder escheated to the crown, were, by the favor of Queen Elizabeth, in the fourth year of her reign, granted, with the title, to Ambrose, his son; he dying without issue, it reverted to the crown, and there rested till the second year of James the First, when that king granted it in fee to Sir Fulk Greville, Knt., whom he afterwards created a baron. The castle then being in a very ruinous condition, the strongest part serving for the county gaol, Sir Fulk expended £20,000 in its reparation and embellishment. From him it descended to Francis, created Earl Brooke, of Warwick Castle, in the twentieth of George the Second, and Earl of Warwick on the 27th of November, 1759. In the civil war it was made a garrison for the parliament by Lord Brooke, and besieged by Lord Northampton in 1642, who surprised the artillery and ammunition bringing down from London for its defence. It was then commanded by Sir Edward Peito, who, though he had only one small piece of ordnance and a few muskets, defended it sixteen days, until it was relieved by Lord Brooke. The prisoners taken at Edge Hill were confined here. Robert, Lord Brooke, in the time of Charles the Second, much embellished the whole building, and particularly fitted up the state apartments. The rock on which this castle stands is forty feet higher than the Avon; but on the south side, it is even with the town. From the terrace there is a beautiful prospect. The rooms are adorned with many original paintings by Vandvke, and there is one apartment not inferior to any in the royal palaces. Across the river, near the Castle Bridge, is a stone-work dam, where

THE OLD MILL WHEEL.

BY FRANCIS A. DUFFAGE.

There's music in the glen,
Where the bright water tosses,
As the rocky shelf it crosses,
With a never-ending song
That the echoing hills prolong,
And give back again and again.
From the dam on the hill
Pours the white wave at will,
But the old mill wheel stands still.

There's a rushing to the glen—
A movement of life
In the wild waters' strife,
In the tossing of the trees
In the arms of the breeze
That shakes them again and again;
There's life and there's will,
The deep gorge to fill,
But the old mill wheel stands still.

There's sunshine in the glen—
It glitters on the branches,
On the white wave as it launches
Like an arrow from the bow,
Or an avalanche of snow
Ever falling, falling, falling—but then
Through the pleasant sunbeams fall
The gorge beneath the hill,
Black and cold stands the wheel of the mill.

It stands a thing apart—
A shadow in the brightness,
A spectre in the lightness,
Amidst the music dumb
In the sunbeams black and numb;—
Like a sorrow-stricken heart,
That no pulses ever thrill,
That no joys of life can fill,
So the old mill-wheel stands still.

OUR ALLIE.

BY ELLA DAVIS.

There's never was but one such child as Alice Leighton, and we who have known her from her babyhood, numbered among our everyday blessings of free air and sunshine and showers, always "our Allie." She was not a beautiful child, as artists count loveliness. No golden curls imprisoned the sunbeams, or brilliant lips tempted the stranger's kiss—"to common eyes a common child,"—to us a child-angel was our Allie, whose life was a new evangel. To have seen her, sitting in some hidden corner of a crowded room, one might carelessly have passed by the little drooping form, and dull, colorless cheek, unless, indeed, some chance word started her into life and interest; then the soul-lit glance of those large, earnest gray eyes, with their dark, heavy fringes, and the delicate tracery of the blue veins on that broad, calm brow, would defy forgetfulness.

No one at whom Allie ever looked with those mirror-like, truth-telling eyes of hers, ever did forget her. And it was thus Mark Lee, our minister's son, first saw her, when she was but a tiny child, and he a youth in the first flush of early manhood. It is true, he had often before, on his way to college at morning, passed a little pale child, carrying a store of books, and on Sunday recognized the same wan face, rendered more wax-like under the deep black of the mourning dress, in the farther corner of the Widow Leighton's pew; but it was at the children's gathering at his father's house, he first saw our Allie as she was. He was passing her low seat, when something he said, but a sentence carelessly uttered, waked an echo in the depth of her soul, and for a moment those heavy lids unveiled their treasures, and she met his glance. From that time Mark knew our Allie, or I should say he began to learn her; for all the strange contradiction of her wondrously blended nature, still attuned to its own perfect harmony, one could only learn gradually. Her shrieking sensitiveness to slight, of tone or look, and her modest, firm confidence of action when responsibility rested upon her; her childlike innocence and winsomeness that caressed its way to our hearts; and her marvellous womanliness, giving a quaint, old propriety to her little old-fashioned ways, were only to be reconciled by those who knew and loved her. And they trembled as they studied her; for in the low tones of her sweet voice, the quick coming of the rosy blood to the pale cheek, and the tear that a word might call to the soft eyes, were "woman's tenderness—how soon her woe."

Allie had few playmates among the children, for though she was always gentle and kind with them, and loved to watch them in their sports, she rarely joined them. When they romped and shouted on the green, she chose her cool, shady seat under the old oak; where, in breathing the fragrant air and pleasant sunshine, listening dreamily to the melody of birds, the silvery rustling of leaves and the laughter of childish, merry voices, she traced the blended shadows of the wind-stirred leaves on the long grass with the sun-flecks peeping between, unconsciously daguerrotyping on her heart refreshing sights and sounds that memory in after days would give back to obscure the sterner realities of the present. If a garland were to be woven, a knot of daisies and buttercups to be tied, or a little hand or foot, wounded by a thorn, to be bound up, no one could do it half so well as Allie Leighton.

They all loved her, and were proud to be her friends, but when she bade them "good-by," and came slowly over the meadow toward home, they all seemed to think it better she should be alone, for they would say, as they saw her at the east window peeping out between the heavy honey-suckle clusters, "Allie is resting, she so soon gets tired."

Mark Lee wasn't a child though—so very often, after that memorable evening, he found his way to the Widow Leighton's cottage, and a pretty picture Allie and he made, as they beat together over the same book or slate, his well-developed, manly form contrasting finely with the fairy-like fragileness of her symmetry, and the calm mildness of his clear blue eye, with the eager, wondering restlessness of hers, for Allie often found her school-tasks wearisome enough, till Mark's careful, patient renderings and gentle teachings rolled some great stone of difficulty from her path. Then how lightly her low laugh rang out as her bright face met his look of earnest love so fully, so frankly; for it was but a child's gratitude that beamed from her eyes, a sister's love for a dear brother that looked out from their clear depths, so purely that angels might have smiled on it.

How often in her artless innocence, and how thankfully, Allie spoke of "dear Mark's kindness in devoting so many evenings to her, it must be so dull, so wearisome for him." Little knew she of the rich reward he reaped even while he sowed, as he took so often her tiny hand in his and lingered, teaching her school-tasks, and conning the while—all unconsciously—for himself a bitter life-lesson, with the small white fingers almost enveloped in his own. In the changeful light of her speaking eyes, the gleaming of her sunlit hair, the touch of her childish hand, the tones of her well-known voice, and the sound of her light footfall, were a soul-thrilling charm to him; her very presence was a fount of happiness, so quiet and calm that he could not but drink often of its thirst-creating waters. Little, indeed, dreamed she of the priceless treasure her being was to him.

Allie seldom now carried the store of books herself. It so happened that Mark was often near the gate when his little friend came out at morning, and the evening found him always making smooth the rough paths of learning for her. Very often on the weekly holiday Mark's carriage waited at the door till Allie, in her spotless sunbonnet and snowy dress—for white was a fancy of hers and they indulged her in it—appeared on the door-stone, her little basket swinging on her arm, already equipped for a day's journey.

With a laughing good-by, he lifted the small, light figure to its seat, and springing up beside it, they rolled away over the hill. Mark always knew where the ripest, sweetest berries grew, and when the lake was most thickly strewn with the Lotus lilies; mayhap, he knew too when Allie was most herself, and would chatter away unrestrained, telling all those childish fancies, to the ear alone that best loved to hear them, away in the strawberry meadow kneeling over the low vines, her little sunbonnet thrown back from her pure brow, shading to a darker hue her brown hair, her cheek flushed with the sun's kiss, and the excitement of pleasure, and her glorious eyes so fearlessly meeting his, for he had often seen her thus; or, gliding over the lake's still bosom, strewn with the broad green leaves, and starred by the snowy blossoms, their perfume rising like an incense about her, with those tiny hands outstretched, eagerly grasping for her treasures, meanwhile his loving, almost adoring glance, telling that to him she was the purest, loveliest flower of all. With what gentle force he clasped those outspread hands and folded them with a quiet "I'll get them, Allie—you must not endanger yourself, for I promised to give you back safely to your mother at evening."

The widow was always at the door listening for the sound of wheels, and looking anxiously over the brow of the hill for the first glimpse of her darling. Gratefully she clasped her as Mark lifted his little lady to her side, then returning for her basket, laden with its fragrant burden of bright berries and peerless blossoms, with an almost reverent kiss on the child's hand held out to receive them, he bade her good-night.

Pleasant seasons rolled by in quick succession; and many rides Mark gave his little friend when the summer days were long; through green lanes, by flowering hedges, by whispering streams, brightly gleaming in the golden sheen of sunlight, through the soft dim twilight of leafy old woods, and as often, when lanes were white with snow, crackling and sparkling beneath them, the woods were gemmed and crested by the frost king, and the little streams were silent at his icy touch. It was a difficult question to decide which was the happier then, the gleeful, careless child abandoning herself to the impulsive physical delights of her new-found pleasures, or the strong man, forgetting for the time the great world, alike its cares and joys, living only in the life of his little spirit-like companion—for surely none other than elin were the changes that came over her in those pleasant days. Now a merry, laughing child, lightly tripping on before him, gaily flinging back flowers on the air; again a self-possessed tiny woman, uttering only strange, quiet thoughts and feelings, till he gazed on in very wonder at the fair young face beside him, so demurely upturned to his, almost expecting to see it visibly change into a similitude of the old, old thoughts beneath it.

Very glad and happy was the Widow Leighton to see them thus together, for she knew our Allie would shortly need some other guide and protector than herself. Care and snifering had made the language of her heart like one of old, "Few and evil have been the days of the years of my pilgrimage;" and only for Allie's sake would she have had them lengthened. Therefore, as she noted, with the quick eye of a mother's love, the tender, cherishing, almost womanly care of the minister's son for her only one, she calmly and trustfully thanked the God of her widowhood that one so well fitted to guard and keep the sacred treasure had chosen to wear on his heart her life's one gentle blossom. And so peacefully, joyfully, one blessed summer morning she waked among the white-robed throng in the New Jerusalem. By the side of the monnd where the forget-me-nots dotted the grass over the resting-place of the companion of her youth, they buried her.

Poor Allie, the sunlight seemed forever shut out from her spirit's sky, and her rare, sweet smile became rarer and sadder. Now it was that the deep, pure unselfishness of Mark's love became so beautifully apparent. The unobtrusive kindnesses which strewed her way were numberless; now it was a cluster of the rarest flowers from the rectory garden, a basket of choice fruit, or a book of gentle, soothing thoughts and heart-reaching truths, marked in diverse places by his familiar hand, till it seemed they must find their way to her heart's holiest of holies. As the first bitterness of her desolation wore away, she learned to look for his coming, to know his step on the gravel-walk from the host of kindly friends who daily came to her; to love to wander with him at sunset to the churchyard; and she did indeed repay Mark's noble devotion with earnest, heartfelt gratitude, that was love in all but its sacredly guarded secrecy—its shrinking timidity; for Allie's frank, loving greeting and warm clasp of the hand was only sisterly.

But changes came. Mark could linger no longer to gaze on her pale cheek and snowy, blue veined temple, at the vine-wreathed east window, as she bent daily over her mother's book—the best of all—conning its sacred pages, for Allie had left her native village for a distant city, where her mother's only brother had offered her a home.

She had just learned to look out upon the dusty streets and into the windows of her opposite neighbors, whose tall dwellings seemed longing to shut out even God's sunshine from her—just learned to banish from her rebellious memory the green hillside and broad meadows of her village home—when she recognized one evening among the hurrying throng on the pave, a familiar form and step. In a moment, "Dear Mark!" "Dearest Allie!" sealed her recognition. Mark, too, had come from the quiet woods and hills to make the crowded Babel his home. Allie had left him closely pursuing his studies; for the sacred calling of his fathers, for generations back, had been also the choice of his life. "To proclaim glad tidings of great joy" from the desk from which for nearly half a century his father had preached the everlasting gospel, had been the holy dream of his childhood—the longing aspiration of his boyhood—and strong in the glorious determination of his youth, he little thought that even here, in the very citadel, the tempter so soon would overthrow him.

But Allie went from him and with her the light of his soul. His love for her had strengthened with his strength, and even he knew not its power till he found that life itself was an insupportable desolation without her. He must see more of the world and men, he argued—his heart whispered the while that it was more of Allie. He wrote to a friend of his father's, one of the merchant princes of America, expressing a wish to come to the city. A place in the counting-house was offered him and he gladly accepted it.

Not daring to ask his father's blessing, he left the home of his childhood, and with it its calm content and joy. If his sin was great, so great was his temptation, and sad his expiation. To Allie, alone and a stranger as she was, Mark's familiar face became doubly dear; and he, making few other friends, resumed the evening comings as of old. Allie, no longer "little Allie," but a fair, graceful maiden, was wondrously changed since the evening of the children's party. The little frail form had expanded to the rounded beauty of early womanhood; the dull, pale languor of her cheek had given place to a fresh, clear whiteness, just tinged with the warm bright blood; and then those eyes, that grew in witchery with each year of her life, there was no fathoming their lustrous depths, unless, indeed, they chose to reflect for a moment the true heart that lived beneath them; the silken masses of brown hair, arching away from the calm, pure brow, and gracefully disposed around her small, exquisitely formed head; all these gave her a rare, high beauty even to a careless eye; how must, then, their charm have bound one who, like Mark, had watched daily their budding and slow ripening into perfection? Noiselessly, but surely, through the long years, the silken web had been woven that now so inextricably entangled the fibres of his life, and a victim most hopelessly and pitifully resigned he was.

Again he rendered himself indispensable to Allie. He brought to her the newest and the oldest books, and taught her when and where and how to read them. He unveiled before her enraptured gaze the fairy-built worlds of painting and poetry. He bore her nightly to brilliant halls, where voices of heavenly melody held entranced strong man and peerless woman, while her heart-strings trembled and thrilled to the wondrous harmony; and in her gladness he was glad. To have seen Allie happy for an hour was a fount of happiness for days; and this perfect love it was that beamed in every feature of his, that trembled in his voice, and lingered in his touch, till all but Allie read aright that the worship of his life was offered at her shrine. To her its very unguardedness was its most effectual concealment; for Mark's ceaseless kindness and tireless devotion were as necessary to Allie, and as free as the air, and she partook of both with gratitude and gladness, unfettered by a thought of repayment. She had been an ailing child, and he a strong man, who in the fullness of his love and pity, had made for her the joy of her happiest hours—she a simple girl and he her loved and revered brother. Had she for one moment thought of him as otherwise, had she dreamed that one so noble, so glorious in goodness, could have loved and wooed "little Allie" for his wife, her heart would have answered all her unspoken questions. But happily, unconsciously, she lived and loved her brother Mark more and still more day by day.

As time wore on, Mark rapidly grew in favor with the men with whom he daily mingled, and so made many friends. Among these there was one whom he most frequently mentioned to Allie, as the truest, noblest man of all, often exclaiming, with the gener ous enthusiasm which characterized him, "I'm sure, Allie, you would love him if you knew him;" while she smilingly replied, "Surely, Mark, if he is worthy of your confidence he would be of mine."

Poor Mark! little recked he of the fatal truth he uttered, for was not Allie his own treasure, a part of his soul's life? and must not she love what he loved always, and as he loved?

Running in lustily one pleasant evening, he exclaimed:

"Quick, Allie, get your bonnet. I've something new to show you, and I'm sure you want to see it."

"Never a moment to be wasted, with you, is there Mark?" said she, laughingly, as she left the room to obey him, and soon they mingled in the human current on the moonlit pave.

Hasting on to the crowded thoroughfare, where the gaily lighted windows eclipsed the moon's rays, they paused before the well-known entrance to the Gallery of Arts, where they passed so many happy hours. Once in the brilliant hall, Mark threaded his way till they stood opposite the celebrated group, "The Moral, the Physical and the Intellectual."

"Now, Allie," said he, "this painting is what we have come to see, and I must know what you think of it before I commit myself by an opinion. The impersonations are from your own sex—now as a woman, not either of them your ideal, and which one?"

"Mark, Mark! you bewilder me," said Allie. "Give me at least time to ascertain the subject of the picture, the artist's idea, and five minutes to think, before you compel me to answer."

As she turned from him, and stood silently and earnestly contemplating the painting, his eager eye was bent as earnestly on her. Passingly lovely indeed was the perfect flower that had blossomed from the pale bud of the widow's cottage. The snowy whiteness of her flowing dress as it fell in soft folds upon her graceful form, alone was the same. A mantle of blue silk fell carelessly from her shoulders, and her straw bonnet with its simple ribbon, shaded a brow more purely beautiful to him than the most heavenly of the trio her spirituelle eyes were gazing on.

At this moment a hand was laid on his shoulder, and a familiar voice saluted him with a whisper:

"Mark Lee, you are among closer observers than books and trees now, and should learn to carry your secrets in your heart, not in your eyes."

At the sound of Mark's name in a stranger's voice, Allie turned quickly round, and Mark, recovering himself in a moment, presented to her:

"My friend, Mr. Graham, Allie; his name, at least, is not unfamiliar to you. Mr. Graham, Miss Leighton."

With a faint blush, she returned, by a smile and a bow, the marked impressment of the stranger's salutation, and turned again to the picture. Frederick Graham had been spoken of so often by Mark that, unconsciously to herself, Allie had entertained a strong desire to meet him, and as he now appeared, few men could have made a more favorable impression upon her. He was tall and gracefully formed, with a well-carried head, adorned with heavy masses of hair, raven black, thrown from and contrasting finely with a brow singularly fair; dark "magnetic" eyes, and a fascinating smile disclosing treasures of teeth, faultlessly regular and white. These, with a manner of rare ease and elegance, and a soft, musical voice, made the charm of his presence complete to her. To a more practised observer than Allie, however, or one less true and single-hearted than Mark, the very perfection of the polish of his manners, and the careful modulation of his silvery voice, would have suggested a lack of what would have more than compensated for these external graces—an honest, manly heart.

"Well, Allie, said Mark, after a slightly awkward pause, "what conclusion have you come to?"

"I scarcely can tell," she replied, "what I really think of the picture, and if I could it would be mere presumption in me to express it, but since you have demanded an answer, I must hazard the admission that neither of the figures is perfect, to my taste; from the fact that the idea of the picture is entirely distasteful to me. I cannot, in my own mind, so entirely disconnect the one from the other as the artist has striven to do." Her color deepened as she hastily proceeded, for she felt that the stranger's eye was bent upon her with increasing interest; "and I fancy even he has not succeeded, for the face of the intellectual is not that of a De Medici, and implies the moral—the moral, without either of the others, could be but a pure thought, a hymn, or a prayer—and the physical alone would be a beautiful idiot. So to me the picture could only be made lovely, or true to my ideal of my own sex, by reducing the trio to a unit, and blending the three in one."

"Will Miss Leighton allow me to thank her for her better expression of my own idea of the group? And were the artist present I might be able to suggest an impersonation from the company this evening, which should be the most perfect possible blending of his ideal attributes."

The tone in which this was said was not more marked than the strictest etiquette would allow, but a glance of his keen black eye applied it well; or, why did the bright blood so quickly crimson Allie's cheek and brow?

After a short exchange of opinions, they left the hall together, and the stranger bade them good evening. As his step died away behind them, they walked on in silence, until Mark hesitatingly said:

"Allie, Frederick Graham is anxious to know more of you; shall I give him the opportunity by accompanying him to your house, some evening?"

"Certainly, Mark," was the reply; "any friend of yours would be a welcome guest."

Were not these the first insincere words Allie had ever spoken to her childhood's friend? But by these the die was cast, and together they then entered the shadow of a great coming grief. A few evenings after brought the gentlemen together, and though at first Allie and Mark conversed almost exclusively together, some expression of her thought or opinion very often drew from the stranger that silent, expressive approbation which speaks so loudly to the heart, and more than once she met the gaze of those deep, dark eyes fixed steadily upon her.

After a short interval the visit was repeated, till it soon happened that Mark rarely came alone, and when he did, Allie and he were not as they had been; they talked only on indifferent subjects, and no longer soul to soul.

Time wore on; and a change came over both. Mark's face grew paler and Allie's brighter; a new light and life beamed from her glad eyes, while his grew mournfully sad day by day. It was only in his presence that a remorseful sorrow banished her joy as she remembered his numberless kindnesses from her childhood, his patient, faithful, unselfish love, that had showed itself only to brighten her life, and never to claim its own well-earned reward, and in unutterable humiliation she avoided the silent questionings of his heart-searching eyes.

Often when he had quietly left her after bringing some new token of his constant care for her, she flung herself upon her knees, and in an agony of regretful tears prayed God to comfort the one she had so surely stricken. As she remembered how he had striven to foster all nobleness and good in her—how he had taught her that love itself is only perfect as it approaches that of the Deity—seeking only to confer, never to receive happiness; as she recalled the look and tone with which he had said, "Perfect love sacrifices itself for the best happiness of its object," she bitterly repented her "perverse blindness and unwomanly cruelty," as she termed it, and rebuked herself for not loving, where every trait was so purely love-worthy, as if, poor child, her heart's affections were in her hand, to bestow where and upon whom she chose.

The reactions from these intervals of agony were Frederick's coming—now alone—and while listening to his low-breathed tones of manly wooing, or the deep, full richness of his voice in poetry or song, earth had not a cure or sorrow for her; for the time, his presence was her world, a world of wild, dreamlike joy. As the months flew by, the strong love of her woman's heart, nay, the over-mastering passion that had bound her, overcame all else, and she blended her praises to the Giver of this fullness of her joy unutterably, with whispered prayers for the suffering brother of her heart whom she now so seldom saw.

With the unerring instinct of affection, Mark foresaw all this, and strove bravely to school himself to see Allie as another's, but the manly effort told on his haggard face; and one evening as Allie sat listening for other footsteps, he came quickly in, and clasping the small hand he had taken so often in happier days, said, in his own kindly tone:

"You love him, Allie, dear; I see it all now, blind fool that I was, to hope it would be otherwise. The prayer of my life is for your happiness. God's choice blessings rest upon you, darling; but remember, Allie, if sorrow ever should reach one so carefully guarded and so well loved, your best friend is always your brother Mark. Till I can increase, not cloud your joy, farewell!" And so before Allie could speak, he was gone, she knew not whither.

A letter from her old home, soon after, mentioned casually "Mark Lee has returned home, and resumed his studies. He is looking very pale. The close confinement of mercantile life made sad work with him, and we think it was well that it did so, for it was but a passing fancy of his, and he was never fitted for it. We hope to have him filling his father's place among us, for the good old man fails fast, and will soon be taking his last rest."

Gradually her remembrance of his grief died out in the light of her great happiness, and one glad day followed another as joyful, till her heart trembled from the excess of its own deep ecstasy. The dream was all too blissful to linger long, and even ere its rosy light had grown familiar to her, its first glow had faded, for Frederick came not as Mark had, always with the setting sun. It sometimes chanced that several evenings wore heavily away without him; and though his plea of unavoidable engagements was always softly whispered, and sealed by a loving caress, a strange sadness stole into her heart with the sound of his voice. Once, a week came and went without him, nor line to tell when she might expect his coming. As she wearily counted the long days of suspense, she remembered Mark's faithful coming through wind and storm, never failing lest she should have an anxious thought, with a bitter pang, but with unshaken confidence in her heart's chosen one. When he came, even his keen eye fell before the confiding, truthful gaze that met his; and when he told her of his father's claim upon his time, she knew him as the son of an old and haughty house, and argued well from his filial reverence and devotion.

But even her holy confidence and patient blindness served not to avert the blow; and it fell with a crushing weight upon her, as stunned and bewildered, she read the letter which followed a long absence and silence. With the quiet nerve of despair she re-read the terrible words that seemed burned on her brain, yet conveyed no meaning to her aching heart. Slowly the light dawned upon her; she—Allie—was betrayed, basely deserted by the false craven who had won her love; forsaken, and with the flimsy fabrication that a haughty father had forbidden his union with a penniless orphan, and selected for him a richly portioned bride. Cursing the "adverse fortune that had separated him from one he loved so well, and hoping she might find one more worthy of her, and more blest in being able to win and wear her," he closed by snubbing himself "ever her friend and well wisher."

For a time, Allie bowed beneath the stroke, and gave way to the wild grief, the agonized tears that welled up from her quivering, bleeding heart; but soon, summoning her woman's pride to her aid, and forcing back the wailing tears, she calmly resumed her every day duties.

The truth was this: he, a gay worldling—satisfied with the pleasures of earth, its brilliant trappings and gilded falsity—had met her, a simple wild flower, blooming by the wayside of life, and for the moment charmed by its fresh, pure loveliness and reviving fragrance, had stopped to pluck it, but ere it withered in his clasp, cast it lightly from him, for a rare exotic, forced into a gorgeous blossoming by the false light and air of the hot beds of fashion.

Nobly Allie strove with her heart-flighting sorrow, and but that her cheek was paler and her eye had lost its short-lived, wondrous brightness, a stranger would have known nothing of the struggle within; for when she had found her idol "clay," she ruthlessly tore it from its shrine. At times, in the solitude of her chamber, when the rush of agony flooded her soul, and she knew the bitter sting of wasted affection, the memory of other days and other love came over her, and the cry of her wrong heart was, "Mark, dear Mark!" Then she felt how sore had been the chastisement for lightly rejecting the gift of a heart so nobly true as his.

And he, in the peaceful quiet of his holy life, did he forget his loved one? Never for one moment, and his true heart bled more for her wound than for his own. When he heard of her paling cheek and failing strength, he resisted no longer the strong impulse of his deathless love, and as at evening he had left her, so at evening again he stood before her. With a cry half joy, half woe, she sprang to the sheltering arms outstretched to receive her; for her heart was yearning for the sure support of his strong cherishing love. And now, with the holy light of that love, the love he had long ago told her of, that joys to confer, not to receive blessings, irradiating his noble face, he gathered her to his heart and solemnly, tenderly said:

"Allie, my best beloved, my heart's idol, listen to me. Long ago I sinned for my love of you—in dust and ashes have I repented. You have suffered deeply, but without sin, and your stricken heart has not where to seek a shelter; orphaned and alone, be mine the glorious trust, henceforth, till death alone part us, ever to pillow your throbbing head in sorrow, and minister to your joy, and may He seal my life-long efforts by his all-hallowing blessing."

The response of her heart was an unuttered "amen;" for the low, solemn tone of Mark's voice, and the clear light of that moment, dissipated the mist of years, and she saw the past in its true light. The wild, fevered dream of her passion was over; her chastened spirit went gladly back to the faith of her childhood's trust; she humbly and reverently rested her head on the heart that had beaten always so true to the melody of her name.

Now again the long deserted cottage of the Widow Leighton re-echoes children's footsteps. A calm, matronly face looks out from the vine-covered east window, lovingly watching a dear, familiar form that is searching the grass for hearts-ease for another white-robed Allie, seated on the door-stone, or raising a monster kite for a little romping Mark. Here Alice Lee lives, happily as of old, in the cottage home of "OUR ALLIE."

BRILLIANT TO THE LAST.

A gentleman writing from Paris, states that M. Place, the French banker who recently failed for the immense amount of sixteen million francs, gave, on the evening before the grand catastrophe, a splendid dinner, to which were invited all the celebrities of a certain grade upon the Bourse, together with an equal number of ladies. The feast was of the most recherche kind—the cost probably being not less than twenty-five dollars a head; and the buoyant spirits of the liberal host were the theme of general admiration. When the enthusiasm was at its height, a magnificent dessert was placed upon the table, having in the centre a vase of silver gilt, which M. Place ordered the waiter to pass round to the ladies, as it contained a few nuts for their especial cracking. Every lady then plunged her hand within the vase, and drew forth whatever chance bestowed in the shape of some rare jewel, the cheapest of which could not have been worth less than sixty dollars, while some of them were of great price. After this delightful ceremony the generous host took his leave amid the reiterated applause of his guests. The next day his house was silent and deserted, and a defalcation of sixteen millions was announced before the Tribunal of Commerce.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

A USEFUL ANIMAL.

The success which has thus far attended the attempt to domesticate the camel in this country, is calling the attention to other useful animals, which may be profitably introduced. One of these animals is the Yak of Tibet—an animal which Buffon, with the enthusiasm of a naturalist, declared "is more precious than all the gold of the New World." This animal actually combines in a remarkable degree, the qualities of the horse, the ass, the cow and the sheep, since it bears heavy burdens, draws large loads, supplies milk, has flesh which is excellent, and hair which is wrought into warm clothes. The fact that the Yak is far from being a handsome animal, since it is short and shaggy, with an exaggerated horse's tail, need not hinder its being generally used, since it is as cheaply raised as the mule, bears the intensest cold with ease, and forms in every respect just the animal for poorer farmers.—Portland Transcript.

THE PASSION FLOWER.

This flower is thus named, on account of the points of coincidence between its various features and the chief circumstance of Christ's passion. The leaves are thought to resemble the spear that pierced Christ's side; the tendrils, the cords that bound his limbs, or the whip that scourged him; the petals, the apostles; the pillar in the centre, the cross or tree; the stamina with the anthers, the banner; the three styles, the nails; the triple crown upon the filaments, the thorny coronet; the radiance, Christ's glory; the white in the flower, emblematic of the purity required; the blue, the azure type of heaven. The flower continues three days open, and then disappears, typifying Christ's death and entombment.—Flower Garden.

FAITH AND PRAYER.

BY MRS. R. T. ELDREDGE.

When dark clouds are gathering o'er us,
Let our hopes be fixed above;
When life seems all dark before us,
Let us seek our Father's love.
He's all pity and compassion,
We are prone to go astray.
He will still each rising passion,
He will be our guide and stay.

Can we doubt God's power to shield us,
Since the thorn-crowned Jesus died?
Since his blood was spilt to heal us,
Need we stronger proof beside?
There are joys too pure to perish,
They are won by faith and prayer;
Joys that Christians prize and cherish,
When the heart is worn with care.

Come, ye sad, and tired, and weary,
Come, and taste the bread of life;
Friends may fail, and life seem dreary,
There's a balm for care and strife.
Seek for gems all pure and peerless,
Set in diamonds bound to shine;
Faith will never leave thee cheerless,
Prayer will soothe the downcast mind.

SNAKE-HUNTING.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

"Wags the stars went out, and the night grew dim,
And the gray dawn peered from her misty hood," the hurricane, that for twenty hours had swept the ocean and the coast, was among the by-gones, and a stark and sultry calm brooded over the waters. But the heavy swell still rolled in sullen, foaming masses over the reef, and the little schooner, with both anchors and ninety fathoms of cables ahead, plunged bows under with every succeeding wave. Immediately upon the subsiding of the gale the night before, all hands, overcome with fatigue and the violence of their exertions, had sought their hammocks, and in profound slumber buried the recollection of the dangers they had passed. With the first glimpse of morning, however, Captain Flukes lowered his ponderous body from his swinging bed, and with a roar, awakened the crew:

"Seven sleepers, ahoy! Turn out, turn out! You don't want to snooze all day, do you?"

"What in thunder is the good of hearing out so soon? I haven't had above thirteen winks since I turned in," growled Mr. Midships, the mate, sleepily rubbing his eyes, and yawning fearfully.

"Go to thy aunt, thou slogger!" responded the captain. And fishing out from a locker a big demijohn and a tin cup, he administered a "moderate quencher" all round, as we turned out—a proceeding which materially accelerated our movements.

"When did you sound the pumps last, Chips?" asked Captain Flukes, as the carpenter tossed off his pannikin of "O, be joyful!" "Not since yesterday morning," replied the wood-spoiler, holding out the dish for another go.

"Well, you'd better 'tend to it at once, for the old boat seems a trifle below her bearings; and by the plashing underneath, I wouldn't wonder if there was considerable water in her."

Chips, arming himself with a short iron rod attached to a long piece of spun yarn, disappeared up the companion way, while we lazily drew on our boots, and completed our toilet. A couple of minutes had not elapsed, however, before he rushed back to the booby hatch, and in a tone of voice expressive of no little excitement and alarm, exclaimed:

"By the powers of Moll Kelly, if there isn't four foot and a half of water in her hold, I'm a cherubim!"

"You don't say so!" ejaculated the skipper, turning out and swallowing three horns from the demijohn in rapid succession, so completely overcome with surprise as to be unconscious of what he was doing—perhaps.

"It can't be!" exclaimed the mate, following the captain's example, and briskly handling the demijohn.

"Impossible!" we all vociferated, following suit to the mate.

"Fact!" responded the carpenter, sliding down the companion ladder and imitating us.

"Come, boys," continued the skipper, leading the way on to the deck, "fist the breaks and give her a jig out; she must have strained 'mazingly last night to open her seams this way."

The double break was shipped, and with both pumps in operation we rattled away merrily to the tune of a lusty pump song, the name of which I have forgotten, if indeed it ever had a name at all. The first few lines I remember were something after this fashion:

"Gincer-ful Taylor, so-o they say—
Heave ho-o, my lads, heave ho—
Made San-ta An-na run a-way,
All on the pla-sins of Mex-i-co."

But though our pumps were of large size, and kept several stout streams running from the scupper on both sides, yet after an hour's constant pumping, it was found upon again sounding the well, that we had not gained an inch—indeed, the depth of water in the hold had increased if anything. This unwelcome discovery sent the mate and carpenter into the hold by the run, to ascertain, if possible, where the trouble was; while the crew kept the pumps jiggling, to prevent the water gaining on us.

"Well, did you diskiver any something?" asked the skipper, as Chips, after a short absence below, projected his countenance above the combings of the main hatch.

"That's just exactly what I did do," replied Chips; "the water comes in all along the garboard streak, from the forefoot chock to the waist, and can't be stopped nuther. In my 'pinion, there's a plank started, and she'll have to be hove out to come at it."

A careful examination by the captain in person, assisted by all hands, confirmed the carpenter's suspicion that a plank had started. There was nothing for it but to make a harbor at the earliest possible moment.

A protracted consultation resulted in a decision to run for the mouth of the Calabar River, a branch of the Niger, which finds its way to the sea at the southern and eastern extremity of the slave coast, where we could find a quiet harbor, in which to leave the schooner down and overhaul her bottom. The starboard anchor was at once hove up and catted, and the larboard hower hove short, in readiness to trip as soon as the sea subsided, or a breeze sprung up. But of this latter there seemed no present prospect; noon passed without bringing so much as a breath to stir the dog-vane, and the afternoon wore wearily away, as we continued our monotonous labor at the pumps, any interruption of their working causing the water to gain upon us rapidly. The heavy waves, however, no longer driven by the storm, gradually grew less and less, until they settled into a long, regular, unbroken swell, reflecting from their glassy surface the burning rays of an African sun with almost intolerable brilliancy and fervor.

Toward eightfold light eads-paws began to ruffle the smooth water around us with indications of a coming breeze. Our loud and joyous shout of gratification at the pleasant and wished-for sight, aroused the captain, who, having "striven mightily with the enemy" in the demijohn during the day, had found it convenient to stretch himself out under the hencoop to recuperate. Rolling over, and recovering his perpendicular, he stuck his forefinger into his mouth, and having apparently with some little difficulty succeeded in moistening it, he held his hand aloft to ascertain which side dried first, as indicating the quarter from which the wind might be expected.

"Hurra, boys," he exclaimed, after a moment's pause, "drop your pumps and man the windlass; fair wind in about an instant and a quarter."

And almost as he spoke, the water began to ruffle and curl upon our starboard bow, and a cool, strong breeze swept down from the north and eastward. Our windlass flew swiftly round to the tune of "Johnny Tameringo, John Tamaree," and the anchor, that had been atrip all the afternoon, was speedily hanging by the rig-stopper. The jib was run up, the schooner's head fell off, and under foretop and mainsail we dodged slowly along the coast—the bright moonlight enabling us to avoid the reefs that made out from the coast; and though the old craft rolled clumsily from the great body of water in the hold, we fared ourselves at daybreak abreast the mouth of the Calabar River, when, rounding in the starboard head braces, and flattening the main sheet, we headed up stream nearly three miles between sedgy shores overgrown with mangroves, until we came to a bend in the river where the lofty banks, rising abruptly from the water, were covered by an innumerable variety of the tallest forest trees, from whose summits a trailing network of vines and gorgeous, many-colored flowers floated down till the pendant foliage was laved by the gently flowing current of the majestic stream.

Here was the place for us. A perfect natural dry dock, combining the advantages of a good harbor, plenty of timber, and magnificent scenery. Running so closely to the bank that we disturbed the soft mud at the bottom, our water and provisions were removed to the shore, the sails unbent and formed into tents beneath the trees; the schooner moored head and stern, and a purchase rigged from both mast-heads to the trunks of two gigantic trees, when clapping luff upon luff, we soon had the vessel down on her larboard beam ends, with her keel above water. An "autopsy" held upon her hull revealed the fact that the first two planks on the starboard side were thoroughly decayed, and must of necessity be replaced by new ones.

We were not in the least disheartened by this discovery, for there was no earthly reason why we should be in haste to quit so pleasant a locality. Our wages were going on, and the comfortable aphorism of "more days, more dollars," with which a sailor solaces himself in a calm or head wind, was a source of great consolation to us in our exhausting labors of nearly three hours per diem, one third of which time was generally consumed in making suggestions as to the best mode of proceeding with the work, and another third frittered away in going to and from the schooner to the shore to light our pipes and wet our whistles, by which time the sun would get above the trees, when of course it was too hot for a white man to think of doing anything beside hunting, fishing, sleeping or playing backgammon. Sunday being a day of rest throughout all Christendom, we were particularly careful not to interfere with the established order of things by doing any useful thing on that day. Moreover, two of our crew professed to have conscientious scruples about violating the Jewish Sabbath; so we piously refrained from labor on that day also, for there was no use of part of the gang working while others remained idle.

Blue Monday has always been a lazy day since a time to which the memory of man runneth not back, and it was really surprising how many holidays we discovered. If I remember rightly, Christmas, Saint Washington's day—as sailors call the birthday of the patriot—Thanksgiving, and the Fourth of July, all occurred within the space of three weeks, besides numerous other feast days and fast days which were never heard of before. It was no unusual thing upon turning out of a morning, for one of the men to remark, "This is saint such a one's day, and I'm blowed if I going to work;" and stretching himself on the grass, he would remain deaf to all arguments to the contrary, so there was no other course to pursue than to keep him company. It would occasionally happen however, that we were wholly at a loss for a saint upon whom to throw the responsibility of our idleness, as was the case once when visited by a deputation of the natives—masculine, feminine and neuter—with whom we spent the entire day in dancing beneath the trees. A lucky thought of the mate's, however, convinced us that it was undoubtedly a legal holiday, for, as he shrewdly remarked, the fact of our having all felt such an irresistible desire to dance for such a length of time, was of itself convincing proof that it was St. Vitus's day, and no other. There was no refuting such an argument, and we slept that night the sleep of men who have performed a good work.

The sight of our camp would have charmed a lover of the picturesque. With our sails stretched between the trunks of trees, large and commodious tents were formed, carpeted by the fresh short grass, and festooned with vines and flowers, while from the overhanging branches depended our cool hammocks. Every article of convenience, comfort and luxury that the schooner contained had been landed for our accommodation; and the place, moreover, had been dignified by a sounding title, which was formally adopted at the laying of the corner-stone, which last was a smooth pebble about the size of a man's hat, beneath which was deposited with great ceremony, a plug of tobacco, the schooner's name written on the back of a ten of diamonds, and an old pipe; when the name by which the spot was thenceforth known was announced to be "The great African Hurra's Nest."

We had not been located at the nest many days before being joined by a neighbor—an American slaver under Brazilian colors, that, having been chased by an English cruiser, fled for safety up the river and moored a mile or two above us. We had exchanged visits pretty often, so we were not at all surprised upon turning out one morning, to observe one of the slaver's boats making for our camp with all possible speed, while her crew appeared to be in a high state of excitement.

"Hulloa, Captain Flukes," shouted the person who acted as coxswain, when the boat came within hail, "have you got any powder and shot knocking about?"

"Lots on it," replied the skipper.

"Will you sell us half a dozen pounds or so?"

"No, I won't!" said Flukes. "'Taint mine, it belongs to the owners."

"O, confound your owners! Will you give us some?"

"Sartin," responded Flukes, with alacrity. "Pitch a keg or two aboard that boat, boys. But I say," he continued, as the boat touched the bank, "what d'ye want of powder at this time of the morning? Anything turnin' sour up the river?"

"No, nothing of the kind," replied the slaver; "but we sighted a thumping big boa constrictor about a mile above here, and not an ounce of ammunition in the boat, or we should have probably brought him along with us."

"A boa constrictor!" exclaimed the captain, rubbing his hands with delight at the prospect of sport.

"A boa constrictor!" ejaculated the mate, seizing his rifle and slipping a charge into the barrel.

"A boy constructor!" muttered the carpenter, in a dubious tone. "What'n thunder's that?"

"Why, you notorious fool," replied the captain, "don't you know?"

"No, I don't," responded Chips, with a bewildered look; "least-ways, I dunno whether I do or not."

"Why, it's an all-fired great snake, as big over as the mainmast, and as long as the jib halyards; and is called constrictor, because it kills its prey by pinching on 'em—the poor creeters having to cave in to an 'outside pressure,' as the saying is."

"O, I see," replied Chips, with an air of relief, "a sort of a long shore sea serpent. You see I was never much of an astronomer among reptiles, and aint so familiar with snakes as some folks."

The invitation of the boat's crew to join them in the boat was joyfully accepted; and having divided our party—the captain and half a dozen men armed with guns and clubs, which last is considered the best weapon in a close encounter—going by land, while the rest of us tumbled into the schooner's jolly and followed the slaver's boat. There was always plenty of natives hanging about the camp, and were willing to take any hard work off our hands for the mere sake of being with "white folks;" so taking three or four stout fellows on board with us, we kindly allowed them to pull the oars, while we "bossed the job."

The scenery upon either side of us, as we passed up the river, was perfectly enchanting, and well worthy an extended description. But as I have lately been reading Brantz Mayer's excellent book, in which he describes African scenery so many ten thousand times better than I possibly can, I fear if I made the attempt, I should be compelled to plagiarize a page or two; and as that sort of thing is not considered pretty—if, indeed, it is not absolutely naughty—the reader must take my word, that the view was decidedly and most bewilderingly bunkum.

The oars were dexterously handled by our sable allies, whose smooth, tight-fitting, black jackets—which, by the way, are all the go in Africa—glistened in the sun like the bottom of a japanned tea tray. A short pull brought us in the vicinity of the spot where the "snake" had been seen. Upon one side, the bank rose precipitately, and was covered with gigantic trees, as at the "Hurra's Nest;" while upon the other side, the shore was flat and marshy, and overgrown with a dense thicket of cones, at least a dozen or fifteen feet in height.

The monster had not moved from the spot—and a most disgusting reptile he certainly looked, as he lay coiled in massive folds upon the ground, his ponderous tail swinging gently to and fro among the grass. He was something more than forty feet in length, of proportionate thickness, and covered from head to tail with tawny spots, like a dirty leopard. I have observed that the mention of so many feet, in describing the dimensions of any object, conveys but a very indefinite idea of size to the generality of readers—and particularly is this the case with young ladies, to whom the word feet is suggestive only of their own little trotters, which, as Punch justly remarks, are always encased in shoes at least a mile too big.

Let me endeavor, then, by a familiar illustration, to assist you to form an adequate conception of the magnitude of a boa constrictor. Just imagine, my dear young lady, that if the reptile's tail was made fast to the eaves of that magnificent four-story brick house, with green steps and marble blinds, in which you will undoubtedly reside after your marriage, which must speedily occur, if the men have any taste at all, its head would reach to the sidewalk, and rest upon the very spot where your husband's footman will stand as he assists you in and out of your thousand dollar carriage; while its body—not your husband's, nor the footman's, but the snake's—would be fully as big round as that fat Mr. Smith, who lives just round the corner, and whose daughters, although such nice girls, wear such terribly dowdy dresses.

I think I see you now, my fascinating young friends, as your mind takes in and comprehends the immensity of the monster, and you raise your little hands, with an air of pretty wonderment, and exclaim, "O, my, isn't it dreadful?" while your younger sister, who is thinking of the carriage and footman, and husband and things, merely casts a little glance at the mirror, and modestly replies, "To be."

Having sighted the reptile, we laid on our oars, awaiting the shore party, who had not progressed so rapidly as ourselves.

"So that's what ye call a boy constructor, is it?" asked Chips, gazing with an air of intense disgust at the many hundred weight of snake that lay coiled upon the bank. "Well, he looks old enough to have been the identical old serpent that supplanted Mrs. Adam with apples a while ago. I wonder how the critters travelled afore they were condemned to crawl on their belly, as we read afore?"

The appearance of the captain's party on the bank abreast of where we were lying, deprived us of the opinion of the boat's crew upon the interesting question, and drawing in to the shore, a council of war was held upon the best method of commencing the attack. All being arranged, the boat was again pulled into the centre of the stream to cut off retreat in that direction, while the others advanced towards the scene of action from different directions, so as to bring the enemy in the centre of a half circle of about an acre in extent.

The snake, as I have said, was coiled upon the bank, the voluminous folds overlaying each other in such a manner as entirely to conceal its head. To produce a change of position, without sufficiently alarming the reptile to induce him to attempt a retreat or show fight, was decidedly essential to our success. A simultaneous shout resulted only in a slightly increased motion of the tail; but at length a small stone skillfully thrown into the centre of the coil, produced the desired effect. The enormous pointed head of the animal was at once roared some twelve or fifteen feet into the air, its mouth wide open, its forked tongue darting in and out like lightning, while its basilisk eyes glared upon its assailants with no very loving expression, and a loud and horrible hiss betokened its irritation at being thus unceremoniously disturbed.

"Hissing, nint ye? Want to make us ashamed of ourselves, don't ye?" said Captain Flukes, bringing his gun to his shoulder, and taking deliberate aim. "Take that, my long acquaintance!" and pulling the trigger, a charge of duck shot was lodged directly in the reptile's open mouth. Our worthy commander being somewhat unfamiliar with this description of game, and not aware of their tenacity of life, supposed that his well aimed shot must have been a settler; and clubbing his musket, he rushed through the smoke of the discharge, which prevented his having a view of his antagonist, eager to give the finishing stroke, and secure the honor of capturing the reptile with his single arm. The scattering charge of shot, however, had no other effect than to rouse his formidable opponent into a furious rage. Darting his head some ten feet further into the air, and bringing its jaws together with a flap, it seized upon a large limb overhead, and began rapidly drawing up its body.

The captain, brave as brass, in his ignorance of the danger, rushed boldly on to the encounter, heedless of the warning cries of our African allies, until coming within reach, the serpent with a flourish of its tail brought him a tremendous crack on top of the white beaver hat he wore, "sucking" it as effectually as it could have been done by a practised Bowery boy, the rim resting upon his shoulders on either side; while at the same instant a mass of the trailing vine becoming detached by the contortions of the snake, fell over and completely enveloped him in its folds, which he very naturally took for the serpent itself.

"Fire, murder, rape and robbery!" roared the extinguished captain, his voice muffled by the hat which he vainly struggled to raise above his chin, to which it pertinaciously clung. "Take this tarnal snake off on me, somebody, wont ye? O, Lord! O, dear! Shoot him some on ye, can't ye?" he yelled, in an agony of spirit, rushing wildly hither and thither, dragging the vine along with him—his ponderous body and frightened cries reminding one strongly of the fat knight at Gadsbills—until with uncertain steps, in his benighted condition, he approached the brink of the bank, over which he tumbled, freeing himself from the vine, his head and body disappearing beneath the soft mud of the bottom, his stout legs executing the most extraordinary evolutions above the surface of the mud and water in which he stuck fast.

Our first duty was of course to extricate our unfortunate companion from his uncomfortable predicament, even at the risk of losing our game—one fat captain being, to our thinking, of more value than many serpents. A dozen strong hands at once grasped the captain's agitated contortions and gave a jerk. It was unsuccessful; another—the clinging mud and clay held him fast. At last with a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether, as Byron said, the devoted commander came out of the tepiduous mud with a bang, and was laid in the stern sheets of the boat. In obedience to his energetic pantomimic directions, and muffled spluttering, his hat was jerked from his head with no little difficulty, the crown being torn from the rim in the operation, leaving the latter hanging about his neck, not unlike the monstrous collar we see about the neck of Governor Winthrop, in the pictured representation of that ancient worthy.

"O, dear me, sartin day!" gasped the half-smothered victim, wiping his pallid, muddy countenance. "What a scare I've had! Mercy sakes alive! I wouldn't have been so frightened for all the snakes south of the Arctic circle. It's a wonder I didn't bust a vessel! Where has the consarned old likeness of the adversary got himself to now, any way?"

"Look sharp there, boys; he's going to cross the river," shouted the shore party, who had been worrying the enemy, and succeeded in putting two or three shots into him.

Leaving the captain to his reflections and his mud, we shot the boat quickly up stream to intercept the retreating animal, who, with elevated head, and mouth wide open and bloody, was swimming with many convulsions of his long carcass across the stream. A few strokes of the oar brought us directly in his path; but he still continued to advance, raising his head and neck more and more from the water as he approached, with the apparent design of throwing himself on to, and passing over the boat. But the mate had prepared a slight surprise for him, which materially altered his plan of the campaign. Seizing his rifle, Mr. Midships sprang upon the thwarts, and thrusting the muzzle of the gun almost into the serpent's open throat, he fired. Simultaneously with the report, the snake settled in the water and disappeared below the surface.

"There now, he's gone, and we shall lose his hide," was the exclamation of disappointment that broke from all, while the mate, looking rather sheepish at the unexpected result, silently reloaded his rifle.

"No, he haint gone, neither; he's only going," suddenly exclaimed the captain, with animation, pointing to the opposite side of the river.

Turning our eye in the direction indicated, we had the satisfaction of perceiving our elongated enemy slowly emerge from the water, and take refuge among the canes and reeds of the opposite shore, crashing the slender vegetation beneath his weight, and opening a broad path by which he could be tracked.

All hands were speedily ferried across the stream, and preparations made for a decisive battle. In single file, with loaded guns and drawn knives, we entered the soft and spongy trail, the mate taking the lead, with one of the negroes as a spearhead. We had penetrated perhaps a couple of hundred yards, when we came suddenly upon him. The mate raised his rifle to his shoulder, and was about to fire, when he was checked by his native aid, who gave him to understand that such a proceeding would be attended with much danger in such a confined locality, where escape would be so difficult; and further intimating that if permission was given him, he would alone capture the snake without any difficulty or danger.

The desired permission was accorded, and club in hand he quitted the direct trail, making a considerable circuit among the canes, succeeded in getting close on to the animal, whose attention was occupied in watching us. Swinging his club high in the air, he brought it down with tremendous force upon the reptile's head, with a sound such as might be produced by striking two old fashioned leather fire buckets violently together. The first blow completely stunned him, and two or three repetitions of the same caused him to stretch himself out at full length and give up his snakey ghost.

With a rope around his neck, he was speedily triced up to the limb of a tree, and his "peel" taken off, which, amid great rejoicing, and more bragging, was conveyed to the camp at "Hurra's Nest," where for several days it remained an object of universal admiration. But sad to relate, under the influence of an African sun it soon began to emit a peculiar and not very agreeable odor, which disgusted us with the trophy. So taking it to the water's edge, we inflated the skin to its utmost extent, tied a string tightly around the throat to prevent the escape of air, and set it adrift on the wide ocean, a strong east wind taking it rapidly seaward, the notion of the waves communicating to it an excessively lifelike appearance; and it is by no means improbable that being seen by some imaginative ship's crew, it was reported as the veritable old sea serpent himself.

AN OWL'S RETALIATION.

Some time since one of my servants brought me an owl which he had captured. It was a fine, vigorous bird. I placed it on a side-table, where it sat with the solemnity of the judge; but a cat, that happened to be in the room, eyed his lordship with no sort of reverence, and watching her opportunity, when she thought he was wrapped in his intensest day-dream, she sprang on the table, and seizing the breast of the dignified bird, was about to devour him. But with surprising activity he instantly liberated himself from the claws of his antagonist, and rising into the air a few feet, darted down rapidly on the back of the astonished cat, who ran round the room in agony, with her assailant riding triumphantly upon her back, and pinching her severely with claws and beak.—Andrew Cross, in the Field.

THE LAST HOURS OF WASHINGTON.

He died as he lived, and what a beautiful economy there was in his death! Not a faculty was impaired, not an error had marred the moral of his life. At sixty-six, not quite three-score and ten, he was taken away, whilst his example was perfect. He took cold, slighted the symptoms, saying, "let it go as it came." In the morning of the 14th December, 1799, he felt severe illness; called in his overseer, Mr. Rawlings, to bleed him. He was agitated, and Washington said to him, "don't be afraid." When about to tie up his arm, he said with difficulty, "more." After all efforts had failed, he designated the paper he meant for his will, then turned to Tobias Lear and said, "I find I am going; my breath cannot continue long. I believed from the first it would be fatal. Do you arrange and record all my military letters and papers; arrange my accounts and settle my books, as you know more about them than any one else, and let Mr. Rawlings finish recording my other letters which he has begun."

Between five and six o'clock he said to his physician, Dr. Craik, "I feel myself going; you had better not take any more trouble about me, but let me go off quietly; I cannot last long." Shortly after, again he said, "Doctor, I die hard, but I am not afraid to go; I believed from my first attack I should not survive it; my breath cannot last long." About ten o'clock he made several attempts to speak to Mr. Lear, and at last said, "I am just going. Have me decently buried, and do not let my body be put into the vault in less than two days after I am dead." Lear says, "I bowed assent. He looked at me again and said, 'Do you understand me?' I replied 'yes, sir.' 'This will,' said he." And these were his last words. Just before he expired he felt his own pulse; his hand fell from his wrist, and George Washington was no more.—Portifolio.

IRON CROWN OF LOMBARDY.

This famous crown, now preserved in one of the chapels of Monza Cathedral, near that city, has adorned the brows of forty-five sovereigns. One who has recently seen it says: "On entering the cathedral I found the crown chapel decorated with crimson hangings, the candles lighted, and incense burning. A scaffolding had also been erected before the altar, for the convenience of the priest who was to take the crown from its resting-place, at the back of the bronze altar-piece. He soon arrived with five huge keys hanging at his girdle, with which he proceeded to turn as many locks. Finally, after throwing open two or three doors, drawing back a silk curtain, amid a great waving of incense and constant genuflections, I saw the Iron Crown in its case of crystal, supported in the hands of two bronze cherubim. At my request, the priest took it from its resting-place, and I had leisure to examine it carefully. I found it to consist of six links of pure gold, perhaps two inches or more in width, and very thin. In fact, it resembled very much a highly ornamented dog-collar. Its outer surface was beautifully enamelled with green leaves on a white ground. It was also set at regular intervals with emeralds, garnets, and sapphires. Running round the inner circumference, and riveted to the gold links, is the iron band which gives the crown its name. Tradition declares it to be one of the nails employed in our Saviour's crucifixion, hammered out into a thin fillet. Indeed, the Italians call the crown Il Sacro Chiodo, or the holy nail. To the sanctity of this bit of iron is due all the decoration and ceremony I have alluded to.—Cor. N. Y. Tribune.

AN INCIDENT IN THE WAR.

A few Sandays since, says the Cork (Ireland) Examiner, a young and interesting country girl, plainly but neatly dressed, was standing among a group of anxious and agitated people, on the steam-packet quay, evidently awaiting the arrival of the London boat, which, it was expected, would bring home a portion of the troops returning from the Crimea. As the boat approached the quay, the young woman of whom we speak recognized him for whom she evidently was anxiously and impatiently waiting, and in a few minutes was recognized in return. Kind and friendly greetings passed between them; the young woman waved a cordial and heart-felt welcome, and her husband acknowledged her salutations. When the ship touched the quay she rushed on board, and, eagerly making her way to the place where he stood, she reached out her hand to bid him welcome again to home and friends, when the poor fellow faltered for a moment, unable to repress his emotion, turned away from her and burst into tears; both arms had been shot away! The poor woman hid her face in her handkerchief, and retired to the side of the ship, where she could indulge her grief without observation, and many of the spectators who happened to witness the scene were almost as deeply affected for the moment.

When an untrained multitude attempts to see with its eyes, it is exceedingly apt to be deceived. When, however, it forms its judgment, as it usually does, on the institutions of its great and warlike heart, the conclusions thus attained are often so profound and so unerring as to possess the character of truths supernaturally revealed.—Haithorne.

HENRY WILLARD, ESQ.,

LESSEE AND MANAGER OF THE NATIONAL THEATRE.

The accompanying portrait was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry, from a fine photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case, of this city, and is a striking likeness of the energetic and enterprising manager of our National Theatre. Mr. Willard is a son of the late Dr. Moses Willard of Harvard, Mass., a gentleman of great respectability, and a patriot of the Revolutionary War. The subject of our sketch was destined for mercantile life, and at an early age was placed in a counting-house, in which he rose from a sweeping-boy to confidential clerk, in which capacity he served long and faithfully, and a brilliant future apparently opened before him. A disastrous revolution in mercantile affairs, however, brought on the failure of the house to which he was attached, and diverted his energies into another channel. In 1828 he became associated with the late J. J. Adams as theatrical manager and lessee, Mr. Adams then having charge of the southern theatres. In 1828 and 1829 Mr. Willard introduced for the first time to the Charleston, S. C. public, Miss Kelly, Clara Fisher, Mrs. Barnes, Booth, Cooper, Hamblin, Conway, and other theatrical stars of magnitude. In 1830 he was the lessee of the Richmond Theatre, and James H. Caldwell, while playing a star engagement with him, was so much pleased with his energy and tact, that he induced him to accept the situation of prompter at the St Charles, New Orleans (Caldwell's theatre), and also engaged the whole of Mr. Willard's company, who were accordingly transferred to the stage of the crescent city. There was a boy attached to the Richmond company whom Mr. Willard advised to return to his home in New York because he exhibited no talent for the stage. The advice was adopted, and the individual, now grown to man's estate, has reason to be grateful to Mr. Willard, for he is now mayor of the city of New York. Mr. Willard remained one season at Caldwell's Theatre, and then, removing to New York, was engaged as prompter to the Richmond-Hill Theatre, then building for Mr. Richard Russell. In 1833 Mr. Hamblin sent for him and gave him the entire control of the treasury of the Bowery Theatre. He remained at the Bowery until 1836, when he leased the then Opera House in New York, and fitted it up in splendid style, making it the best house in the city. At this time he brought out in the ship Europe, James Wallack, Jr., William Mitchell and wife, Charles Howard and Bengough, the great scenic artist. The theatre opened in August, and for the first twenty six weeks the receipts amounted to $96,000—the largest amount of money taken by any theatre in this country during the same period of time. The property being sold by the stockholders to Messrs. Mauran and Hackett, was leased by them the following season to James Wallack, Esq. Mr. Willard's next step was building the elegant little theatre in Broadway, called the Olympic, where William Mitchell made a fortune and the projector lost one. His next ambition was to build the Chatham Theatre, now the National, which he sold out to Charles R. Thorne. After the lapse of a few years he leased the Howard Athenaeum, in this city, and managed it for two years. He then took the Metropolitan, New York, at its enormous rent. Being one week in arrears, the house was taken possession of by Mr. Lafarge, the legality of which proceeding is now pending before a bench of judges on law points. During the present year Mr. Willard leased the National Theatre in this city, which he opened on the second Monday in September with a fine company, under the stage management of Mr. Henry Wallack. The corps dramatique embraces a variety of talent, adequate to the representation of the whole range of the drama, tragedy, comedy, spectacle, melodrama, operetta and farce. In the ballet department the celebrated Madame Ciocci, "la Ciocci delle belle gambe," is engaged for the season. The house has been remodelled, repainted and brilliantly decorated throughout. An agreeable feature is the removal of the parquette and substitution of an old-fashioned pit, capable of comfortably seating a very large number of persons. The energy, large experience, tact, liberality and business qualities of Mr. Willard lead us to anticipate with confidence a most prosperous career for his beautiful establishment.

THE PENNY POSTMAN.

The accompanying picture is unmistakably English in the atmosphere, the buildings and the people. The central figure, the penny postman, has arrived at the dignity of a pony, more fortunate than most of his brethren who perform their rounds on foot. The milkmaid pauses to glance at him curiously as he sits in his saddle, taking forth a letter for the good dame who has come out from the moss-grown cottage, at the door of which her husband shows himself resting on the shoulder of a grandchild. In his left hand the Mercury of the post-office holds the horn whose notes give token of his approach. There is no one better known in his district than the village postman. "A stranger to those parts" knows him as they pass each other on the road to be a man of important charge, although his coat he of fustian and his leggings of leather, cut in the most yokel fashion. His gaudier fellows of the cities do their spiriting unnoticed and unknown to any one but the laqueys and servant-maids who open the door, and wish them now and then at the centre of gravity. Not so the village postman. Every one has a cheery "good day" for him and he has for every one. He is as well known and welcomed at the hall as he is at the cottage, and the mug of home-brewed is never denied to the postman. It is quite as well to be on good terms with him, for no one knows more of what is going on in the village than he does. Do you think if pretty Miss Fanny at the manor house receives six days a week a letter directed in a hold, manly hand, the envelope not "adhesive," but properly sealed with a mild-looking griffin as a crest, that he is not aware she has a lover? To be sure she has, or why does she sit every morning in the old bay-window which commands the path leading from the high-road; and, though affecting to be embroidering a pair of slippers for nobody knows who, never takes a stitch but her pretty hazel eyes look for the advent of the postman? Or, if poor Susan stands at the cottage door each morning as he passes, and still looks after him with glistening eyes if he has shaken his head in token of having no letter for her, or, what is better, if she has run down to the garden gate, with her face one smile, to receive a packet on which her name is rudely scrawled, and sealed with a patch of wax as large as half a crown, impressed with a pair of scissors open to indicate "We part to meet again," do you think he does not know that Tom Brown, who was apprenticed to Jackson, the village butcher, is still faithful to his early love, despite the smart caps and pretty faces of the London servants?

Or it Mr. Pauper-ton, the genteel nobody who came to settle in the village last autumn, has many letters with only gum or wafers to fasten them, and the superscription engrossed to look as severe as possible, do you think that he does not know that Mr. Pauper-ton is in the toils of the lawyers and will very soon be devoured? During the past two years of war the English postman's task was not always a pleasant one. How many hearts beat quicker when he came! How many pained in their throbbing when he passed by! The well-known hand brought joy before the writer's words were heard or read. The strange, unknown character on the long-expected letter told the story within that all was over, and dreadful war had slain the loved one. The postman's commission often made him the bearer of tidings that threw the pall of grief over the hearthstone.

THE CHARTER OAK.

BY WILLIE E. PARON.

Thou wert nobly reared, O, heart of oak.—MRS. HEMANS.

For years and years, till centuries had fled,
Sweeping their terrors o'er thy form,
O mighty oak! thou braved the storm,
And boldly reared thy high-brow, noble head.

The forest child had looked with solemn awe
Upon thee, ere the white man trod
New England wilds to worship God
As holy men had worshipped him of yore.

And they—the red men—when the axe was heard
Amid the forests, came and plead
That thou might'st stand! to rear thy head
Still in thy majesty, all undisturbed.

"For"—this their plea—"our fathers in the chase
Had made the old oak tree their guide;
They rallied here from far and wide,
And loved the tree; O, spare it this disgrace."

The white men heard. They did not scorn the prayer;
And year by year in strength it grew,
And still a broader shadow threw,
Standing a thing of strength and beauty there.

And then, when tyranny its iron hand
Would place upon the pilgrim's right
Thy final mission loomed in sight,
And made thy name illustrious through the land.

That name from history shall not depart;
Won when that charter flame of old
Was held by thee—as lover's hold
Their lady's memory—within thy heart.

The storm of revolution soon swept by!
And underneath thy wide spread arms
Free from the fear of war's alarms,
Brave men and fair maids basked 'neath freedom's sky.

So generation after generation came
To gaze upon thee, blessing as they gazed,
Thy monarch form, in air upraised,
Sacred by revolutionary fame.

But rocks must crumble, and the firm grow frail;
Thou, like thy kindred, must lay low;
But not by woodman's humble blow—
It took the giant death-stroke of the gale.

Thy death was glorious, as thy life had been;
The fragments of thy noble frame
Will yet perpetuate thy name,
And with it keep the "charter hiding" scene.

Thy trunk remains, fearing no tempest's frown;
Standing the treasure of the land;
Sacred from touch of spoiler's hand,
Girt with the buckler of thy great renown.

CATCHING A MINISTER.

BY JOHN THORNBERRY.

When the reverend and quite young Mr. Markov came to preach with us at our village, it was generally supposed that he would either be obliged to bring a wife along with him, or consent to suffer martyrdom at the hands of the gossips of the town. Many people esteemed it a highly inconsiderate thing, that he should have the audacity to come among us without so much as declaring his intentions on the subject. It was hardly what was expected from a "heartless boy," but a little time from the seminary, and of course profoundly ignorant of the ways of the world of our village.

But come he did, whether it was presumptuous in him or not; and come without a wife, or a word about a wife, too. And he had scarcely been installed in the place where he expected to pass the vigor and the strength of his life, when the inquisition began its labor in downright earnestness. The moment they understood him well enough to know how to take him, they did "take him" with a vengeance.

Of the multitudinous sheep's eyes that were thrown at him in the desk from behind hymn books, fans, and other Sunday ornaments of a like character, it is unnecessary here to speak. What precise effect they had upon him, no human being seemed to know. He endured them as stolidly as one of the Egyptian pyramids would endure the gaze of a party of blinking and winking travellers.

But of all those who set their hearts on the poor man, on their own especial account, none excelled, in point of perseverance and enthusiasm, Miss Ann Tippet. She had the ill fortune, besides, to be pretty well advanced beyond the years when a young lady is supposed to be most charming, and still she assumed airs that would have been a fair topic of satire even in a giddy young miss of sixteen. To be short, her aims and her age were at sixes and sevens with her. She wanted bad enough to marry a young candidate, but still she never would remember that she herself was growing old. It was unfortunate for Miss Ann; but pray, whose fault could it be?

Next in order, in point of tenacity of purpose, came the Widow Duke; not on her own account, I beg to be understood, but solely and altogether on that of her only daughter Fanny.

Ah, but Fanny Duke was a "young thing," though; and she was shrewd and obedient enough to do as her mother bade her, and she understood something of the influence of coquetry besides, and the secret fascination of smiles. Fanny knew in a moment upon whom her mother had her eye, you may be sure, and she put her eye on the same spot, just as quick as she could get it there. There was quite a difference, too, between herself and Miss Ann Tippet, in point of years; a circumstance that very often has more to do with a match, or anything of that sort, than almost any other. Fanny was fresh and blushing, like a rosebud in June; whereas in Ann's face a very close observer, such as a lover would be rather likely to be, might possibly detect a stray blemish or wrinkle.

In our town the ladies kept a sewing-circle going, especially during the winters. It is then that they come out in all their individual demonstrative force. Mrs. Slocum was the president; Mrs. Somebody-else (she always made me promise I would not lug her name into the newspapers) was vice; Miss So-and-so, treasurer; Mrs. What-d'ye-call'-em, secretary; and a handful of Mrs. and Misses jumbled together indiscriminately as executive committee, and so forth, and so forth. This sewing establishment was one of our largest institutions; and that is all there is to be said about it. Second only to the church itself in its scope and aims, it assumed even to lead the church in matters of immediate worldly moment.

Mr. Markov was forthwith elected an honorary member. He was expected to be on the ground at every meeting, and to offer a brief exhortation and prayer. With this kind of ceremony, the various members deemed themselves safe against all charges of scandal, and perfectly free to pursue their own female sociability. Once having secured the priestly services of the Rev. Mr. Markov, the ladies began to settle themselves to their weekly tasks. Mrs. Duke, the widow, too.

"You must feel lonely here, in a measure," she said to him, as she dropped a piece of her work on the floor for him to pick up. "I know what it is to go into a strange place to live myself; for when dear husband brought me here to live, I was just as much of a stranger as you are."

"Indeed!" said Mr. Markov, not knowing how he could very well say any less.

"I've often wondered whether you received quite all the attention you deserved here," said she.

"O, Mrs. Duke, the people are very kind; very kind to me, indeed."

"But what I am going to say," she pursued, dropping her voice and nodding her chair nearer his, "was only this—and I hope you'll take it just as I mean it. Any time you feel as if you'd like a home, or more of the comforts and attentions than a man like you generally gets in a boarding-house, please make my home your house, will you? I should be very happy to add to your enjoyment here, I'm sure I should."

Mr. Markov thanked her with undisguised sincerity, and said he would gladly accept her kind offer whenever the occasion might present.

"And don't be ceremonious with us, Mr. Markov," she added. "I beg you won't be that. If there is anything in this world that I dislike, it's ceremony and formality. It's all so cold. There's no friendship in it, you know."

And her eyes kindled with her sentiments in an instant.

When he came to go home one evening, who should stand in the door but Miss Ann Tippet! Mrs. Duke was on the lookout for him that day, but she happened just at that critical moment to lose him. So there stood Miss Ann, as if she was just ready to venture out into the snow and the night, but still waiting for our young minister to take her along with him.

Being a gallant gentleman, it was no part of his breeding to refuse. So he crooked his elbow with great politeness, and out they went together into the illimitable dark—Miss Tippet as tickled as a boy with a new whistle, and Mrs. Duke as chagrined as a general after a defeat and overthrow.

Thus matters see-sawed between these two rivals, the victory inclining now to one, and now to the other. One day, Miss Tippet was the winner; the next, the artful widow believed that Fanny was booked for a minister's wife for certain. This time, Miss Ann was sure she had got him; the next time, Fanny was in ecstasies over her own good fortune.

Till one day—some considerable time having now intervened—Mr. Markov was seen to come out from Ann Tippet's house. He had been there a pretty good while, for Mrs. Duke had watched the whole proceeding by the clock; and if ever a woman sat all that time on pins and needles, she was the very woman. She observed, as she peeped through the blinds, that Ann was remarkably gay as she took leave of the minister at the door, and that she curtsied and bowed, and bowed and curtsied, a great many times before he stepped down from the broad stone step before the door. This did not suit "my lady" at all. She went back into the kitchen in a jiffy, and resolved to invent some performance that would take the vertebrae out of Miss Ann's prospects immediately.

The very natural result was, in less than a week Fanny Duke gave a party; and to that party the minister was invited before anybody else was thought of. The rooms were full, though they were small affairs in themselves; and it would be no very great trouble to fill them. In the evening, at the ninth hour, in came Mr. Markov.

It is impossible to describe the delight of the ambitious Widow Duke. Her countenance, anxious and unsettled before, wore a changed look then. She was wreathed with smiles. Now she commenced the display of her generalship, and calculated on carrying off the laurels of the season.

Desirous of having Miss Tippet a witness of her triumph, she had purposely invited her in with the rest; and as soon as Ann had learned that the minister was to be there, she was not slow in making up her mind as to what was best to be done. She put on her things and went.

It was "How do you do, Mr. Markov?" and "I'm glad to see you, this evening, Mr. Markov!" and "You're always welcome to this house, Mr. Markov!" from the moment he put foot over the threshold, till the moment he stepped over it again on his way home. Fanny was brought out before him in all the brilliancy of her beauty. It was the widow's last and best card. She believed it was the only "trump" left.

When Fanny, therefore, was not in his company for the rest of the evening, Mrs. Duke herself was. And Ann Tippet was standing back all the while, and watching her own chances. In this triangular sort of play there was a good deal of excitement.

Mrs. Duke delighted, however, to throw her durling daughter and the minister together; and then she would retire to a knot of her friends, and ask if the two did not make a "beautiful couple." This was her game all the while.

"Only see how partial our minister is!" she would go around and say. "Really, I'm little afraid of something, after all. But ain't they a handsome match, though?"

Almost everybody heard her say as much as this, and many caught a great deal more. No one who did not consider her in as high ecstasies as ever a man was who had made his supper off of "laughing gas."

You must have read of the milkmaid, however, whose hopes came tumbling down from the top of her head one morning, while she was on her way to market; then you can get an idea of the feelings of Mrs. Duke, when, after wringing an affectionate "good night" out of Mr. Markov's hand, she had the mortification to behold that gentleman, for whom in truth this whole thing was got up, marching off home with Ann Tippet on his arm! Aha, the crafty old maid was too much for the widow! She laughed in her sleeve, as the good man innocently piloted her along, and wondered about what time Mrs. Duke's next party would come off!

After that event, there was an out-and-out scratch. The widow felt that she had been driven to the wall by her active enemy, and then she turned to bay. No one can describe with what desperation she fought, nor how severe was the encounter on both sides. Ann was not going to give in, neither would Mrs. Duke any sooner. It was a drawn battle, out of which each came off second best and bloody.

For a time, by mutual agreement, as it were, there was a cessation of hostilities. During the armistice, Mr. Markov got leave of absence for a couple of weeks, and left the place. While he was gone, each party exercised increased vigilance, and made ready to renew the warfare with greater spirit than ever. They had just got ready for their performances, when he returned.

But O, what confusion and dismay did not that return bring along with it! Mr. Markov came back with a bride! A married man—having in this way cut the knot that neither of them could untie!

From that day forward, both of the hostile parties were the best of friends; and if ever he had any enemies in town after that, they were the ones! They hated nobody but him.

WEALTHY BUTCHER OF LONDON.

Mons. Francis Wey, a French writer of distinction, who passed some weeks in London during the great exhibition, has recently published, in Paris, his impressions, under the title of "The English at Home." On one occasion, while riding in an omnibus, he formed an acquaintance with a fellow-passenger, from whom he derived many explanations of the strange things he saw. One of these we give:—"I addressed a few words to him concerning a carriage which just drove by. It was too fine to be elegant, and was drawn by two magnificent horses. On the box, adorned with beautiful fringe, sat a black-coated coachman; there was not a wrinkle in his white cravat—his snowy gloves were spotless. In the vehicle, on downy cushions, carelessly lounged a man without a coat, his arms bare, his sleeves turned up to the shoulder; an apron, with the corners turned up, served him as a girdle. Mr. W. asked his neighbor who and what was the strange-looking occupant of the carriage. 'The richest butcher in London,' was the reply. 'He is returning in his carriage from the slaughter-house to his residence. His forefathers were in the same business; his father left him a fortune of more than two millions, and he follows his profession—a very honorable old custom. This gentleman butcher possesses four millions.'"

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

The expenses of Congress for the current year will amount to $2,678,000. — The present postmaster at Jamestown, Lebanon county, Pa., was appointed under Thomas Jefferson's administration, by Abideen Granger, then postmaster-general, on the 23d of September, 1802. He is eighty-one years old, and does all the business himself. — Stalks of sugar cane ten or twelve feet in height, have been grown in the neighborhood of Winona, Minnesota, the present season. — The cocoa tree furnishes the Indian with bread, water, wine, vinegar, milk, oil, honey and sugar. And from its leaves, branches, and the shells and husks of the fruit, they obtain thread, clothes, vases, cups, baskets, paper, boatsails and ropes. — One million and eighty thousand silver coins were struck at the New Orleans mint in the month of July—value, $218,000. — The ensign of Nicaragua consists of three stripes, two of sky blue, with a white stripe in the centre. In the midst of the white is a circular device of the seal of the State, and the representation of seven volcanoes, in token of the volcanic range of Nicaragua. — A subscription paper is now in circulation to raise a sum to erect a new monument on Lexington Common. It should certainly be done. — The Boston, or Channing's system of fire alarm by telegraph, is on exhibition at St. Louis, and the Chamber of Commerce in that city has reported favorably on it. — At Davenport, Iowa, prairie hay is selling for $7 and $8 per ton. — The authorities of Philadelphia have numbered the police—the figures being engraved upon the badge stars. The arrangement, says the Ledger, is a good one, as it will enable those who have complaints to make against policemen, to single out their man, and obtain his name. — Experiments made in the south of California, in the culture of broom corn, flax and tobacco, have proved successful beyond all expectation. — Some of the aged fig trees of India are said to cover as much as two acres of ground by the simple extension of branches, and regiments of soldiers have taken refuge under the shadow of a single tree. — B. Stillaber, Esq., has just perpetrated a peculiar "pomo," which he will hold in readiness for the lycenists of the coming winter. — It is said of one of the shrewdest and wealthiest of the business men of the city of Washington—a gentleman now upwards of 70 years of age—that he has never set his foot in a railroad car, a steamboat, or a grave-yard, and that he has never been so far from Washington as the city of Baltimore. — There are 21,000 pinnae made in the United States each year, affording employment to upwards of 3500 workmen. — The Davenport (Ia.) Democrat states that in grading a street in Montezuma, a few days since, a sum of $230 was found, in ten and twenty dollar gold pieces. It is supposed to have been stolen, and buried there for safe keeping. — Mr. Joseph Stillson, a wealthy farmer of Bethlehem, Connecticut, was recently killed by a colt which he was attempting to catch in a pasture. He was very much mutilated and had been sometime dead when found: he was about 80 years of age. — Emma Jane, daughter of Daniel Elliott, of Smithfield, R. I., died lately of hydrophobia. Her age was three years. She was badly bitten in the arm by a mad dog some five weeks since. — It is stated as an evidence of the abundance prevailing, notwithstanding the high price of flour, that the Virginia Central Railroad has been unable to supply cars enough to transport to market the wheat and other produce which is offered at its various depots.

A NATURAL CURIOSITY.

A correspondent of the Spirit of the Times, writing from Tully, Lewis county, Missouri, says—"I saw yesterday one of the greatest natural curiosities now extant—a snake with two heads, one at each extremity. The body is about two feet long, and two inches in diameter in the centre. The snake is well formed, large in the centre, and gradually tapers to each end, with two perfect heads in every respect. But the most novel thing to witness, was its actions towards the gentleman that caught it, running one way with as much ease apparently as the other, with both tongues out, each raging apparently with anger. I have no doubt many of your readers will look upon this as a snake story, but it is a fact, and can be vouched for by many of our most respectable citizens."

THE GREAT AMERICAN STAPLE.—In many quarters cotton is regarded as the great American staple production of the United States, but it falls far behind several other articles. The crop of corn in the quantity produced and the market value, far exceeds that of any other agricultural product, being worth more than three times as much as the cotton raised in the country. The wheat crop also exceeds in value the production of cotton, while that of hay approaches within two million of dollars only, the aggregate value of the cotton raised in the United States.

MARTIN LUTHER.—The leader of the Protestant reformation is a prominent fact in the history of the world. About few men have so many books been written. Several years ago, there were collected at the great Luther Festival in Berlin, in a single room of the Royal Library, more than eight thousand volumes relating to the great reformer and his works.

A BUGBEAR.—The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Post informs us that the droschky-drivers of the city frighten their horses when they are refractory by shouting out the name of Lord Palmerston, and he is the great terror of the equine race from Lake Ladoga to the Caspian.

SHAKERS.—The number of Shaker societies in this country is eighteen, in seven different States. There are none in any foreign country. The denomination was founded through the instrumentality of Ann Lee, who was born in 1736.

The Green Bay Advocate of the 28th ult., says that black and gray squirrels are now visiting the corn and wheat fields in the vicinity by thousands. Farmers are complaining bitterly of the destruction they make among the crops. This is accounted for in a great measure by a scarcity of most all kinds of nuts in the woods this season.

The Empress Dowager of Prussia has been named chief of the 6th regiment of cuirassiers. ## STATE OF WISCONSIN.

The emblematic picture on this page is from the pencil of Billings, and designed expressly for the Pictorial. In the upper part are the State arms, embracing a plough and wheat sheaf, with a steamboat ploughing the water in the distance. On the left, at the door of a log-cabin, the wife of a settler with a young child in her arms and a boy and girl beside her, are gazing at the river, on which a party of Indians are seen rowing their canoes. A boy in the distance is calling the attention of his father to the same spectacle. In the foreground are seen a house-dog, a pig, fowls, and other indications of an agricultural settlement. Wisconsin, or Ouisconsin, was admitted into the Union as a sovereign State July 9, 1848. The French settled portions of the territory as early as 1670. From the French it passed into the hands of the British in 1763, and thus remained till 1794. It was successively connected with and separated from the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and Michigan, but was organized as a distinct territory of the United States in 1836. A portion of it was set off in 1838 to form the territory of Iowa, and in 1849 it was still further curtailed to form that of Minnesota. It now extends from the Illinois line, in north latitude  $42^{\circ} 30'$ , to latitude  $45^{\circ} 20'$ , and reaches from Lake Michigan on the east, to the Mississippi River on the west, with an area of 53,924 square miles. It may be described generally as an elevated, rolling prairie—there being no mountains, properly so called, within the State. Many minerals are found in the State, including lead, iron, some copper, and marble of various tints and varieties. Besides Lakes Superior and Michigan, which wash its eastern and northern shores, there are a number of small lakes within the limits of the State. The Wisconsin is the principal river, about 200 miles long, but there are several other streams of magnitude, though few of them present many facilities for navigation. On these rivers are numerous picturesque falls which would afford endless variety of subjects to landscape painters. The climate is free from sudden changes, though the winters are severe and long. A portion of the State is well adapted to agriculture. The staple products are wheat, Indian corn, oats, potatoes, butter and live stock, besides considerable quantities of rye, wool, beans, peas, barley, buckwheat, maple sugar, beeswax, honey, cheese and hay, with some sweet potatoes, tobacco, fruits, wine, grass-seeds, hops, flax and hemp. In 1850 there were 20,177 farms in Wisconsin. In the same year there were 1262 manufacturing establishments. In January, 1855, there were 322 miles of completed railroad in the State, and 707 miles in the course of construction. In May, 1855, Milwaukee was connected by completed railroads more or less directly with Chicago, Madison, Janesville, Watertown and intermediate points. The State enjoys great facilities for internal trade with the lakes and Eastern States. Education is well provided for in this State. Out of a total population of 305,391, there were 95,293 in attendance on school. 46,080 acres of public land have been granted for the support of a State university. There are also other colleges and academies.

CHAPTER XVIII.

BATTLE OF BRIDGEWATER.

NOWHERES else is nerve so well tested and skill displayed as in small bodies of men drawn up in the open field. Victory, which depends on united exertion, seems suspended on the prowess of each individual. Every man becomes a hero. The events on the Niagara frontier, from the third of July to the twenty-third of September, 1813, strongly illustrate our principle.

The battle of Chippewa naturally led to that of Bridgewater, and the siege of Fort Erie, and the sortie of Brown, followed as consequences of the latter. They were a series of hand to hand encounters, in which every soldier emulated the officer, and the officer forgot safety in the excitement of the struggle.

Had the skill which devised them been less, defeat must have followed; had the arm which executed relaxed for a moment, destruction awaited the victors. These triumphs were purchased with an effusion of blood which cannot but remind us that next to defeat, victory is most to be dreaded.

The sun had almost gained the western horizon, and Niagara thundered prelusive of the coming onset, ere the hostile forces met. The moon, full-orbed, looked fitfully down; now surveyed the carnage, now veiled her face from slaughter. The commotions of nature were hushed amid the wilder strife of men. The eternal voice of Niagara was heard only in the pauses of the battle.

Wherever the Americans made an impression, the British artillery, advantageously posted on an eminence, vomited death among their ranks. Brown and Scott are severely wounded, and Ripley succeeds to the command. A glance at the field pointed out the danger and suggested the expedient. The height must be stormed, or the sun rise on discomfiture and defeat.

The answer of Miller to the question, "Can you take that battery?" has become as memorable as his services were eminent.

"I can try, sir," was the heroic reply.

The command is given to the columns to move on. They are on the hill, the artillery about firing their pieces bayoneted, and the guns turned against the enemy. The British move on to the rescue, and the Americans rally to the defence. The enemy recoiled under the scathing fire poured from the height. A second and a third attempt, and the tide of battle rolls back, leaving the Americans in possession of the height and masters of the field.

Wilton Richmond had ascended the eminence, at the head of one of the columns, when the storm of battle raged wildest and fiercest. Amid the glare of its lightnings, and the deafening crash of its thunders, he led his men steadily on, and when he saw them falling by his side, mortally wounded, he dared not stay his hand, that he might even for a moment bend over them to soothe their last moments.

He had remained till the last of the enemy were dislodged, and then with the handful of his brave soldiers who still survived, had turned to pursue the flying enemy. He had proceeded only a short distance, when he heard his own name pronounced in a faint, moaning voice. He stopped, and only a few feet distant, beheld Hammett supporting himself on his elbow.

"Are you much hurt, my poor boy?" said Wilton, bending over him.

"Not dangerously, I believe. I was wounded in the side, and fainted from loss of blood. When I came to myself and attempted to rise, I found that my leg was broken. It must have been done while I was insensible."

"Most probably," said Wilton, "by one of the cavalry horses. I saw several that were riderless pass this way."

"Don't stay any longer with me," said Hammett; "you are needed elsewhere."

"The enemy appear to be completely routed," replied Wilton, "and I shan't leave you till I see you in a place of safety."

While these few words were passing between Wilton and Hammett, a man, who had already emerged from some distant place of concealment, stole towards them and crouched down behind one of the pieces of British artillery.

"Dorson, is that you?" said he, speaking to a man who stood at a little distance with his back turned towards him.

"Yes," replied the man, turning and stepping up to the place where he was crouching behind the cannon. "How came you here, Withers?"

"Hush! Don't speak my name. He's close by, and will overhear you."

"Who will overhear me?"

"You know."

"If you mean him we were speaking about before the battle, you're mistaken. I've done for him. He won't trouble you any more."

"You dealt with the wrong man. That is he."

"Where? Which way?"

"There—directly in the range of that oak."

"Yes, yes—I have him in my eye now, and will cool his courage if cold lead will do it. But are you sure it is he? I could have taken my oath that I shot him through the head."

"I am not mistaken."

"And yet you never saw him but once, and that was by torch-light."

"His birthright is written in his face. I could read it by a fainter light than this full moon gives. Mind, or he will escape you."

"I'll take him when he rises."

Dorson stood holding his rifle in such a manner as to take instant aim the moment Wilton, who was still bending over Hammett, should rise to an upright position. He did not have to wait long, and in the same breath that he rose, the rifle was pointed at his head.

"Mind! Make sure of him," said Withers.

"I've shot more pigeons on the wing than you could bag in a week. It will be a pity if I can't hit the fellow's head somewhere. If it was only daylight, I would shoot him in the eye."

"Now, then, or he'll be off," said Withers.

Before these words had fairly left his lips, a lithe, boyish form darted from behind a cannon close to where Dorson stood, and struck the rifle aside, causing it to explode. The bullet whistled by so near the ear of Withers that the concussion of the air, the same as a smart blow, for a few moments stunned and bewildered him.

"You shall have your pay for this, you young villain!" hissed Dorson, between his shut teeth; but on looking round to put his threat into execution, he found that the boy had disappeared as suddenly as he came.

"Again foiled!" muttered Withers, when he had come to himself.

"And you may thank yourself for it."

"Why so?"

"If you'd kept your tongue still, when I first took aim at the fellow's head, I should have been sure of him."

"There was no need of your stopping to listen."

"That's true. I might have considered that the fears of the coward are a hindrance to everybody else, as well as himself."

"But why don't you reload your rifle? If you have a mind to, you can have him yet."

"Well, I a'n't a mind to," replied Dorson, sullenly. "My mind was worked up to it then. I was in a fever, as 'twere. The din of battle was still in my ears. I could have taken him off then, and never thought of it again. Now, to creep after him and shoot him, would be the same to me as murder."

"Confound your casuistry! I make no such nice distinctions."

"I knew that before you told me."

Wilton, meanwhile, without having been in the least aware of the danger to which he had just been exposed, had, with the assistance of a soldier, conveyed Hammett to a small, deserted house, as a place of temporary shelter. He then went out, looked round and listened. It was evident that the enemy were in full retreat. For the present, there was nothing more to fear. By a fortunate chance, he fell in with an acquaintance who had some skill in surgery, who was able to bestow on the wounded boy such attention as was needful.

Ripley retired with his forces to Fort Erie, and Drummond, having received reinforcements, invested the fortress. The same foresight which planned, and the same valor that won the fields of Chippewa and Bridgewater, marked the defence, and gave success to the sortie which raised the siege, and closed the campaign on the Niagara frontier.

CHAPTER XIX.

PLOTING.

"I AM glad to see you, Captain Richmond."

The speaker, a middle-aged man, and in every respect of prepossessing appearance, as he said this, stepped from the door of a hotel, where he had been standing some five or ten minutes watching for the arrival of the stage-coach, and gave his hand to Wilton, who had just alighted.

Wilton returned the greeting as cordially as it had been given.

"I have been waiting for the arrival of the coach with some anxiety," said the gentleman, whose name was Ritson, as he and Wilton entered the hotel together. "Shall you go on further to-night, or remain where you are?"

"I've not exactly decided, but think I shall go on to the next stopping-place, which will enable me to take an earlier start in the morning."

"There's no time to spare, then," said Mr. Ritson, looking at his watch. "I must see you alone a few minutes, before you go. Here is a place where we shan't be likely to be disturbed."

As soon as he and Wilton had entered the room referred to, he carefully closed the door, but did not notice that one of the front windows was open, it being shaded by a thick curtain.

"I have government funds," said he, pushing a chair towards Wilton and taking one himself, "amounting to five thousand dollars, which I am authorized to request you to take charge of as far as Burder's hotel, which, if you leave here to-night, you will reach about sunset, next day after to-morrow. There you will meet a gentleman, to whose care you can transfer the money, as your route thence, I understand, does not lie in the direction of the place where it is to be conveyed."

"What is the gentleman's name who is to meet me there?"

"Mercer. You are acquainted with him, I believe."

"No; I never saw him, though I have often heard him mentioned."

"Your being unacquainted with him is of no consequence, as he will be the bearer of a letter to you, containing all necessary directions and explanations."

"What am I to do, should he fail to meet me?"

"There can be so little fear of that, it is a contingency which hasn't been provided for."

"It may happen, however."

"Well, if anything should prevent him from going himself, you may be sure that he will employ some one to supply his place, in whom he has perfect confidence. Here are fifty one hundred dollar bills, I believe. Please see if I am right."

Wilton counted the money, and found it to be correct.

"Now just sign this piece of paper," said Mr. Ritson, "that I may have something to show that I have fulfilled my engagement by delivering the money into your hands."

Wilton, after running his eye over the contents of the paper, and finding that all was correct, put his name to it. He then, after restoring the bills to their strong envelope, placed them in the inside pocket of his coat.

His indecision as to going farther that evening was now at an end, as any delay on his part might subject Mr. Mercer to the inconvenience of waiting for him.

After he had taken his seat in the coach, which was at the door in a few minutes after the business between him and Mr. Ritson had been transacted, his eye happened to fall on a man seated on the piazza, apart from any one else. There was something in his countenance, and, indeed, in his whole appearance, which struck him as being peculiarly disagreeable. It was not until after they had started that he recalled to mind the description which Bessie had many times given him of Withers. It could, he imagined, apply to no other person than the one he had just seen, and he felt nearly certain that, for the first time, he had beheld him whom, above all others, he had the greatest reason to dislike.

Wilton was not mistaken; it was Withers, who, as may be remembered, had already on two occasions seen him, without being himself in a situation to be recognized by Wilton.

Withers had, for more than an hour, been impatiently waiting in his room for the moment to arrive when he could venture to leave the hotel without fear of encountering any of its inmates. For the last five minutes, all had been silent. Softly opening his chamber door, he stood and listened. The silence continued to be unbroken, and he was convinced that all had retired to rest.

He descended the stairs, opened the front door cautiously, and then, with similar caution, closed it behind him. For half a minute he remained standing on the doorstep, carefully looking in every direction, so as to be certain that no one was near, and then, with swift, gliding steps, pursuing his course along the high road for a short distance, struck into a by-path which, winding among some hills, was soon lost to view. The path was rough, yet he went on with the same celerity as ever, something like a mile and a half, when he again struck the highway, though at a place which must have been nearly or quite four miles from the hotel. A few rods now brought him in front of a plain, though decent-looking dwelling. After a minute's delay, he went up to an end window.

"Maxon—Maxon!" said he.

There was no answer, and after a short interval he repeated the call, and then gave three raps against the window. A voice now called out, and asked who was there.

"A friend," answered Withers.

"I don't always believe all that's told me," said the voice within.

"I'm your friend Withers. Don't you know my voice?"

"Yes, I do now, and might have known it before." He then murmured to himself, "He's come to make a cat's paw of me, or he wouldn't be so particular to style himself my friend."

"Are you alone?" asked Withers.

"Nearly so. Nobody but my daughter is with me, and she is in a distant part of the house."

"Let me in, then. I have something of consequence I wish to speak to you about."

Maxon unfastened the door with as little noise as possible and conducted Withers to his bed-room, as being the apartment most remote from that of his daughter.

"Have you a good horse, Maxon?" asked Withers.

"Yes, two."

"Well, you will need one of them."

"When?"

"To-night."

"What villainous piece of business have you in hand now?"

"Nothing so very villainous."

"Nor dangerous?"

"Not for one who has such a natural turn for things of that sort as you have."

"If a natural turn is all that's wanted, better try your own hand."

"I can plan, but haven't your talent to execute."

"You mean that you haven't the courage? You are willing that your dear friend should risk having his neck brought within the compass of a halter, but are determined to take special care of your own. You may chance to miss a figure, though, some day."

"What's the use in bringing up such horrible images?" said Withers, with a shudder.

"Best to get familiarized to them," said Maxon, with a sneering smile, which would have done no discredit to Withers himself. "But why don't you come to the point? What's the use of dallying with the matter in this kind of style?"

"Have you ever heard of a man by the name of Benjamin Mercer?"

"Yes, and seen him, too. What of him?"

"Wait and you shall hear. But, first, tell me if you know where he lives."

"I do."

"Does he know you?"

"Yes, by sight, but that is easily taken care of."

"As you know where he lives, you also know that the road a few miles from his house passes over a broad, open plain, destitute of either tree or bush, which might serve as a lurking-place for man or beast."

"Yes, I know all that, of course."

"Well, this morning, soon after daybreak, he will have occasion to pass over this bare and lonely piece of road, and you must so manage, as, by the time he gets about midway, to overtake him and obtain possession of some papers he will have about him."

"In other words, you wish me to commit a highway robbery?"

"You may give it the name that suits you best."

"If I knew where he carried his papers, it might be done; but I might hunt half an hour for 'em, and not find 'em after all, and in the meantime, more lookers on might arrive than I should care about."

"That difficulty is easily settled, as I happen to know, if he has any valuable papers with him, he always carries them in his pocket-book."

"What am I to do with the papers after I get 'em? Deliver 'em up to you, though, I suppose?"

"Among the papers," said Withers, without taking any notice of either question or remark, "you will find a letter addressed to Captain Wilton Richmond."

"The fellow you've been trying to get Dorson to take off so long, eh?"

"This letter you must take to Burder's. You know where that is?"

"Yes."

"There you will find this Richmond, awaiting the arrival of Mr. Mercer."

"What next?"

"You must give him the letter, and at the same time hand him this one. I will read it to you. It is supposed to be written by Mr. Mercer."

"Yes, I understand."

"I regret that sudden and severe indisposition prevents me from meeting you at Burder's, as I had intended. Fortunately I have succeeded in engaging a friend of mine—Mr. Smith—to supply my place, to whom you will please deliver what was entrusted to your care by Mr. Ritson."

"Who is this Mr. Smith?"

"Why, you, Smith, you know, is a safe name. It would hardly do for you to call yourself by your own. Is all this clear to you?"

"Yes—clear enough; but I don't see what good it is going to do you, or anybody else."

"You have nothing to do with the good it is going to do. Bring the papers to me that Richmond will give you, and in return you shall receive better pay for what you have done than you ever did get for a week's or even a month's work. Will you undertake the business or not?"

"If I know how to get the papers from Mercer, I would."

"I suspect you've managed more difficult things than that. You are stout enough to handle two such men as he is."

"Well, it is about time for me to be gone."

"Yes; 'twill be daybreak by the time you can reach that little thicket of trees, which is only a short distance from the place where the road enters upon that long barren waste he's got to pass over."

"It will be best for me to wait there till he passes, and then follow him at a convenient distance, and watch my opportunity."

"Neither your wit nor your strength will fail you, if you have a mind to make good use of them. You had better be at Burder's as early as you can. If you arrive late, Richmond will be obliged to stay at Burder's all night, which might not prove to be much in your favor or mine. Remember, the papers Richmond gives you are to be delivered to me."

"At what time?"

"Whenever you return."

"I think I can be back by Saturday evening."

"You may expect me, then, sometime between twelve and one o'clock."

They left the house together. Withers waited till Maxon went to the stable, and led out his horse.

"Are you known at Burder's?" inquired Withers.

"I never was there, but I sha'n't trust to that. I am going to wear this wig, which is so smooth and sleek that when I get it well plastered down on my forehead, I look nearly as much as if I might be canonized for a saint, when I shuffle off this mortal coil as you do. I don't believe there's a soul in the world that would take me for Ruffing Ruhe Maxon, as I sometimes have the honor to be called."

"You are properly prepared in other respects, I suppose? You know what I mean?"

"Yes, but you might as well ask me and done with it, if I've got my pistols with me. Every one must act according to his nature, though, and it's the nature of the snake to keep in the grass."

Withers thought it prudent not to resent a speech so flattering, and telling him that he would see him again at the time appointed, hurried back to the hotel.

Maxon, after parting with Withers, showed by the celerity with which he accomplished the first two miles that there was no danger but that he would have time to arrive in due season to the little piece of woods in whose covert he was to watch the passing of Mr. Mercer. He then, however, fell into a fit of musing, and his horse, finding that he was no longer urged, though he kept on at what might be called a good journey stroke, no longer dashed forward with lightning like speed.

"Withers," said Maxon, to himself, "boasts how well he can work with his head; but he is a fool after all, or he would see that waylaying and robbing such a man as Mercer wouldn't be so safe a business as he imagines. I've a better plan of my own. The letter I have in my pocket, with Mercer's name signed to it, is as good in my opinion as half a dozen would be. I will, at least, try its efficacy; for I've no malice against Mercer, and he may go to Jericho, if he pleases, for anything that I will do to hinder him. I ain't quite as bad as Withers is yet. That drop of black blood he has in his heart has venom enough in it to poison the ocean."

His soliloquy finished, he turned and looked towards the east. As yet, there was no appearance of day. All around was wrapt in that tranquil repose which makes it seem as if there was a "floating whisper" in the air. The deep, unclouded azure of the sky, the silver radiance of the stars, and the faint gleam of a distant river, all had a tranquillizing effect on his mind, and strengthened him in his new-formed resolution.

If it could only have influenced him still further, and induced him to entirely abandon the piece of business he had undertaken, it would have been well. But he was not aware of the grave consequences which would result from merely handing Wilton Richmond a letter and in receiving in return what he imagined—as Withers wished him to believe—a bundle of papers.

He arrived at the place where he was to conceal himself till Mr. Mercer had passed, and still there was no gleam of the golden sandals of morn glancing through the mist which hovered on the distant mountain tops. Knowing that he had plenty of time, as he had a long road before him, he wisely abstained from urging his horse beyond his natural gait.

Maxon arrived at Burder's earlier than he expected. He did not inquire for Wilton, but he soon obtained sight of a young man who, he doubted not, was he. All doubt on the subject was speedily removed by hearing some one call him by name. Wilton, at that time, was standing at the door of the hotel. Soon afterward he entered. Maxon followed him, and found that there was no other person in the room.

"Captain Richmond, I believe?" said Maxon, approaching him.

"Yes—my name is Richmond."

"Then it is to you that I am to deliver this letter."

"Mr. Mercer, I presume? I've been expecting you," said Wilton.

"No; but the letter is from Mr. Mercer, as you will see when you open it."

"I see that in consequence of being taken suddenly ill, he has employed you as his agent," said Wilton, when he had read the letter.

Maxon bowed.

"Your name is Smith, he tells me."

"It is."

"I am glad to see you, since Mr. Mercer is unable to come himself. You are in such good season that I shall be able to leave here, at least, two hours earlier than I expected. If you will come with me to my room, Mr. Smith, we will despatch the business at once."

Wilton hastily wrote a few lines, for the coach in which he wished to go was to start in a few minutes, and handing it to the pretended Mr. Smith, requested him to sign it. Wilton, had he observed him, would have seen him start, when, on reading what he had written, he found that, instead of a few papers, funds belonging to government were to be committed to his charge, amounting to five thousand dollars. Bad and reckless as he was, he faltered with a half-formed intention of confessing that he was employed by Withers instead of Mr. Mercer.

This better purpose was put to flight when the money was fairly within his grasp, and by Wilton's request he had removed the envelope and counted it. An alluring picture flashed upon his imagination, in which there was a confused medley of cards, dice-boxes and other appliances of the gaming-table. He had just put the name of John Smith to the paper, when the coach in which Wilton intended to take a seat drove up the door.

"All aboard, I believe," was heard the voice of the driver through the open window.

"Wait one moment," said Wilton, who had hastily risen and thrust his head out of the window.

The forged letter and the receipt lay close to the hand of Maxon, and the time, short as it was, while Wilton's back was turned, sufficed for him to snatch them up and put them in his pocket. When Wilton turned, he thought of the papers, but not seeing them on the table, concluded he had already taken care of them.

"Give my respects to Mr. Mercer, and tell him I regret that he is so indisposed. Good-by, Mr. Smith," and Wilton hurriedly left the room.

CHAPTER XX.

FAITH, DOUBT, AND THE PROMISE.

"It is not true, Edith—I know it is not."

Bessie Hamlen, as she said this, started to her feet, and swept back the brown curls which, in careless disarray, had fallen over her brow, as for several minutes she had sat bent forward with her face buried in her hands.

"It is not true," she repeated, and her eyes, moist with tears, sparkled with indignation as she spoke.

"I hope it is not," was Edith's reply.

"Do you say you hope?" said Bessie, with a slight touch of anger in her voice. "You who know that Wilton Richmond is the very soul of honor."

"I had not always believed him to be, after what Mr. Ritson has told us, I could not even hope that the accusation against him will prove to be false."

"I care not what Mr. Ritson has said, or may say, knowing, as I do, that Wilton would sooner plunge his hand into a caldron of molten lead, than to touch a single cent, with the intention of applying it to his own use, of what was intended for the compensation of those poor soldiers who have no other means of procuring their children's bread."

"I don't blame you for your confidence in his integrity; I only wish that I could fully share it, for Wilton has ever been to me the same as a brother. But what can we think when we look at all the circumstances of the case? Five thousand dollars are entrusted to his care by Mr. Ritson, as is attested by an acknowledgment bearing his own signature. A gentleman by the name of Mercer, who was to meet him at Burder's tavern, and to whom he was to transfer the money, arrived at the time appointed, to find that he had been gone full two hours."

"Yes; but have we not also heard that a man by the name of Smith brought a letter to him from this Mr. Mercer, saying that he was prevented by sudden and severe illness from meeting him, and requesting him to deliver the money in question to this Mr. Smith?"

"Certainly; but he is unable to produce the letter or the receipt which he says was given him by this Mr. Smith."

"Edith—Edith, you but just now said that Wilton Richmond was the same to you as an own brother, and yet how eagerly you pick up every little incident which can tell against him!"

"Think not that it is without pain that I do it. I only wish that you may not deceive yourself with false hopes. When you see them swept away, your distress will only be the greater."

"I don't wish to blame you, Edith, but when one who has always conducted in a manner so irreproachable as Wilton Richmond has, it seems strange to me that you can doubt his word."

"I cannot help doubting it. You accuse me of picking up every little incident which can tell against him, but those I have named can hardly be termed little or unimportant incidents. To me, they appear only too direct and weighty. And then there are others."

"I have heard no others."

"I thought not to have told them to you, nor will I, if you prefer not to listen."

"Let me know all—the worst."

"His not appearing the following morning, after leaving Burder's, at the place where he lodged, to claim the seat in the stage-coach, which, by his desire, was reserved for him, is one. No one knew when he left, nor where he went. Subsequently, a number of fifty dollar bills, each of which bore certain private marks, which Mr. Ritson took the precaution to place on all of those entrusted to Wilton, were proved to be won from a stranger at a low gambling-house."

"And you believe that stranger was Wilton Richmond, whom we have both heard say, never spent a moment at a gaming-table in his life?"

"I can hardly think it possible, and yet, how can we do otherwise than believe it?"

"My heart tells me not to believe it, Edith, and I will obey its promptings."

GREATEST DEPTHS OF MINES.

When Abraham attained (rather more than twenty years ago) a depth of about 242 fathoms, 1452 feet, (a fathom being six feet.) Dolcoath Mine had reached 235 fathoms; Tresavean Copper Mine is gradually becoming extraordinarily deep, and it is last reported as being 2112 feet under the surface, and about 1700 feet below the level of the sea. The Consolidated Mines are 300 fathoms deep; and the United Mines 280 fathoms below the adit level. Let the reader realize these depths by imaginary pilings of the highest building, as St. Paul's and Monument, on themselves a sufficient number of times to attain the respective amounts!

Speaking of mines generally, the Eselsceat Mine at Kottenberg, in Bohemia, now inaccessible, was deeper than any other mine, being no less than 3778 below the surface. Its depth is only 150 feet less than the height of Vesuvius, and it is eight times greater than the height of the pyramid of Cheops, or the cathedral at Strasburg. The bore of the salt works of Menden, in Prussia, is 2231 feet deep, and 1993 feet below the level of the sea. Mines on high ground may be very deep without extending to the sea level. That of Valenciana, near Guanaxuato in Mexico, is 1686 feet deep, yet it is 5960 feet above the level of the sea, and the mines of the Andes must be much more. For the same reason, the rich mine of Joachimsthal, in Bohemia, though 2120 feet deep, has not yet reached the sea level. The Fire Springs at Tsen-hee-tsing, in China, are 3197 feet deep, but their relative depth to the sea level is unknown. How insignificant are the works of man compared with nature! A line 27,600 feet long did not reach the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean.—London Mining Journal.

BREATHING AND THINKING.

Let any reader think for a moment of what he experiences when he breathes, and attends to the act. He will find that his whole frame heaves and subsides at the time; face, chest, stomach and limbs are all actuated by his respiration. Now let him feel his thoughts, and he will see that they, too, heave with the mass. When he entertains a long thought, he draws a long breath; when he thinks quickly, his breath alternates with rapid alternations; when the tempest of anger shakes his mind, his breath is tumultuous; when his soul is deep and tranquil, so is his respiration; when success inflates him, his lungs are as timid as his conceits. Let him make trial of the contrary; let him endeavor to think in long stretches at the same time he breathes in fits, and he will find that it is impossible; that in this case the chopping lungs will needs mince his thoughts.—New York Mirror.

THE TEACHER'S HIGH VOCATION.

If that man deserves well of his country, who makes three spires of grass to grow where only two grew before, what praise does he merit who multiplies intelligence, who expands the slumbering faculties of the human soul, who calls forth into exercise powers capable of increasing the public stock of wealth, of virtue and happiness, and of exalting the possessor to his proper station of usefulness and importance? If that potter who has moulded the unresisting clay to forms of beauty and elegance has deserved our patronage, what glory shall be his who, faithful and diligent in his functions, has shaped the minds of men, and all to honor and virtue?—Dr. Henry Hunter.

TRIUMPHAL ARCH DE L'ETOILE, PARIS.

SCENES IN PARIS.

We present on this page a view of the famous triumphal arch de L'Etoile (the star), erected by Napoleon I., at the Barriere de L'Etoile, on the northwest side of the city of Paris. It is a noble portal to one of the most magnificent cities of modern days. Its summit commands an extensive view of Paris and its environs. Looking down in front of the arch, the eye sweeps along the avenue of the Champs Elysées, which runs nearly parallel to the Seine, the rich gardens of the Tuileries, taking in that famous old historical palace and the equally renowned Louvre abutting. As the arch appears to the greatest advantage on a gala day, we have delineated the triumphal entry of Louis Napoleon at the head of a powerful body of troops, and in the presence of a vast concourse of citizens. The designs for this useless but showy structure, which cost vast sums of money, were furnished by Chalgrin, the architect. The first stone was laid August 15, 1806. But a few of the lower courses had been raised, when, on the 1st of April, 1810, Marie Louise, the daughter of the emperor of Austria, whose marriage with the Emperor Napoleon had been concluded on the 7th of February in that year, made her solemn entry into Paris.

To receive this princess worthily, and to give her a great idea of the capital of the French empire, the procession made a long sweep. Starting from the Chateau de St. Cloud, it traversed the wood of Boulogne, and took the Neuilly road. The triumphal arch, then showed, by means of woodwork and painted canvass, what it would be when completed. The foundation of this monument delayed its elevation. The calcareous strata of the soil presented no solidity. The workmen were obliged, after digging down 24 feet, to form an artificial soil, which might support without danger the enormous weight of this structure. This artificial basis was composed of many layers of hewn stone of large dimension. Each of these layers was arranged in such a manner that the joints of one should not correspond with the joints of another course, either above or below it. The stones of these courses presented irregular forms, so that the salient angles of some were received into the retiring angles of others. On this solid base rose the arch of Triumph. It is 133 feet high, 138 feet broad, and 68 feet deep. The central arch is 87 feet high, with 45 feet opening. This structure, which required eight years of incessant labor, is adorned with immense bas-reliefs, trophies of arms, etc. "A nobler and more commanding monument at the entrance of a capital," says J. J. Jarves, "no other city can boast. From its elevated position, it towers far above all that portion of Paris, conspicuous to a great distance in the country, like a colossal gateway to a city of giants. It is simply an architectural ornament, useful only as affording from its top the best coup d'œil of Paris. The glory of exhibiting this arch has cost Frenchmen two millions of dollars additional taxes. Even they, while boasting its possession, consider it an apt illustration of their proverbial expression in regard to prodigality, 'to throw money out of the windows.' Were American citizens called to decide between the appropriations of two millions of dollars to a similar construction or for purposes of education, the schools would get it. Not so in France. The gold goes for ornament, the copper for instruction." The engraving on this page represents a levée of Louis Napoleon in the throne-room of the Tuileries. The magnificent draperies which overhang the imperial throne are ornamented by the golden bees, the emblem of industry selected by Napoleon I. to indicate the means by which he had obtained his greatness. The figure of the present emperor will be readily recognized.

LUNDY'S LANE.

BY JAMES P. FITTS.

[The battle of Lundy's Lane was fought in Canada, almost opposite the Falls of Niagara, on the night of July 25th, 1814. The spot is now distinguished by two lofty observatories.]

The harvest moon arose with radiance bright,
Her form reflected in the river green;
But poured she not her soft and mellow light
On peaceful harvest scene.
Her rays disclosed a scene of fearful strife,
A battle-plain, a conflict fierce and dread;
And notes of martial drum and piercing sife
Were requiem for the dead.

Upon the fair and green Canadian ground,
The armies of two mighty nations warred
In work of death, and made the woods resound,
And piled with dead the wood.
The thunder of the mighty waterfall
Was drowned in cannon's roar and clash of steel;
The smoke hung o'er the field like funeral-pall,
Earth shook with cannon peal.

The darkness fled, dispelled by lurid flame,
And night was turned to day before the dawn;
While fierce Belshazzar with her furies came,
For Peace was far withdrawn.
The banners of our nation mingled there,
With those of Britain, tost by battle-wave;
The British lion, springing from his lair,
Our eagle combat gave.

At last the battle ceased, the strife was o'er,
And Luna pierced the smoky canopy;
She saw the field, all drenched with human gore,
And strewn with dead the lea.
Here, where the red and blue together fell,
With broken sword and bayonet still bright,
The corpses thickly strown along the dell,
Proclaimed the fiercest fight.

But two score years have passed away—the spot
Is now as peaceful as 'twas ere that day;
The moon looks out that field, but sees she not
The battle's stern array.
So should it be, for peace is nobler far,
And should forever hold the verdant plain;
"The pomp, and pride, and circumstance of war,"
Must pale before her reign.

A TALE OF RETRIBUTION.

BY N. T. MCNROE.

I HAD had a hard day's work, and weary and tired at its close, sought my lonely bachelor's room. As I turned the key a dread of its loneliness and silence came over me, and I felt a longing for the sight of the human face divine to give me a welcome. I had passed my landlady on the stairs, who to be sure had smiled and bade me good evening; but I was nothing to her, the only interest she felt in me was to prepare my meals, to take care of my room and receive her regular pay for so doing. In passing she handed me a letter; I had been poring over letters and papers all day, and I threw the document down upon the table in disgust. It was not yet dark enough for a light, but it was just the worst time in the world for a lonely bachelor. I looked around my apartment—it contained nothing to interest me. In my survey my eye fell again upon the letter just thrown down, and as that was the only thing which could excite my curiosity, I took it up. The superscription was written in a delicate female hand; I knew it well, and rushing hastily to the window, broke the seal. A mere scrawl met my eye.

"Harry, come to me. I am dying!
Your poor brother

GEORGE."

I staggered, for an instant the room swam around and all was dark. As my shocked senses returned, I looked again at the letter, but it contained no further information. The postmark was a small town in Indiana, the same from which of late his letters had been written. And he was dying—my only brother! I had few relations, and this brother was very dear to me, he was so good, so gentle, so unlike myself. He had always been delicate; he had gone away for his health, and, poor fellow, he was just married; indeed, the wedding had taken place sooner than it otherwise would have done, to give dear Mary the right to go with him as his wife, to take care of him. He had been gone some time—I had heard from him—he was better—he was stopping in the place from whence his letter was written because the air seemed to agree with him. And now he was dying, yes, perhaps he was dead!

I must go to him—yet how could I leave! The case in which I was engaged would be decided to-morrow; it was impossible to go till after the decision—I must wait.

All that night I never slept, I never closed my eyes. I seemed to see my brother pale and wasted to a mere skeleton, and his dear wife, our Mary, whom I could not have lived to see the wife of any mortal man excepting my dear brother. O the misery of that night. Seldom have I suffered greater agony. That night lies far back in my recollection like the shadow of a dark cloud. It seemed as if the hours would never pass. I had not undressed, I only flung myself upon the bed, and rising long before daybreak, I went and seated myself by the open window. The fresh, cool breeze fanned my heated brow and cooled somewhat the fever in my veins, and I sat there watching the day break over the city.

I remember now with strange distinctness, how the first beams of morning broke over the cold, gray sky, how the heavens grew brighter and brighter, how first came faint streaks of light, then the rich crimson clouds welled up, then they grew brighter and finally changed to golden. I remember how the city awoke to life, the rumbling of wheels, first at a distance, then nearer, the tread of pedestrians under my window, then the rumbling, the tramping increased, mingled with the sounds of human voices, and the city was wide awake and busy. How well I remember all these sights and sounds—and yet at the time I heard them and saw them as if I heard and saw them not.

Well, the day passed. O that crowded court-room, the heat, the jostle, the confusion, witnesses examined and cross-examined, the lawyers' pleas, the judge's charge and the jury's decision—how strangely they are blended in my mind. The day before so much depended in my mind on the decision of this case, and now its fate was nothing to me. I spoke, they said I spoke well; however that may be, the side on which I was engaged won the case. My friends crowded round me to congratulate me; I broke from them—reached my room—took my valise, already packed for travelling, and in ten minutes was in the express train bound for the West.

I had eaten nothing since the noon of the day on which I had received the letter; I had not closed my eyes to sleep through all that night, and on the following day my nerves had been stretched to the utmost; all this, joined to the close air of the court-room, the excitement, the anguish of my mind, was too much for me. I bought my ticket, took my seat in the cars, heard the whistle, felt the motion of the train as it started, and remembered nothing more till I awoke to consciousness in a strange place.

It seemed as though I had but slept in the cars, and I listened for the noise of the machinery, the rumbling of the car wheels—all was still. Then how can I describe my anguish as the truth rushed through my mind in an instant. I had been sick, I had been detained, how long I could not tell; the thought was bitter as death. I screamed aloud in my mental anguish. My scream roused my nurse, who was sleeping in her chair by my bedside, and also called in two or three persons from an adjoining room. They came to me.

"Tell me," I cried, "how long have I been here?" It seemed as if they would never answer me. "Tell me," I screamed with my remaining strength.

"A week!"

"A week! Good God," I groaned, and fainted wholly away. But I soon returned to consciousness; the bitter horror would not leave me. A week, and who knows but he is dead—is buried—and she; O, heavens! why had this been? Why had my miserable powers failed me just at this important time? Ever sounded in my ears the words, too late, too late. I was weak as an infant. How long would it be ere I should be able to proceed on my journey? I asked my physician. He could not tell; if I took care of myself, perhaps in a week or two, but I had had a brain fever of a very alarming character, and I must be patient and keep myself quiet.

Merciful heavens! Did he only know half what I suffered. I had a tremendous will, and I would exercise it. I would not lie there. If I chose, I could get up, I knew I could. My nurse had left the room for a few minutes—I raised myself in bed. Opposite me hung a mirror; I caught a glance of a ghastly figure, and in my weak state it appeared to me like the spirit of my brother. I reached out my arms to him—ah, how my heart failed me when I realized that the thin, unearthly figure was myself, reduced to such a wreck. I fell back exhausted. However, it seemed as if my will had triumphed, for I recovered wonderfully. I ate ravenously what was set before me, for I must eat to get strength. I forced myself to close my eyes and to sleep, and soon I began to feel returning strength. I thanked Heaven, paid my physician and my host and hostess, who had been very kind to me, and started once more on my journey.

As I drew near the place of my destination, my heart faded me more and more. It was a small, pleasant, western town. I knew my brother had boarded at the only public house in the place, so I directed my steps thereto. My summons at the door was answered by a strong, buxom-looking woman.

"Does Mr. George Bertran live here?"

"O, bless you, stranger," said she, "he has been dead more than a week."

I had expected it, yet my brain began to swim, and I leaned against the door for support. The woman saw my agitation, and with a great deal of kindness in her manner, she said:

"Perhaps you are a relation of his—a brother, may be—you look very like him. Will you walk in, sir? You look very unwell."

"I have been sick," I replied, "or I should have been here before. I am his brother."

"He spoke of you; he wished very much to see you."

"I thought him improving till I received his last letter, then I started to come to him, was taken sick, which detained me. Did he fail very fast?"

"He did; he seemed to grow worse all at once."

"But where," and my heart almost choked me, "where is his wife?"

"O, she went away with a friend who came the day her husband died."

"A friend? What was his name?"

"Jenkins, sir, Thomas Jenkins. The lady wished to wait till you came, for she told me that she expected you, but the gentleman told her that you wouldn't come, and that he would see her safe with her friends."

"Was Mrs. Bertran well? Was she able to take the journey?"

"She grieved very much for her husband, the night after his death. I heard her sobbing and crying in her chamber. I don't think she closed her eyes all night. She looked very pale and worn when she went away. The day she left she visited her husband's tomb—he lies in the churchyard which you can see from here—and when she came back I thought she would not be long away from him."

I went out to the little churchyard, but no tears came to my eyes as I stood by the spot where they had laid him. My brain was all on fire. What had so dried up the fountain of grief? He was dead; I had expected it, but this new blow was all no-looked for. She was gone; she was in the power of a villain who had hung around their track like a beast of prey. Deep, bitter, burning hate took possession of me, so that I had no tears for my best beloved brother lying dead at my feet. O, how I longed to meet the villain, wrest her from him and tell him I hated him. Better she lay still and cold by her husband's side than in his power. She did not know him as I did; true she disliked him, but she had no idea of his baseness, his perfidy. If he said he would carry her to her friends she would trust him, but O, I knew him better.

Thomas Jenkins had once paid his suit to Mary and been refused, for she loved my brother. Deadly hate was in his mean and sordid soul, yet he hid it all beneath a pleasant exterior. He professed friendship, and my brother believed him; and Mary, if she did not look upon him as a friend, was far from considering him an enemy. But I knew him well. I knew the meaning of his look when it rested on my brother and his wife, and I would not have considered my brother's life safe in his keeping for a single moment, for I knew he would pause at no action, however base or fiendish, to accomplish his purpose. What wonder, then, that I trembled with rage and fear, yes, fear, when I thought of our weak, gentle Mary in the villain's power.

But what could I do? How could I get track of them? I did not know, but I set myself to the work, and felt no weakness, the strength of my purpose gave almost supernatural strength to my body. I went back to the house, my first inquiry was:

"How long had they been gone?"

"But two days, for the lady had persisted in waiting for me."

Hope rose in my heart.

"To what place were they going?"

The woman did not know for a certainty, but supposed they had taken the train which went east, of course.

As I turned to go, the woman called to me, inquiring if I would not return to dinner.

"It was doubtful; I thought not."

"Will you not have something to eat now?"

I shook my head. I turned round after I had got some distance from the house, and she still stood there, shading her eyes from the sun and looking at me.

Arrived at the station-house, I asked the ticket-master if a gentleman, answering to the description I gave him of my brother's wife and her companion, had taken the cars two days previous for the east.

"No; he remembered no such persons."

A man standing near interrupted him.

"Why yes, I saw a gentleman buying tickets here, day before yesterday, and he had a lady with him, who might be the one the gentleman describes."

"He did not buy an eastern ticket; he was going further on."

"But it might be the same one for all that;" and my own heart echoed the man's reply. I inquired more particularly, and was confirmed in my suspicion that Jenkins had deceived poor Mary, and was taking her far from home and friends.

"How long before the train arrives that will take me out," I inquired.

"The noon train will be here in half an hour."

"Give me a ticket like the one the gentleman purchased," said I.

He handed me a ticket; I took it and turned and paced the platform for a while with impatient steps. The station-house was close to the river, and I paused in my walk and looked down into the dark, rushing stream. I had stood there but a few minutes when I became conscious of some one beside me. I looked up. It was the man who had been talking to the ticket-master. I had not noticed him much before, now as I looked up at him I saw he was a cautious, shrewd, intelligent looking man, with keen, bright eyes, which a lawyer's knowledge of physiognomy told me betokened a quick insight into human character. As I looked up, those keen eyes met mine.

"Were those people your friends?" said he.

"The lady was my friend, sir," said I, somewhat coldly, for I knew not how to take his interference in my affairs, and yet the man's countenance and manner were in his favor.

I turned to pursue my walk. He laid his hand on my shoulder with a western familiarity and a western kindness in his manner.

"Don't think me impertinent, sir, but I am of the opinion that that man was deceiving the lady, who thought they were to go east, and instead of that he has carried her further on. Was she travelling with him against her will?"

"No," I replied, "I believe not."

"Well, there was something very curious about them. The lady cried a good deal and seemed very sad; the gentleman seemed to try to cheer her, but she avoided him."

I grew interested and I suppose the man saw it, for he went on: "I watched them narrowly, and came to the conclusion that something was wrong. Are you in search of them?"

Just then I heard the rumbling of the cars. I caught up my valise, and seized with a sudden thankfulness to the man who aided me even a little in my search, I extended my hand, and thanking him, told him that the lady was my brother's widow, her husband had died here in the neighborhood, she belonged east; this gentleman had promised to see her safely to her friends; I had reason to doubt his sincerity. In fine, I thought him a villain, and should follow his track till I overtook him. The man pressed my hand in his honest clasp.

"I am seldom mistaken—I took the man for a villain. I hope you will overtake him and punish him as he deserves."

The train had now stopped. Bidding my new friend good-by, I jumped in and was soon whirled away. It was the express train I had taken, and we rushed along with lightning speed. I liked it, for it suited well my mood. On we went, rushing through the forest, screaming past the villages, pausing for nothing. The fresh breeze blew in at the car window and cooled my heated brain. On we went, through a land rich and beautiful, a land I had dreamed of and longed to see, but now I gave no thought to its beauty, had no eye for its surpassing loveliness. But one thought occupied body and soul—to find her and be revenged on him. So on through the forest, over the vast prairie, mile after mile, till as the sun was sinking in the west we stopped at a place within ten miles of my place of destination. Here the cars stopped to allow the passengers to procure some refreshment. I passed into the refreshment room with the others, took a cup of strong coffee, a sandwich and a piece of cake, and hurried back to my seat; for I had grown nervous and feared the cars would be off without me. In a quarter of an hour we were on our way again.

It was nearly dark when we went screaming into the depot where I must make further inquiry. I went up to the ticket-master and describing the persons of whom I was in quest, asked if he had seen them. He thought a moment:

"Yes, he had seen a gentleman and lady answering my description; he had noticed them because the lady was so melancholy."

"Did he know where they had gone,—what train they had taken?"

"No; they had bought no tickets of him; he rather thought they had not gone on, indeed, the lady looked unable to journey further; he thought likely I should find them at the hotel where the passengers usually stopped who were travelling west."

The train passed on, and I, following the directions of the ticket-master, sought the hotel. Here I asked if I could be accommodated with a room for the night. The polite landlady answered in the affirmative, and himself led the way to my apartment. To him I propounded my usual question.

"Yes, he had seen them; they had stopped at his house the preceding night and that day, indeed they had taken the very last train out, the one in which I came."

"But are you not mistaken? The ticket-master says he sold no tickets to persons answering my description."

"He did not; I bought their tickets, as the gentleman was unable to leave the lady."

"And why?" I inquired.

"He thought it not safe, you know, on account of her unhappy condition."

"Unhappy indeed," said I, thinking it not best to betray my ignorance of his meaning, but under pretence of knowing all, draw the truth from him. "Is she then indeed in such a state the gentleman could not leave her even to buy his tickets?"

"O yes, she is very bad at times, sometimes quite violent, and sometimes she will beg and plead so to be carried home, it is enough to break your heart to hear her. She begged me so hard to let her stay with me, I tried to soothe her, and told her the gentleman would take good care of her, and upon that she screamed and cried and wrung her hands, till I was glad to get away from her it made me feel so bad."

"How long before they will arrive at the place where he is to carry her?"

"Let me see; they took the cars to-night; well, I suppose they will reach there to-morrow forenoon if nothing happens."

"Did the lady know where he was carrying her?"

"I think not—she expected to go home. I suppose he had told her so to keep her quiet; but I think she began to think he was deceiving her, though I don't know as she thought he was carrying her to the Asylum."

"Is it a good establishment," I asked, "where he is going to leave her?"

"I don't know; the gentleman said it was. I suppose you know where it is—in the town of I."

"O yes, I know the place well, or rather I have heard of it." The man turned to go.

"What time does the first train start in the morning?" I inquired.

"There is one goes as early as four o'clock. Shall I call you?"

"Yes, he sure and do so; I wish to take it."

Left alone—how can I describe the emotions of my soul? O, had I but gone on in the cars, could I but have seen him and accused him of his baseness and rescued Mary from his power! How had I been so unfortunate as to miss them? Alas, poor Mary! who knew but she was indeed crazed—driven by sorrow, death, despair and villany into very madness? How could I sleep? how could I even stay in the house till morning?

But the night passed—four o'clock came. I took the cars and was again hurrying on at a speed which well suited my impatience. The gray light of the early morning gave place to glorious sunrise, and bright and beautiful as the garden of Eden looked the country through which the iron horse bore me on. We stopped at a town of some note where we took in a number of passengers; and where I learned from some conversation I overheard, that the train of the night before had met with some slight accident, which had detained the passengers some hours.

Just as we were starting, I saw my friend, whose acquaintance

I had made at the railroad station, enter the car where I was seated. He came, and sitting down beside me, laid his hand on my shoulder, and whispered:

"Have you found them?"

"No," said I.

"They are in the train ahead of us, I saw them—he pretends the lady is insane, and never leaves her for a moment."

"The villain!" said I, between my closed teeth.

My friend went on.

"He gets out at the next station where he has a carriage waiting—I have one there also—he has to cross a wide prairie—we will follow him. God only knows where he intends to carry her."

I looked into my friend's face, and would have thanked him, but I had no words. For a moment I was faint and weak as a child, the next the blood rushed again to my heart and I felt the strength of a giant.

The next station was in a lonely, out of the way place, and no one got out excepting my friend and myself. We found a horse harnessed into a light wagon in waiting for us.

"Jump in," said my friend, and I obeyed.

He sprang up beside me, tightened the rein, and the horse was away like a bird.

"He has but two hours the start of us," said my friend, "and he must have a swifter horse than I think he has, if we do not have him in sight before an hour."

Our road at first lay through thick woods, where we could see but a short distance ahead. Our horse seemed to fly over the ground, and now we were out on the prairie stretching away mile upon mile as far as the eye could reach. My friend raised his whip and pointed to some object in the distance. I looked and saw a small, black speck—I wondered he had noticed it.

"I told you we would have him in sight in an hour, and there he is."

We gained on him so fast that in a quarter of an hour we could see them very distinctly. Jenkins was driving at a moderate pace, but when we were within a mile or so he turned around and saw us. Surely, steadily we gained on him, though he urged his beast to the utmost. It must have been his guilty conscience that caused him to flee, else why should he fear two travellers riding peacefully in his track?

The air had been very close and sultry all the afternoon, and now we heard the rumbling of thunder, and I noticed a heavy black cloud lying around the north.

"A storm is at hand," said I.

"Yes," said my friend, "and a prairie is not the best place in a storm. We must overtake them before it comes on," and he touched his horse with the whip.

Blacker and blacker grew the wrathful clouds, and the red lightning flashed across the heavens, and the thunder rolled and rattled above us, yet between the peals of thunder we could hear Jenkins urging on his steed, and the crack of his whip as it fell upon the poor beast. We gained upon him every moment, we were close beside him; I saw his face white with passion, for he had recognized me. I saw Mary beside him, pale, motionless as a statue. I think she had fainted. Just at that moment there came a flash of lightning which fairly blinded us, a peal of thunder as if the earth were opening at our feet, and Jenkins's poor beast, already goaded and whipped to the verge of desperation, plunged and reared, disengaged himself from the vehicle, and dragging his driver at his heels, entangled in the reins, went scared and frightened with desperate leaps over the prairie.

In an instant my friend reined in his steed, and we were both out on our feet. Pale and insensible upon the ground lay Mary, the object of our search. We lifted her, but she gave no signs of life, though we could see no hurt nor bruises upon her. Meanwhile the rain began to fall; my friend drew forth a blanket from the wagon, and protecting Mary from the rain by means of the shattered remains of the ill-fated vehicle, we tried again if we could discover any signs of life, but all seemed vain. All this while the thunder rolled, the lightning flashed and the rain poured down. We felt not the storm for ourselves, and Mary, surely she felt it not lying there cold and still. We protected her all we could from the storm; we still continued to chafe her hands and to try to bring back the vital spark.

By-and-by, when the thunder grew less fearful and the storm had somewhat abated, my friend rode away and was gone for half an hour; he said nothing but I knew well where he had gone.

For half an hour I sat at Mary's side looking upon her as one looks upon the face of the dead; surely she would never speak to me again, never again would those blue eyes meet mine. Ah, how thin she was, how worn, how haggard, how unlike the fresh, happy being who had left me as my brother's bride! Ah, why had all this been?

The rain had now ceased to fall, the thunder only rumbled at a distance, and soon the sun streamed out just at his setting, in one long, golden belt of light across the wide prairie, full upon Mary's pale face. It lit it up with a glow like life, and for a moment I fancied she only slept. I bent over her—was that a sigh, a breath? I put my hand upon her wrist; I held it tight and firm, and my own heart almost ceased its beatings the while, the pulse of life beneath my pressure flickered faintly and unsteadily, but it was there.

"God, I thank thee!" I exclaimed, and out on the broad prairie I poured out my thanks to Heaven.

I looked up, for I heard the sound of wheels. My friend was close beside me; his face was very stern and sad, and his strong hand shook as I took it in mine and pressed it on Mary's small wrist. He started, and a look of thankfulness displaced his sombre aspect, for he felt the beating of that feeble pulse.

"She lives," said he. "We will place this blanket in the bottom of our wagon; she can lie upon that, for we must be retracing our steps."

Even as he spoke he put the blanket in the vehicle and lifting Mary as if she had been a child, silently beckoned me to sit beside her and laid her head in my lap. We travelled some distance in silence, and I felt the pulse of life beneath my hand beat stronger. I wished to know the truth concerning Jenkins ere Mary should return fully to consciousness, but I almost feared to ask, for I knew it was something terrible. Just at this moment my friend stopped, and coming around looked down upon the pale face and laid his hand upon her heart.

"It was a narrow chance," said he.

"God has been very good," said I.

"Yes," said he, "and his justice is very terrible;" and the stern, sad look came back to his face.

"Is he dead?" said I, in a low voice.

"He is dead—mangled and torn so that even his mother would not have known him. May the Lord keep me from ever again looking upon a sight like that!" And he covered his face with his hands. And this was all we said concerning him.

Very slowly Mary returned to consciousness. When she opened her eyes they rested on my face. I expect that in her bewildered state, aided also by my pale and sickly appearance, she mistook me for her husband, for she threw her pale, thin arms around my neck and cried, "O, what a fearful dream I have had!" But all too quickly the truth came to her; the arms fell from my neck and the white hands covered the pale face, and I saw the tears falling between the pale, thin fingers. But after this burst of grief, she looked up at me with that sweet, thin, wasted face lighted up with thankfulness.

When we reached the town, which was not till a late hour Mary was lifted from the wagon and placed in a dry and comfortable bed, and entrusted to the care of the landlady, who seemed to be a very kind-hearted, sensible person.

Mary was much better in the morning than I had expected to see her. Her face was pale and haggard, it is true, but it wore sweet, angelic expression, and was full of thankfulness for her delivery. She asked few questions concerning the affair. We told her about the horse being alarmed and her being thrown from the carriage, nothing of which she recollected, but it was not till long after that she heard the particulars of Jenkins's terrible fate.

In a few days we started on our homeward journey. My friend went with us as far as his home, where we left him with much regret. I brought Mary in safety to her friends, and returned again to my office and my business, which had suffered somewhat during my absence. My landlady had just given me up for lost, and was about letting my rooms to another occupant, so that I arrived just in time to save myself the trouble of looking up a new residence.

Mary's health long suffered from the effects of that season of bitter trial, and her face now bears a look purer and holier than ever rested there before my brother's death, sweet and lovely as I had ever thought it.

One day, some years after the incidents I have related, I told my landlady that I should be obliged to give up my rooms, and if she could find a chance in the course of a fortnight, to let the apartments, she had better do so. She opened her eyes very wide.

"Why, sir, do not my accommodations suit you?"

"I cannot say they do exactly, my dear madam."

"In what respect, pray, sir, allow me to inquire?" and she bridled up and looked very dignified.

"In the first place, they are very lonesome."

"And have you lived here all this time and just found it out?"

"In the next place, they are not commodious enough."

"Indeed, sir, they are as large as one ought to expect for the price."

"In the next place, I have secured rooms which suit me better."

"Indeed, sir, I think it is very unkind in you, after boarding with me all these years and never finding a word of fault before, for we have always got along pleasantly together—"

"Very pleasantly, madam," I broke in.

"And now to go and secure rooms and not say a word about it, when I would have been willing to have done most anything for your accommodation, is, to say the least, very unkind," and the good woman, for she was a good woman though she had some little peculiarities, put the corner of her apron to her eye.

"But there is one other reason I have not mentioned," said I, very gently, "that will render it wholly impossible, as you will see, that I should keep your rooms. I am going to be married."

The good lady dropped her apron, lifted up her hands and her eyes, burst into a merry, ringing laugh, and exclaimed:

"Bless you, sir, why didn't you tell me this in the first place. I wish you much happiness. I am sure, and all I have to say is, that I hope the lady will be as well satisfied with you as a husband as I have been as a boarder."

Mary, sitting by my side, looks up archly and wishes to know if bachelors never marry to save the expense and trouble of procuring a boarding-place.

SINGULAR MONUMENT.

Elkanah Watson, in his memoirs, states that the magistracy of Devizes, a large market town in England, erected a monument to commemorate a striking interposition of Divine judgment. A fact perpetuated by the inscription is this: A woman having purchased some commodities in the market, upon payment being demanded, an altercation ensued, and she uttered the imprecation—"May God strike me dead if I have not paid it!" She fell down and immediately expired, and in the clenched hand, which she had impiously raised to heaven to attest her perjury, was found the money in controversy. "Facts like this," says Mr. Watson, "bear fearful and powerful admonition of the interposition of an omniscient God in the affairs of man."—Boston Transcript.

LOUISVILLE, KY.

We present on this and the next page a series of accurate views of localities in the city of Louisville, Ky., drawn expressly for our paper by Mr. Kilburn, during his recent artistic tour in the West. Louisville is situated on the Falls of the Ohio River, at the mouth of Beargrass Creek, about 130 miles below Cincinnati. In a commercial point of view, it is the most important place in the State. It is the seat of justice of Jefferson county, and stands upon an extensive sloping plain about a quarter of a mile above the principal declivity of the falls, and seventy feet above high water mark. The falls may be seen from the city. In high stages of water they almost entirely disappear; but when the water is low, the whole width of the river, which is here nearly a mile wide, is covered with foam. The river is divided by a fine island, which gives a picturesque appearance to the scene. To obviate the obstruction to navigation caused by the falls, a canal two and a half miles long has been constructed around them. The Marine Hospital, presented on the next page, is situated on the outskirts of the city, and is a fine, commodious building. It was built, we believe, in 1823.

Our view in Sixth Street presents the general appearance of the Louisville streets, all of them being shaded with fine trees. The church on the right is the First Presbyterian; that on the left is the Saint Paul's, Episcopal. Market Street contains several markets, one of which, the "Speed Market," is given above. The sketch was taken from near the "Kentucky Market," which is immediately in the rear of the spectator, and not seen in the picture. The University of Louisville, given below, is situated on Chesnut Street, corner of Eighth Street. The buildings have a fine location, and are an ornament to the city. The left hand building in our view is the Medical, and the other the Law Building. Beargrass Creek is a picturesque locality, and is crossed by several bridges, one of which we present below. The buildings seen at the right of the picture are connected with the gas works. Another engraving represents the St. Joseph's Infirmary, a Catholic benevolent institution, situated on Fourth Street. Louisville was formerly considered unhealthy, owing to the stagnant waters in the vicinity, and subject to epidemic diseases; but these having been drained, it is now one of the most healthy places on the river. The railroads in course of projection will link Louisville yet closer with other important towns and cities. The situation and scenery of the place are truly beautiful, and some portions of the city command enchanting views. The streets are broad, well laid out, paved, shaded by ornamental trees, and lighted by gas. Eight of them run parallel to the river. Our artist has sketched those of the public buildings which appeared to him best suited to the purposes of illustration. The Medical Institute, shown in one of his drawings, ranks very high, and was founded by an ordinance of the city council, which appropriated $50,000 for the library, buildings, etc. The Mercantile Library Association, with its well-selected collection of books, and the Historical Society, deserve honorable mention. Louisville, it is stated, may be said to owe its existence to the Falls, which arrest the course of navigation at this point. The canal, to which we referred above, projected to avoid the Falls, was cut through the solid limestone rock at a cost of $75,000. The dimensions having been found too small to admit the passage of the largest New Orleans steamers, a railway has been projected on the Indiana side, the object of which is to transport such vessels round the rapids by means of a stationary engine and pulleys. In 1850, the entire trade of Louisville was computed to amount to $50,000,000. The wholesale business has increased rapidly since that period. There are now over one hundred houses engaged exclusively in the wholesale business, the amount of which is estimated in round numbers at twenty millions of dollars. The chief articles of export are tobacco, pork, hemp and flour. In 1852, the quantity of tobacco received was 16,176 hogsheds. The amount of revenue collected here, in 1853, was $48,307. The shipping in the port amounted in the aggregate to 11,891 tons, all of which was employed in steam navigation. During the year referred to, twenty-seven steamboats, with an ponch and powder-horn. From behind the left hip dangled a scalping-knife; from the right protruded the handle of a butcher; both weapons stuck in leathern cases. Every hunter carried an awl, a roll of buckskin, and strings of hide called "whangs," for thread. In the winter loose deerskin was stuffed into the moccasins to keep the feet warm. The pioneers lived in rude log houses, aggregate burthen of 7313 tons, were measured. The new custom house will cost about $200,000. Although Louisville is devoted rather to commerce than manufactures, still the latter amount in value to about $6,000,000 annually. For a place which has been in existence but about three quarters of a century, its growth has been very rapid.

covered generally with pieces of timber about three feet in length and six in width, called "shakes," and laid over the roof instead of shingles. They had neither nails, glass, saws nor brick. The houses had large slab doors, planed together. The light came down the chimney, or through a hole in the logs, covered with greased cloth. A scraggy hemlock sapling, the knots left a foot long, served for stairs to the upper story. Their furniture consisted of tamarack bedsteads framed into the walls, a few shelves supported on long wooden pins; a chair or two, but more often a piece split off a tree, and so trimmed that the branches served for legs. Their utensils were very simple generally nothing but a skillet, which served for baking, boiling, roasting, washing dishes, making mush, scalding turkeys, cooking sassafras tea, and making soap. A Johnny cake board, instead of a dripping-pan, hung on a peg in every house. The corn was cracked into a coarse meal by pounding it in a wooden mortar. As soon as swine could be kept away from the bears, or rather the bears away from them, the pioneers indulged in a dish of pork and corn, boiled together, and known among them as "hog and hominy." Fried pork they called "Old Ned." Unlike the French, who clustered in villages, and had their common fields, our Yankee settlers went their whole length for individual property. Each settler claimed for himself four hundred acres of land, and the privilege of taking a thousand acres more, contiguous to his clearing. Each one ran out his own lines for himself, chipping the bark off the trees, and cutting his name in the wood. These claims, so loosely asserted, were called "tomahawk rights," and were respected by all the emigrants. Each settler went to felling the timber and chopping house-logs, sleeping, meanwhile, under a bark cover raised on crochets, or under a tree. It is said of one of them that he could hardly stomach his house, after it was done. The door way was open, the logs unchinked, and the chimney gaped wide above him; but the air was too "cluss"—he had to sleep outside for a night or two to get used to it.

EARLY PIONEERS.

Mr. Ferris, in his book on the Great West, thus sketches the character of the pioneers who began to spread themselves throughout the West, between the close of the Pontiac war and the commencement of the American Revolution:—"The pioneers, living in constant contact with the Indians, necessarily became more than half savages in appearance, habits and manners; and frequently the whole savage character was assumed. Their ordinary dress was too unique to be forgotten. A coon-skin cap, with the tail dangling at the back of the neck, and the snout drooping upon the forehead; long buckskin leggings, sewed with a wide fringed welt, down the outside of the leg; a long, narrow strip of coarse cloth passing around the hips and between the thighs, was brought up before and behind under the belt, and hung down flapping as they walked; a loose, deer-skin frock, open in front, and lapping once and a half round the body, was belted at the middle, forming convenient wallets on each side for chunks of hoe-cake, tow, jerked venison, screw drivers and other fixings, and Indian moccasins completed the hunter's apparel. Over the whole were slung a bullet-

AN ADVENTURE IN CALIFORNIA.

The truth of the following thrilling tale of adventure is vouched for to us by a person who heard it from the lips of one of the party: A party of three men started from Sacramento on a prospecting tour, and, being well supplied with provisions, they penetrated much farther into the mountains than any other party, without meeting with any success. Being men of great perseverance, however, they determined to pursue their course still further, although they had nearly reached a point where it was believed the foot of white man never trod before. The party began to feel somewhat discouraged, as luck appeared to have abandoned them. They were many miles from any habitation, and their provisions were getting very low. A melancholy feeling pervaded the whole three, but they kept on until they came to a deep gulch. After making a thorough examination, they returned to Sacramento for ropes and provisions. Having procured these, and loaded their mules with as much as was thought necessary for their purpose, they proceeded again to the gulch. To get down this ravine was the next object. They tied a rope to a tree, and by this means one after the other descended to the bottom, after lowering down the provisions and tools. Here they found gold in abundance, and labored assiduously to secure their pile as soon as possible, not being particularly in love with their habitation. By a mere accident, after having been in the ravine for several weeks, they discovered that the rope had been cut by the Indians, or let loose by some other means, which cut off all hopes of escape. The ledges of rock were perpendicular for hundreds of feet, and climbing up was out of the question. Their provisions rapidly diminished, and starvation stared them in the face. The gold which they had secured was of no use. They had made up their minds that their end was near. Providentially, a party of friendly Indians came by, and hearing the men hallooing, they discovered their whereabouts, and immediately went to work to release them. Ropes were obtained, and let down, when they were drawn up one by one, and their gold also. Being released from their prison, they liberally rewarded the Indians, and went on their way to a more suitable location, thankful for their preservation from the awful fate with which they had been threatened.—*N. #### THE CAGED LION.

The Westminster Review, in a recent article on Gerard's (the celebrated lion hunter of Algiers) account of his adventures, relates the following anecdote of a pet lion, Hubert, which Gerard caught when a cub, and raised till he was big enough to be dangerous, when he was sent to the Jardin des Plantes at Paris. Hubert was sent to Paris and placed in the Jardin des Plantes, where, sometime afterward, Gerard went to see him. He was lying half asleep, gazing with indifference on all the visitors, when suddenly he raised his head, his eyes dilated, a nervous twitching of his face and agitation of his tail showed that the sight of the well-known uniform had roused him. He had recognized the uniform, but had not yet identified his old master. His eyes vaguely interrogated this vaguely remembered form. Gerard thrust his hand into the cage. It was a touching moment which followed; without taking his eyes from Gerard, he applied his nose to the outstretched hand, and began to breathe deeply. With every breath his eyes became more affectionate, and when Gerard said to him "Well, Hubert, my old soldier," he made a terrible bound against the bars of his prison, which trembled beneath his weight. My friends, alarmed, sprang back and called on me to do the same. Noble beast! thou art terrible even in thy love! He stood pressed against the bars, striving to break through the obstacles which separated us. He was magnificent as he stood there roaring with joy and rage. His rough tongue licked with joy the hand which I abandoned to him, while with his enormous paws he tried to draw me gently to him. No sooner did any one approach the cage than he flew out in terrible expressions of anger, which changed into calmness and caresses on their retreating. It is impossible for me to describe how painful our parting was that day. Twenty times I was forced to return to reassure him that he would see me again, and each time that I moved out of sight, he made the place trouble with his bounds and cries. Poor Hubert, this visit, and the long lels a-lots of subsequent visits, made captivity a little less painful to him, but the effect seemed to be injurious on the whole. He drooped, and the keeper attributed it to the visits, which, perhaps, made him languish for the camp and his days of liberty. He died, leaving Gerard firmly resolved to kill as many lions as he could, but to capture no more; death in the forest, by a rifle, being infinitely preferable to a pulmonary disease bred in a prison.

AN AMAZON.

Phoebe Brown is five feet six inches in height; is about thirty, well proportioned, round faced and ruddy; has a dark, penetrating eye, which the moment it fixes upon your face, sees your character, and that with precision. Her step is more manly than man's, and can cover forty miles a day. Her common dress is a man's hat, coat, with a spencer over it, and men's shoes. She is unmarried. She can lift one hundred weight in each hand, and carry fourteen stone; can sew, knit and spin, but hates them all, and every accompaniment of the female character, that of modesty excepted. A gentleman at Bath had recently treated her rudely. "She had a good mind to knock him down." She assured me "she never knew what fear was." She gives no affront, but offers to fight any man who gives her one. If she has never fought, perhaps it is owing to the insult being a coward: for the man of courage would disdain to offer an insult to a woman. Phoebe has strong sense, an excellent judgment, says smart things and supports an easy freedom in all companies. Her voice is more than masculine—it is deep toned. With the wind in her favor, she can send it a mile; she has neither beard nor prominence of breast; she undertakes any kind of manual labor, as holding a plow, driving a team, thatching a barn, using a flail, etc., but her chief vocation is breaking horses, for which she charges a guinea a week each. She always rides without a saddle, is thought to be the best judge of a horse or a cow in the county, and is frequently employed to purchase for others at the neighboring fairs. She is fond of Milton, Pope and Shakspeare; also of music; is self-taught, and performs on several instruments, as the flute, violin, and harpsichord, and supports the bass violin in Moloch Church. She is a marksman, and carries a gun on her shoulder. She eats no beef or pork and but little mutton. Her chief food is milk, which is also her drink, discarding wine, ale and spirits as unwholesome.—English paper.

TRADING THE HAIR.

In most countries, the hair is regarded as one of the finest ornaments of the female head. Among the inhabitants of Brittany, however, in western France, a contrary idea prevails, and while the men wear their hair hanging over their shoulders in long tresses, it is considered a mark of immodesty for a woman to reveal a single lock or ringlet. A close fitting cap, which effectually hides the hair, is the height of propriety. But there are other prudential reasons for this, besides that of modesty. The female peasantry turn their hair to account in other markets than that of love, and make a good profit out of it. Shocking as it may appear, "many London and Paris ladies are indebted for the magnificent hair which adorns their heads, to the wilds of Brittany." A recent English traveller detected the travelling hair merchant in the very act of spoliation. He says: "Strolling through the scene, my attention was attracted by a crowd around a half-ruined house. Wedging my way to the entrance, I saw a man standing in the middle of a room, armed with a formidable pair of scissors, with which he was clipping the hair from a girl's head with a rapidity and dexterity bespeaking long practice. For not only was the operation performed with almost bewildering quickness, but when the girl was liberated, her head assumed the appearance of having been shaved. There was great laughing among the peasants, as she emerged from the house, leaving the long tresses in the hands of the hair-merchant, who, after combing them carefully, wound them up in a wreath and placed them in a basket, already nearly half full of hair. For, as I heard, he had been driving a highly profitable trade all the day; and girls were still coming in willing, and in some cases apparently eager, to exchange their fine chevelures—which would have been the glory of girls anywhere but in Brittany—for three poor little handkerchiefs of gaily hues, scarcely worth a dozen souls. This terrible mutilation of one of woman's most beautiful gifts, distressed me considerably at first; but when I beheld the indifference of the girls to the loss of their hair, and remembered how studiously they conceal their tresses, my feelings underwent a change, and I looked at length upon the wholesale cropping as rather amusing than otherwise. Great was the apparent disappointment of girls, whose tresses, although seemingly abundant and fine, did not come up to the hair-merchant's standard; but the fellow had so abundant a market, that he was only disposed to buy when the goods were particularly choice. His profits, too, must have been great, as the average price of a good head of hair, when cleaned, is eleven shillings."—Portfolio.

KNIGHTS TEMPLARS.

The origin of the soldiers of the Temple may be clearly traced to the wild enthusiasm of the Crusaders. On the capture of Jerusalem by the Christians, thousands, not of well-appointed warriors, but of old men, women, and even children, set forth toward the Holy City, from the most distant parts of Europe, unconscious alike of the distance and the dangers they should have to encounter. To alleviate the distresses to which these pious enthusiasts were exposed, to guard the honor of the saintly virgins and matrons, and to protect the gray hairs of the venerable palmer, nine noble knights formed a holy brotherhood in arms, and entered into a solemn compact to aid one another in clearing the highways of infidels and robbers, and in protecting the pilgrims through the passes and defiles of the mountains, to the Holy City. Warned with the religious and military fervor of the day, and animated by the sacredness of the cause to which they had devoted their swords, they called themselves the poor fellow-soldiers of Jesus Christ. This chivalric vow they subsequently ratified in the Church of the Resurrection at the city of Jerusalem, and they there pronounced the additional and monkish vow of chastity, obedience, and poverty. In the year 1118, Baldwin, the second king of Jerusalem, granted them their first possession, a dwelling within the sacred enclosure of the temple on Mount Moriah, which the ignorant and superstitious ecclesiastics had designated as the Temple of Solomon; and hence the "poor fellow-soldiers" received their name of "the Knighthood of the Temple of Solomon."—New Orleans Commercial.

ON A PORTRAIT OF WASHINGTON.

BY R. WARD.

Majestic dignity—exalted thought—
A calm serenity, as if repose
From some dark storm of thunder, rested down
Upon a placid sky, and left no trace
Of the fierce lightning's revel, mark the lines
Of those mild features. Who e'er forgot
That noble countenance and brow serene
Of our loved country's Father—Washington?
Hast thou e'er harbored in thy reckless heart
One treacherous thought—one traitorous desire?
Hast thou e'er heard the maddening cry of rage,
Discordia, discord, civil strife and broil?
Gaze on that portrait: canst thou steel thy soul
To bear the silent awe—the stern rebuke
That seem to flash indignant from those eyes,
Now fixed upon thee? Canst thou even bear
That penetrating glance that seems to read
Thine every thought and purpose? O forbear
To look upon that picture, if thy heart
Be not the seat of high and holy love
For all that nakes also noble,—country—friends—
Truth, justice, freedom, and the deathless weal
Of nations struggling yet to rise in might
Above the gloomy mists and iron cells
Of centuries of bondage—patriot zeal,
Forever burning like the glowing sun
Of summer's noon-day—these, all these, and more,
Should be thy guard, while thou turn'st thy gaze
Upon the portrait of the best of earth,
The great, the good, the immortal Washington.

THE PIRATE'S WIFE.

BY HELEN WILDES.

Is a palace, which for centuries had been the principal ornament of Seville, sat the Lady Inez. She was a perfect daughter of Spain. Her soft, olive complexion, and glossy black hair—those magnificent eyes and small feet, could only be found in that delicious clime.

The castle was anciently called Froila, in commemoration of a victorious battle fought by Froila against the Moors, in which 54,000 of the latter were killed. We will still call it Froila, although the name was a temporary one, given by a grandee, who had lived there in the year 1300.

At the time of our story, 18—, it looked ancient certainly, and that was all. It must have been glorious to have lived there in that old stony palace, that had outlived so many generations of men; that at one time had been the residence of a Moorish king, and subsequently the home of the haughty grandee, and still later of a lower order of nobility. To have sat there and thought of all the loves, and births, and deaths, to which these old walls had been witness, and of which the memory even had passed from every living being, must have roused all the Spanish ardor and romance of the Lady Inez.

Froila was surrounded on all sides, except the southwest and south, with a noble forest of chestnuts, and tamarisks, and birches, and pines, and the evergreen oak bearing edible fruit, and the cochineal oak, on which is found the false cochineal yielding a fine crimson color—trees indigenous to the country. On the south there was a circuitous road or broad path, made upon the principle of McAdam; and on the southwest was the beautiful Guadalquivir. The castle was elevated, and the terraces which led to the river were covered with the trees of the south—lemon, orange, pomegranate, almond and olive. At the very bottom of the garden was a small private quay, which was ingeniously concealed by foliage. The interior of the castle gave signs of age, and many of the apartments of desertion. But the principal room was of the amplest dimensions and luxuriantly furnished. The walls were covered with crimson drapery, which was here and there, at short intervals, drawn aside to bring to view immense mirrors, which multiplied the room a hundred times. It seemed as if the wealth and talent of the world had been laid under contribution to furnish the luxuries of this one room. There were the substantial comforts of America, the ingenious ornaments of China, painting and sculpture of Italy, the graceful frivolities of France, and literary productions of every language. In every nook and corner of this spacious hall was some object of beauty. But it seemed more a collection of things rare and rich, than the embellishments of a family drawing-room. Even the carpets that covered the floor, though gorgeous and beautiful, were of different material and pattern. In one recess, almost concealed by dark velvet drapery, stood an altar, upon which was a crucifix and a statuette of the Virgin Mary; her neck and hands bore jewels of value. There were several secret minute drawers about the altar, which were filled with gold, and silver, and jewels, either pious oblations to the virgin, or placed there for safe keeping, in expectation that even the lawless robber would respect the symbol of religion. The altar was covered by beautiful mosaic work; the spring by which each door was opened seemed the centre of a flower.

But amid all this, Inez sat sad and alone. She was very lovely, but anxiety had paled her cheek and subdued her spirits. Whence came this motley collection of valuables? Her husband, when he returned from his voyages laden with wares of every description, told her that they were the results of his traffic. But Inez had long had misgivings. She had observed an uncertainty about her husband's movements, which was totally inexplicable. He would often start on long voyages for distant ports and return in a few weeks; and after remaining with her some months perhaps, on the receipt of some news, he would start off before it were possible to obtain any cargo, apparently without the slightest premeditation, and come back in a longer or shorter time laden with wares of every description. Why were not these things sold? Indeed, why were they ever bought? Why were piles of velvet, and silks, and cottons brought there and left in the deserted chambers? Why did he enjoin upon her to live so retired? For two years she had not quitted the precincts of her garden; she had no communication with any one but her husband's old man servant and his wife. Why did he always return in the night, and come in a small boat to the quay in the garden? Why did he come stealing round to the window of her couch and make a signal, and wait for her answering password before making himself known? Why was he constantly changing the name of his vessel? She knew it was all for the sake of secrecy—but why was secrecy necessary?

One day, when she put these questions to him, he replied:

"Wait a little, dearest, and I will take you and all we possess to some foreign country, where we will live for each other. Could you be content with only me, love?"

"I could go with you to the ends of the earth," said Inez, her eyes sparkling with enthusiasm. "To live with you alone, would be to have my heart's content absolutely. Even in this stern old palace, with thee, and our books, and our beautiful grounds, I could be happy as in Paradise."

"So could I," he answered, the tears springing to his eyes; "so will I. Yes, Inez, I will yet live happy with thee and innocence."

It was the twilight of a soft autumn day, that Inez sat, as I have said, alone and thoughtful. Soon her quick ear detected a step in the garden; she started to her feet. In a moment the old servant, Pedro, entered the room, and removing his hat, said:

"Master will be here to-night about twelve o'clock, ma'am."

"Thank you, Pedro, thank you," said the lady. She glanced at the watch at her side. "It is not yet nine," said she; "those hours will seem ages." But ere one had elapsed, she heard the well-known step of her husband; she rushed to the door, and they were locked in each other's arms.

On this occasion, contrary to his wont, he had found means to convey to his servant news of his return, and receive intelligence of the safety of Inez, and therefore took not his usual precaution of waiting for a signal.

"Will you ever leave me again?" said Inez at length, after they had talked a long time without approaching this subject—always nearest her heart. "Will you ever leave me again?" There was a sadness in her tone which she could not wholly suppress.

"Once more, dearest, and by heaven, for the last time!" replied her husband. He knitted his brows, and his face was dark with passion. Inez said not a word, but gently unclosed his clenched hand, and pressed it to her lips. "O, Inez," he exclaimed, with a softened voice, "you know not with what a power—infinately stronger than fetters of iron—circumstances can bind one. Let the young man beware of yielding to the first (I will not say temptation, for it may not always be such), but to the first strong circumstance that rises upon one almost like destiny; it must be conquered, or it will subdue. But we will not waste these few hours that remain to us in sad retrospection or foreboding. Let me prophesy, Inez," he added, in a playful tone. "In a year and a day, love, you and I will leave Froila and Spain forever." Then, to avoid any inquiries, he walked up to the altar. "This is a safe bank," said he, opening one after another the secret drawers. "Here, old lady," he added, irreverently, "take care of this till I call for it." And he poured into an empty one a number of gold and silver pieces. It was evident that whatever confidence he felt in the superstitious reverence of others for these religious emblems, he had none himself. He resumed his seat. The morning twilight was just appearing. "Let us walk in the garden," he said.

Inez put her hand mechanically in his; a sadness which she could no longer resist took possession of her. Her hopes, that the darkness had seemed to foster, were now fleeing away with it. No word had been spoken of the time of his departure, but she felt that it was close at hand. He plucked an orange from the tree, and handed it to her.

"Tell me," said Inez, as she took the fruit, "tell me when you must leave me—let me know the worst."

At that moment old Pedro appeared at the quay, waving a small black and red flag. Her husband saw him and returned the signal.

"Now," he replied—"this moment. I thought to spare you the anticipation at least of sorrow, and to prolong till the last moment the happiness of being together, so I said nothing of parting. God bless you! He will take care of such as you! Keep a light heart; you will hear from me soon, and see me, perhaps—who knows?" He spoke in a cheerful tone; he clasped her to his heart an instant, and was gone.

Who knows, indeed! Happy for us, that the future is hidden! In how many hearts would the light of hope be quenched, leaving only darkness and despair, were it otherwise! None but the fool would seek to know the future.

When the good brig M— left the wharf at Boston one bright summer morning in June, 18—, with fair wind and cloudless sky, and "all right," as was frequently shouted back and forth, little did those on board reck of the fate that awaited them.

One thing had been omitted in provisioning the M—. Not a weapon of defence of any description had been furnished; not a man on board had so much as a pistol. It is not uncommon for a vessel of six hundred tons, with a valuable cargo, to go into regions infested by pirates wholly unarmed. This does not appear to be safe; though in a vast proportion of cases, guns would be a needless expense.

For thirteen days the brig M— enjoyed uninterrupted good fortune. On the morning of the fourteenth, the captain descried a vessel, which he seemed to regard with considerable interest. As the day wore on, his watchings increased, and his interest seemed tinged with anxiety; but he spoke not a word of it. As night, which promised to be dark, drew near, he saw with evident satisfaction that the strange looking craft had partially altered her course.

I will not go into the details of the horrors of that night, which I heard from one on board. Suffice it to say, that in the dead of night, when deep darkness had settled over the waters, the M— was boarded by a band of well-armed and disciplined ruffians. What resistance unarmed men could make in the first impulse of despair was made; but it availed nothing. They were soon overcome and secured. Some of them were forced to assist in searching the vessel for money and valuables. One of the crew, a Mr. R., of Chelsea, was ordered by him who seemed to be second in command, to handle over a keg of nails, to see that no gold was concealed there. Not working fast enough, the pirate that stood over him struck him a cruel blow on the head that nearly stunned him. The brig was robbed of all her available wealth, and the men of every dollar of money. The last and most atrocious act of the invaders was to force every man down into the hold, nail down the hatchways, and set fire in various places to the vessel.

As soon as the men became aware of the departure of the pirates, they crept round, faces downward, smothered the fire with their hands, made their way to a hatchway that led into a sort of cabin, which had been overlooked by the robbers, and succeeded in making their way to the deck. These strong-hearted men, grateful to Heaven for the preservation of their lives, but full of burning indignation for their dastardly invaders, set all sail for the nearest port. But meeting, the second day, a vessel from which they obtained some necessary supplies, and by which they sent forward the account of their disaster, they turned them homeward.

When they arrived at Boston harbor, they found the news of the piracy had reached home before them. Other vessels had been attacked by these robbers on the high seas, and already was an armed fleet sent in pursuit. Scarcely had these things ceased to be the daily topic among men, when the whole city was thrown into excitement by the announcement that one vessel had returned bringing in four pirates. The crew of the brig M— was summoned to identify them, which was easily done. Mr. R., with peculiar satisfaction pointed out the man who had struck him, and swore clearly to his identity. "For," he added to some friends near him, "that face has never been absent from my mind a waking moment since, and scarcely ever when sleeping. Even at the moment of the blow, when I was helpless and in his power, I swore that blow should be avenged—and it shall. Even at that moment, I fixed that face on my memory, never to be effaced till death."

A few months after the departure of her husband did Inez remain in her usual listless solitude. Soon Pedro—the aim and end of whose existence seemed to be, to watch the course of his master—brought tidings that a vessel, answering in every particular to that in which the husband of the Lady Inez had last embarked, had been captured by a United States man-of-war, which was taking her to Boston. After, came accounts of his crimes, the excitement of the public mind against him and his company, and their probable fate. Then Pedro told the lady of all her husband's danger; of his lawless occupation, and that now perhaps his life was in peril. "Indeed," he added, as he saw she bore it more calmly than he anticipated, "we may say he is lost."

Inez sat as if turned to stone. The first shock had paralyzed her. To her quick perception, the whole breadth and depth of her calamity was seen and felt at once. She knew his crime; she knew the laws against it; she knew that even now he was in the hands of those who were swiftly bearing him to justice.

"How can we save him, Pedro?" at last issued from her white lips.

"You cannot save him, dear lady," said Pedro, gently; "but you can go to him, and see him, and comfort him before—" His voice trembled a little, and he stopped. They both knew what the laws would require of him.

Inez, touched by the sympathy of the faithful servant, burst into tears. It was well for her; it relieved her overcharged brain. She did not indulge long in the luxury of grief; she was soon ready for action. In a few days her jewels and valuables had been disposed of, her money and wardrobe collected, an American clipper, which happened to be in port at that time, was chartered, and she was on her way to Boston.

Meantime the trial came on. Those among us who were living then, will not soon forget the excitement of that time—the joy when the pirates were taken—and the sorrow, mingling with a sense of justice, on the terrible day of their execution.

One scene occurred during the trial, which I will mention. While Mr. R. was giving his testimony, he spoke of the brutal attack on him, as he was searching the keg of nails.

"I never struck him, your honor," said the prisoner.

R. turned upon him with a look of fury; all the power of mind and body seemed concentrated in his clenched hand, as, with one blow on the head of the prisoner, and, "You know you lie, villain," he threw him headlong on the court room floor. A spontaneous shout of approbation arose, which was soon checked, however, and Mr. R. was fined on the instant for contempt of court. The fine was immediately collected by the crowd in the court room, and paid over to the clerk. The trial was finished; three of the pirates were condemned to be hanged—a fourth, a young boy, was acquitted.

When the Lady Inez arrived in Boston, she heard that her husband was in jail awaiting death. During her long passage she had laid her plan of action. She waited not even to see him, but proceeded directly on to Washington. "He must not die!" she said to herself. "He shall not die; I will save him. I will go to the only one on earth who can pardon him, and I will beg of him this one little life that—O, God, I must succeed!"

She hurried on to Washington; she made her way without delay to the audience chamber of the president. How successfully she pleaded with the old general is a matter of history. She begged his life for her own sake—she the young, the innocent, to be widowed and infamous; for her husband's sake—he so young and so full of good. Yes, she knew he was; she knew him better than any one else, and she would pledge herself that his future life would be useful and honest; for the general's own sake—the remembrance of having saved a fellow-creature from an infamous death for a usefully honest, happy life, would be the sweetest of reflective joys. She recalled to his mind a letter written to her husband, a few years before, thanking him for relieving an American vessel in distress off Havana, when other (American) vessels around dared not go to their suffering fellow-citizens. She prevailed. Men said that the general could not resist the prayers of a beautiful woman in distress. But he no doubt felt that good would come of it. Truth has a convincing power that nothing else has. Inez felt the truth of her pledge, and could make him feel it.

Inez sped back to Boston with a lightened heart. She stopped not till she entered the cell of her husband, with the president's pardon in her hand. Who can describe that meeting? She did not linger there long—but long enough to hear her husband's solemn vow that henceforth his life should be one of innocence and virtue; long enough to join her vow with his of never ceasing gratitude for the president's clemency; long enough to utter one fervent, heartfelt prayer to God for strength for the future.

Who? Inez left the prison with her rescued husband, their first task was to retrace her steps to the capital, and pour out at the feet of their benefactor their gratitude, and assure him of their good resolves. Do Soto procured a miniature of the president, which never after left his person for a day. The other two wretches condemned to death, had no wives to plead for them—they probably deserved none; they were hung.

It is but a few years since I met Mr. R., and as usual I asked, "Where is Do Soto?" And as usual he answered with as much certainty as if the last mail had brought him the latest intelligence, "He is now master of a Baltimore clipper that runs from Baltimore to New Orleans. I never lose track of him; and but for my wife, I would have had his life before this."

It is perhaps needless to add, that the above tale is strictly true.

FOUR GREAT MEN.

It is a remarkable fact, that the career of four of the most renowned characters that ever lived, closed with some violent or mournful death.

Alexander, after having climbed the dizzy heights of his ambition, and with his temples bound with chaplets dipped in the blood of countless nations, looked down upon a conquered world, and wept that there was not another one for him to conquer, set a city on fire, and died in a scene of debauch.

Hannibal, after having, to the astonishment and consternation of Rome, passed the Alps; after having put to flight the armies of the mistress of the world, and stripped three bushels of gold rings from the fingers of her slaughtered knights, and made her very foundations quake—fled from his country, being hated by those who once exultingly united his name to that of our God, and called him Hannibal—died at last by poison, administered by his own hands, unlamented and unwept, in a foreign land.

Cæsar, after having conquered eight hundred cities, and dyed his hands in the blood of one million of his foes; after having pursued to death the only rival he had on earth, was miserably assassinated by those he considered his nearest friends, and in that very place the attainment of which had been his greatest ambition.

Napoleon, whose mandate kings and emperors obeyed, after having filled the earth with the terror of his name, deluged it with tears and blood, and clothed the world with sackcloth, closed his days in lonely banishment, almost literally exiled from the world, yet where he could sometimes see his country's banner waving over the deep, but which could not or would not bring him aid.

Thus four men who, from the peculiar situation of their portraits, seemed to stand as the representatives of all those whom the world called great—those four who, each in turn, made the earth tremble to its very centre by their simple tread, severally died—one by intoxication, or, as some suppose, by poison mingled in his wine—one a suicide—one murdered by his friends—and one in lonely exile.—Notes and Queries.

ANECDOTE OF BEETHOVEN.

Nothing vexed Beethoven more than when anything went wrong in the performance of his works. He would thereupon fall into a state of excitement which knew no limit. At a large theatre-concert in Vienna, where, besides his pastoral symphony, a fantasia of his for the piano with orchestra and chorus was performed, the clarinetist, in the variations of the closing theme, accidentally made a repeat of eight measures. Beethoven sprang up furiously, and overwhelmed the members of the orchestra with abuse. At last he cried out, "From the beginning!" The theme was commenced again. All fell in rightly, and the result was brilliant. But when the concert was over, the artists could not forget the honorable title Beethoven had conferred upon them, and swore never again to play when he was in the orchestra. But this only lasted till he came forward with some new composition, when the curiosity of the musicians got the better of their indignation.—Musical World.

MADAME TALLEYRAND AND DENON.

It is said of Madame Talleyrand, that one day her husband, having told her that Denon was coming to dinner, bid her read a little of his book upon Egypt, just published, in order that she might be enabled to say something civil to him upon it, adding that he would leave the volume for her on his study table. He forgot this, however, and Madame, upon going into the study, found a volume of "Robinson Crusoe" on the table instead, which, having read very attentively, she was not long on opening upon Denon, at dinner, about the desert island, his manner of living, to the great astonishment of poor Denon, who could not make head or tail of what she meant. At last, upon her saying, "Ah, dear Friday!" he perceived she took him for no less a person than Robinson Crusoe.—New York Mirror.

THE STONE AT THE SEPULCHRE.

BY W. A. FORD.

In the darkness of the night,
Unobserved by mortal sight,—
That the buried form might rise
To its glories in the skies,—
From the tomb where Jesus lay,
Angels rolled the stone away.

From our tomb—which hides the Lord,
And dims the beauty of his word,
The mighty stone of care, or grief,
Of sect, or creed, or unbelief,
Father, grant thy angels may
Thus and ever roll away;

Leaving thus our spirit free,
Even as Christ's, to rise to thee;
From the deep and dismal tomb,
Holding others midst its gloom,
Helping, in our upward way,
Angels roll the stone away.

THE OLD FLUTE-PLAYER.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

In the fourteenth century, there was in the principality of Kalenberg a large town called Hamelen. Built at the confluence of the Hamel and the Weser, it received in its port ships from all countries, and afterwards distributed their cargoes throughout Germany. It was noted everywhere for its commerce, its wealth, its power; and the man who could say, "I am a citizen of Hamelen," was sure of finding everywhere protection or civility. So the inhabitants had become hard, unjust and proud, as it usually happens with those who can do whatever they desire.

Now, there entered one day into the port a foreign vessel, of a construction so singular that the most experienced sailors could not tell where it had been built. It moved without sails or oars, and its cargo was composed of precious merchandize, such as silken stuffs, perfumed leather, gold dust and oriental spices. One single man constituted the crew. It was an old man with white hair, clad in a robe of yellow velvet, fastened by a woollen girdle, and carrying suspended to his neck by a silver chain, two flutes, one of which was of ivory and the other of ebony.

All the inhabitants of Hamelen hastened, as we may imagine, to see the strange vessel and the unknown captain who commanded it. The latter received his visitors kindly; but to all their questions replied that he had come to do business with them, not to relate his history, and he pointed to his merchandize spread out on the deck.

Nevertheless all went away without purchasing, and each made his own supposition on the mysterious stranger; some said that it must be some oriental Jew, whom the desire of gain had attracted to these remote regions; others asserted that he had come from India, pursuing an unknown route by the north; some suspected him to be a pirate who had enriched himself by getting rid of all his companions.

This last opinion prevailed because it was the most unfavorable one. It spread throughout the city, and it was soon universally believed that the old man with the flutes (as they called him) was a skinner of the seas, who sought to sell the fruit of his piracies. Some of the inhabitants then ventured to say that it would be prudent to interrogate this man, in order to learn the truth; others insisted that they had even a right to arrest him; at last, a merchant, who feared his business would be injured by the stranger, exclaimed that the wisest course would be to seize his merchandize as the property of a suspected man. This last opinion was immediately adopted by everybody. They addressed the council who then governed Hamelen, and some of the magistrates were despatched to the ship in order to seize its contents.

The old man in vain attempted to oppose them, remonstrating that they despoiled him without reason and contrary to all justice; the magistrates replied that the merchandize should be restored when he had proved that it belonged to him lawfully, threatening, if he resisted, to throw him into prison.

The stranger then comprehended that they were determined not to listen to him; he therefore seated himself beside the helm, and suffered them to remove the cargo, without saying a word. At last, when everybody had gone, he rose, detached the rope which moored the ship, and allowed it to descend the stream.

The curious crowd had assembled to see him depart, and the magistrates themselves had remained near. The old man, who perceived them, bent over the side of the ship.

"I am going, unjust men!" said he, in a threatening tone; "I am going, driven away and despoiled by you; but I leave behind me what will punish you and avenge me."

At these words he opened the red bag which he carried at his girdle, and they saw come out of it three rats of different species. They jumped into the river, swam across it and reached the shore; after which the ship continued its course.

The inhabitants contented themselves with laughing at the singular vengeance of the old man, but they soon discovered that it was a serious one. The rats multiplied so prodigiously that they ended by taking possession of the whole city. They had driven all domestic animals from the houses, and made their nests in the corners of the windows, in the places once occupied by swallows. Scarcely was a table set, when they all ran to eat the repast prepared for the family. They penetrated by innumerable companies into the granaries, consuming in a few days the food which should have sufficed for a year. The result was a famine, which rendered them more dangerous by making them more hungry. They spread throughout Hamelen, destroying all the merchandize, and gnawing the sails and cordage of the shipping. Afterwards they attacked the beams of the houses, which began to fall into ruins; at last, the rage of hunger which tormented them became such that they even attacked men during their sleep, and devoured infants in the cradle.

The inhabitants, who had vainly employed all known means, were at a loss how to escape this calamity. Their warehouses were empty, and foreign vessels no longer dared enter the port. It would have been all over with Hamelen, had not the council resolved to offer a reward of a hundred thousand gold pieces to him who could deliver the city from the animals which were devastating it.

This notice had already been published for some time, and no person had yet presented himself, when one day, the ship without sails re-appeared, commanded by the old man with the two flutes. He did not enter the port, but sent to the supreme council a letter in which he proposed to deliver Hamelen from the scourge which he had sent upon it, for the hundred thousand gold pieces offered. After having read it, the magistrates hastened to the port and summoned the old man to land, declaring that they would pay him the sum if he had really power to save them. The old man, confiding in this oath, landed, and taking his ivory flute, began to traverse the streets of Hamelen, playing a singular air, unlike any known music. As he played, the rats ran towards him from every direction and followed him like an army; when they had thus assembled, he returned to the port and made them all enter his ship, which departed alone, and quickly disappeared at the mouth of the river. Then turning towards the magistrates, he said to them: "You see I have kept my promise; now keep yours."

But the magistrates, having no longer anything to fear, began to find reasons for violating their pledged word.

"The compensation," said one of them, "ought to be proportioned to the trouble, and an air on a flute cannot reasonably be estimated at a hundred thousand gold pieces."

"Give him two hundred, and he ought to think us generous," added a second.

"Two hundred!" repeated the merchant who had finally advised the confiscation of the old man's cargo; "have you forgotten that this man is the original cause of all our sufferings?"

"True!" exclaimed all voices.

"Far from being indebted to him, we ought to inflict a severe chastisement," resumed the merchant; "let him esteem himself fortunate in being allowed to depart without having been called to an account for the past; for our pardon is a sufficient recompense."

The old man remained standing in the same spot, until the last of the inhabitants had crossed the threshold of the council-room; then, seizing his ebony flute, he cried, in a terrible voice: "Let them then be rewarded according to their works!"

Then he began again to traverse the streets of Hamelen, playing his black flute, and this time, all the children came out of the houses, and began to follow him, drawn by an irresistible power. He passed thus before each door, and his company constantly increased; finally, when it was complete, he returned towards the river.

Meanwhile, the inhabitants were praying in the church; but suddenly a gloomy voice resounded beneath its vaults, saying: "The curse of the fathers shall be punished in their children."

And rising in terror, for they had recognized the voice of the old man, they issued forth in crowds and hastened to the port: the old man was no longer there; but every wave of the river rolled to the shore the corpse of one of their children.

A chapel was built in commemoration of this great disaster. On the windows were painted mothers in tears, traversing the shores of the Weser, in the midst of which appeared little heads floating and little hands elevated to demand help; in the distance was the old man playing the ebony flute, and beneath it was written: "To our children, destroyed by the malice of the demon."

But the same evening an invisible hand effaced, it is said, the last words of this inscription, and the next day the inhabitants read, with fear and surprise: "To our children, destroyed because of the injustice of their fathers."

COL. WILLIAM HEATH SPOONER.

We present herewith a portrait of Col. Spooner, a gentleman as well known and as popular as any of our citizens, drawn for us by Barry, from a lifelike daguerrotype. Colonel Spooner was born in the State of Virginia, in the year 1798. His father, Rev. John Jones Spooner, was a graduate of Harvard University, engaged in mercantile business in this city, and for many years was one of our leading merchants. One of those reverses, however, so common in mercantile life, caused him to abandon trade, and he removed to Virginia, where he studied divinity, and was settled as a clergyman of the Episcopal church. His wife was the only daughter of Major-General William Heath, of Roxbury, one of the distinguished officers of the Revolutionary army. The subject of our sketch was but a year old when his father died, and being brought to the north by his surviving parent, received his education in the schools of Brookline and Roxbury. On the completion of his studies, he entered a counting-room, and was for some years engaged in mercantile pursuits. Taking an interest in public affairs, and being much esteemed by his townsmen, he was elected a member of the Massachusetts House of Representatives from Roxbury, and served his constituents acceptably in that body. For about five years he was also an officer of the customs in that city. From an early age he manifested a great interest in military affairs, and for a period of twenty years was connected with the militia in various official grades. For several years in succession he was colonel of the first regiment; and it was in a high state of discipline and drill when under his command. His last service was in command of the brigade as its senior colonel. He was exceedingly popular in the regiment and the brigade, and his resignation of his commission caused a deep regret. He refused to accept the office of brigadier-general, though six times elected to that rank. For the past six years Colonel Spooner has been known as the landlord of the United States Hotel, one of the largest establishments of the kind in the country. He had previously had charge of the Winthrop House. All who have had the good fortune to be his guests, will bear willing testimony to his affability, his care, his tact, and his skill as a manager. It is no light task to preside over such a house as the United States—a world of itself, with an army of attendants, and a multitude of guests to provide for. Col. Spooner has done this successfully, and has completely identified himself with the establishment. A finished gentleman, kind-hearted and generous, it is not surprising that he is surrounded by "troops of friends," who esteem and regard him as he deserves to be esteemed and regarded. He is one of the most deservedly popular men in our little village of Boston.

ARRIVAL OF A BURMESE ENVOY AT CALCUTTA.

The accompanying engraving was sketched on the occasion of a recent visit from a representative of the emperor of Burmah to the British authorities at Calcutta, and conveys a vivid idea of the manner in which eastern dignitaries travel. The carriage and its pair of horses present nothing remarkable, but the ambassador himself blazes with jewels, and, arrayed in gorgeous robes, is the centre of attraction. Behind him rides a detachment of native cavalry, and the seapoys who line the street receive him with military honors. A peculiar feature of the affair is found in the running footmen who accompany the carriage, holding umbrellas on long handles over the sacred head of the envoy. Of course it would not do to have a covered carriage, and so these poor fellows must keep pace with the horses through the broiling sun of a long journey. These Burmese runners have wonderful endurance and speed. One of them will tire out a horse, and there are more frequent relays of the latter than the former on a journey. Burmah was once the most extensive and popular state in Farther India, but since the war with the British, in 1824-26, it has been materially "curtailed of its fair proportions." It is enclosed on all sides by lofty mountains, and its soil is fertile but sadly neglected by the inhabitants. In the year B. C. 300, at which period the Buddhist religion was introduced, the government was permanently fixed at Prome, where it continued for 395 years, under the reign of twenty-four princes. After this it was removed, under a new dynasty, to Pagan, where it continued nearly twelve centuries, under a succession of fifty-five monarchs. In A. D., 1300, the seat of government was established at Panyah, and continued there fifty-six years, under three sovereigns. In 1364, it was removed to Ava, where it continued 369 years, and first became known to Europeans in the 16th century. About the commencement of the last century, the Burmese were conquered by the Pegnans, a people they had themselves enthralled and kept in subjection for the two preceding centuries. At this period Alompra founded the present dynasty. He was succeeded by his son, Uparaja, who made Pakaing his capital. On the death of Uparaja, three years after his accession to the throne, his brother Sembuen succeeded to the sovereign authority, and removed the seat of government to Ava. In 1776, Sembuen was succeeded by his son, Seakusa, who, after a reign of five years, was succeeded by Paongkacha, who removed the capital to Amarapura. After a reign of thirty-eight years, Paongkacha was succeeded, in 1819, by Nunsun, who removed the court once more to Ava; but on the almost total destruction of that town by an earthquake, in 1839, Monchoboo became the seat of government. In 1837, on the death of Nunsun, his brother Serawa succeeded to the throne, to the exclusion of the rightful heir. The British governor of Madras, in the 17th century, made friendly advances to the Burmese monarch, which, being graciously received, in 1709, Captain Alexander Hamilton paid him a visit, the details of which he recorded in his "New Accounts of the East Indies." In 1757, the British were allowed a site for a factory within the empire, but subsequently, aggressions on the part of the Burmese, and insolence to British ambassadors, provoked a collision, which terminated in the subjugation of the greater portion of the Burman empire to the British arms.

COL. WILLIAM HEATH SPOONER.

THE GRAVE OF STEUBEN.

About five miles from the village of Steuben, and in the town of that name, is the grave of Baron de Steuben. In a five-acre woodland, on a hill, and fenced in so that the field cattle cannot enter, quietly rest the remains of the Prussian patriot and hero. The grave is in the middle of the wood, and was once covered by a monument—a plain slab, with the following simple inscription:—"Major-General Frederick William Augustus Baron de Steuben." We visited the grave a few days since, and found the monument tumbled down, and things going to ruin and decay. It was an unpleasant sight to stand by the grave of that great man, and think how negligent our country had been of her heroes. There in the wild woods, far from the city's crowd, and by the "fair forest stream," reposed the remains of a gallant patriot, with nothing but a ruined mass of mortar and stones to mark his resting-place. Baron Steuben was aid-de-camp to the king of Prussia—he was receiving a salary of about $5000 a year at the time of our Revolutionary struggle—his sympathies were enlisted in behalf of the infant colony, and he left his home and situation to serve in the American cause, and take the lead of our armies. He was an able general, and an experienced tactician, and rendered invaluable service to our country. Soon after the close of the war, Steuben retired to private life, and for seven years endeavored in vain to prevail on Congress to remunerate him for his services. At length he received a salary of $2500 a year, only half of that which he had relinquished thirteen years before, to risk all in her service. He located himself on the farm, and in the township where he died, given him by the State of New York. He cleared off sixty acres of land, erected a log house, and sat down for the remainder of his life. With his trusty servants and a few friends, who still clung to him with more than filial affection, he watched the current of his years drift peacefully away, without a sigh for the splendors of royalty he had left behind him in the old world. A tree near the spot where his house stood, was a favorite of his; and under that tree in summer he used to pass many of his hours. He expressed a wish to be buried, when he died, under the tree where he had so often rested while living. On the 25th day of November, 1797, he was struck with paralysis, and lived but three days afterwards. He directed, just before his death, that he should be buried in his military cloak, with the star of honor, which he always wore, placed on his breast. His weeping servants, and a few rustic neighbors, formed the procession to his solitary place of burial; and there, in the still woods, "with the military cloak around him," and the star flashing on his breast, they laid the old warrior down to the rest. He sleeps well beneath the soil he helped to free. His stormy career was over, and he who had passed his life on the battle-field, had not a flag to droop over the hearse, or a soldier to discharge a farewell shot over his grave. A nation seems to have blotted him out from its memory, and left him to die alone, forgotten and unhonored. A "republic may prove ungrateful," and refuse to erect a monument to the memory of the departed patriot and warrior, but the people of the land which he helped to free will cherish his many virtues with filial tenderness and affection. In 1854, his remains were taken from the place where they were first deposited—a highway having been laid out there—and removed some fifty or sixty rods distant. As we stand by the grave of the baron, amid the tall trees of the forest, standing like so many sentinels around, the following touching and appropriate lines of the poet Collins, which have been so often quoted for their beauty and effect, came clustering to our memory:

"So sleep the brave, who sink to rest
With all their country's honors blest.
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck the hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod,
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.

There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To deck the mould that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall a while repair
To dwell a weeping hermit there."

THE UMBRELLA AND THE THRONE.

Who that ever "toted" a blue cotton umbrella, one of those heavy, old-fashioned things with a world of cloth and timber in its construction, being beguiled thereby by a prospect of rain, while leaving home in the morning, ever thought of an umbrella as a stepping-stone to the throne? In fact, it was considered rather fatal to royal hopes. Louis Philippe always carried an umbrella, and Louis Philippe lost his crown—cause and effect. But the philosopher knows that the same causes do not always produce the same effects. It seems that in the Malaya, in India, there is a certain precipice over so many feet high, and springing from a base of sharp-pointed rocks, from the summit of which the Hindu women sometimes cause their firstborn to precipitate themselves in pursuance of a vow. In last February, a young man whose mother had been kind enough thus to dedicate him to the gods, led him to the precipice to accomplish her vow, in the presence of a vast multitude. The young gentleman was very docile, but at the moment of leaping, he snatched a huge umbrella from the hand of one of his uncles, and sprang into the gulf. At the moment of his descent, the umbrella opened, and forming a parachute, buoyed up the adventurer in such a manner that he lighted gently and unharmed on the rocks beneath. The multitude exclaimed that it was a miracle, and an evident proof that Vishnoo and Brahma designated a successor to the reigning prince. The cry went up that it was their duty to massacre the rajah and his family. So the crowd rushed to the residence of the prince, stoned him and his whole family by way of "putting them out of their misery," and proclaimed the young gentleman with the umbrella Rajah of Oukar. The Bombay Gazette informs us that this young Rajpoot was an adventurer, who, having witnessed a balloon ascension at Calcutta the year previous, had instinctively caught at the laws of aerostation, and had made use of them to dethrone the rajah of Oukar-Mundattah. Our friend Godard himself could not have done it better.

A DILEMMA.—A horse dealer in Chicago has contrived an ingenious method of preventing the intrusion of constables on his premises to serve civil processes. On one side of his doorway is a savage bulldog, whose chain reaches half-way across the opening, and on the other side, an untamed bear, with a similar extent of chain. Of course there is "no thoroughfare."

NO TRAVELLER.—A wealthy and shrewd business man of Washington, D. C., has never in his life been as far as Baltimore, and never set foot in a railroad car, a steamboat, or a graveyard. He is over 70 years old.

RAIN.—Nature raises water for refreshing the earth from 13,000 to 14,000 feet for some of the mining districts of South America, and not less than 16,000 feet for the highest inhabited regions of Thibet.

SWEETS.—Elwanger & Barry of the Mount Hope Nurseries, near Rochester, N. Y., have two acres of roses in a single block, and seven acres of the queen of flowers in all.

DRAMATIC CRITICISM.

A few weeks since, the London Times, in its search for material to create a sensation, or perhaps from a higher motive, pounced down on an unlucky Italian opera, La Teucrida, and tore it all to pieces. The ground of attack was not the poverty of the music, or of the performance, but the immorality of the libretto, which, in fact, deserved all the censures of the critic. To be sure the Times was silent during the performance of many operas, whose immorality is veiled only by the cobwebs of long custom; but we are thankful it has waked up at last. There is Don Giovanni, for instance. The hero is anything but an exemplary gentleman, and the bad effect of his example is not obliterated by the fact of his tumbling through a trap-door in the last scene. Ardent and ingenious youth dwell rather admiringly on the velocity of his career, than in the little circumstance of his being finally overtaken by "Bogy."

But we are glad the London Times took the matter in hand. The stage has been purified, to a great extent, by the force of public opinion. The drama is now, on the whole, presentable and acceptable; and we must see to it that immorality does not return to the boards, under cover of the sweetest music and the most insinuating of modern tongues. What a mass of horrors and atrocities is Lucrezia Borgia! That woman never should have been selected as the heroine of drama or opera. History furnishes examples of purity, of lofty heroism, of heroic daring and generous deeds, to awaken, in the hands of an able writer, interest and enthusiasm, without touching those dark shadows that chequer its pages.

If this movement of the London Times is followed up with vigor, it will be well for managers, actors and the public. Honest and fearless criticism is what we stand in need of. Indiscriminate puffery and indiscriminate blame, based on personal preferences or prejudices, are too apt to be given or instead of honest opinions. And since, for a long time to come, we fear, we must be dependent for our dramatic entertainments on England, it would be well for us, if a rigid censorship should be established there as a barrier to the wretched stuff which has been imported thence in cartloads for our consumption, simply because the garbage had been stamped with the seal of European puffery. It is for the interest of managers and actors to court and solicit fearless, honest criticism, instead of puffery. The stage is rising again into a power—a power felt and acknowledged. If it is permitted to sink once more into its late state of degradation, then it falls

—like Lucifer,
Never to rise again.

The English press, in the palmy days of Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt and the "Examiner," was famous for the fearlessness, intelligence and impartiality of its criticism. And in the century beforehand, criticism was in the hands of men above all suspicion of venality and favoritism. The stage was then a model of elegance of deportment and of purity of pronunciation. No such thing as slovenly English was ever heard from the lips of an actor—no such thing as "gagery." Talent found its fitting appreciation, and imbecility and dullness were restrained to their proper spheres. The dignity of art was upheld by the dignity of criticism.

A YOUTHFUL COLONY.

Not long since a number of children, under the charge of Rev. Mr. Van Meter, started by railroad from New York for the great West. They were brands snatched from the burning by the noble ladies of the Five Points' Mission. These ladies paid all the expense of the expedition. The children and their guardian occupied a car by themselves; and at the moment of departure the spectators gathered about the station were thrilled with emotion on hearing all those little childish voices mingling in the song of "Happy Land!" May Heaven bless them and their generous protectors! May the future of their lives be as bright as its beginning was dark and dreary. The establishment of the Five Points' Mission in the very heart of the worst moral corruption and physical degradation of New York, was one of the noblest philanthropic movements of the day.

"PORTER'S SPIRIT OF THE TIMES," NEW YORK.—We cordially welcome this new sporting journal recently established by the founder and editor of the old "Spirit," in connection with Mr. George Wilkes, a successful and able journalist. Porter seems to have renewed his youth and vigor with his new garb. The brilliant spirits of the olden time cluster around him with many a new recruit; and his sporting and dramatic journal blazes with intellect, wit, fun, humor and criticism, from end to end. Its permanent existence is already a fixed fact.

UNLUCKY.—The dowager queen of Oude came to England on a bootless errand—that of bribing the British government into a restoration of her son to his kingdom. She ought to have known that the British lion never relaxes a prey in which he has once firmly fixed his claws. The old lady started with jewels valued at a quarter of a million of dollars as presents, but they were stolen from her on the way—an Oude-acious robbery!

POWERFUL ENGINE.—The Detroit Tribune states that an engine, costing $50,000, is in course of erection, which is to be used for pumping water into the reservoir of that city. This engine is guaranteed to raise 1,000,000 pounds one foot with 100 pounds of coal—less than two pounds of coal per hour for a single horse power—the highest guaranteed duty of any engine known.

CHIVALRIC DARING.—A milkman in this vicinity, who has grown rich by his business, has set up a carriage, and has had painted on one of the panels a pump, and on the other a cow. Between the two he gets along very comfortably.

POLITICAL GOSSIP.

It is refreshing to step out of the circle of our own political affairs, now involved in the boiling and feverish excitement of a presidential election, and glance at the doings of our transatlantic neighbors. We can afford to keep cool when we are reviewing their difficulties, and certainly cannot be charged with partisanship when we are discussing them. We predicted long ago that a coolness would before long arise between the great governments so lately allied in arms against the ambition of Russia. It is reported that such a state of feeling does actually exist, and that very sharp notes (by the way, these diplomatic notes are sometimes three or four hundred pages long) have passed between Louis Napoleon and the English ministry, "concerning everything in the world and something besides." France is patting Russia on the back while turning the cold shoulder on England. And lately some curious hints have been thrown out, which accounts for the precipitancy with which the treaty of peace was hurried through at Paris. About that time, it will be remembered, the vast, fertile and wealthy kingdom of Oude was annexed to the British possessions in the East—they didn't call it annexing, but absorbing, by the way. Louis Napoleon, who was seeking for a pretext for ending the war, in which he had reaped glory enough for his present purposes, eagerly caught at this fact—inquired very politely how John Bull could be so inveterate against the encroachments of Russia in Europe, while John Bull was setting the example in the East on such a gigantic scale. He hinted that consistency would not permit his good friends to prolong a bloody contest, of which he himself had had about enough, etc., and so, adroitly harping on this string, created a flurry, under cover of which the treaty was rushed through. It will be well if matters remain simply in this negative, frigid state; but John Bull is sturdy, and Johnny Crajean is fiery, and we should not be at all surprised to wake up some fine morning and find them at loggerheads with each other. It would not be difficult to rouse up the old hereditary hate of both countries—each of which, has in turn, been invaded and subjected by the other. Then England would again become the "perfidious Albion" of the old French journals, and Louis Napoleon the unmitigated villain which the London Times called him at the time of the coup d'etat.

THE REASON.—It is an acknowledged fact that plays are always popular in which the principal character is a villain. Balzac explains the fact by saying, "We like to see a greater scoundrel than ourselves, and console ourselves with the idea that, with all our imperfections, we are not quite so bad as he is."

AN OLD 'UN.—An old oak tree in France, planted in 1070 by the Count of Champagne, was lately struck by lightning.

WHERE I WOULD LIE.

BY MRS. SARAH E. DAWES.

When I am gone to that far spirit land,
From whence to earth no soul hath ever returned,
To lift the mystic veil that hides our view,
When naught is left of all that once I was,
Save the lay form, the tenement of clay:
I would be borne to my last resting-place,
In some green spot beneath the blue of heaven,
Where the delicious breath of the balmy spring
Might float around me, and the dirge-like winds
Of sighing autumn, in low, solemn numbers,
Chant o'er my grave their mournful requiem.
Lay me not in the cold and cheerless tomb,
The prison-house of death: but place my form,
Silent, and as though of marble made,
In the kind bosom of my mother Earth,
Where once again my dust shall mix with hers.
Not many circling years shall roll around
Their onward orbit to the far off bounds
Of time, before, methinks, my life's frail bark
Shall have launched forth upon the great unknown,
Perchance to sink within some fearful depth,
Or safely wafted by angelic hands,
To some fair haven of the better land.
When this soul of mine has winged its flight,
I would that the frail tenement of clay,
Where once it dwelt, might peacefully lie among Its kindred dust. And lo! when peeling far
Through earth and heaven, shall sound the trump of God,
May it arise from the long clasp of death,
Clad in the garments of celestial brightness,
And joining there the choir of angel harpers,
Traverse with them the golden streets above,
And overcome through heaven's high arches peal
The grand and glorious song of earth's redeemed.

FOOLISH TOM HORN.

BY JOHN THORNBERRY.

IMPULSE raises the old cat with many and many a young man. He may be safe just now, for he knows where he is; but to-morrow, or in the course of the next hour, he is liable to be in the maze of a difficulty from which nothing but brass or a good sword can ever extricate him.

Thus it chanced to be with our misguided friend, Tom Horn. A cleverer fellow, in the common acceptance of that word, probably never passed you his cigar case; nor a jollier one, upon occasion; nor an easier, freer, more careless, or trust-to-huck individual. He always lived, when he got a dollar, as if he should never need another. And in spite of his improvident habits, he managed somehow to keep always with the rest of the world, too.

There is no trying to tell how many hearts he broke, here and there, nor into how many scrapes he got in consequence. It would be nonsense to think of reckoning up his conquests, whether against the efforts of other men, or over the more delicate natures of the female sex. Wherever he was he was proud to be esteemed a lion.

His impulses led him into all manner of difficulties. He had hardly extricated himself from one before he found himself over head and ears in another. Perplexities, especially of the amatory sort, he never failed to be mixed up in. He invariably had an exhausting affair on his hands. And all this simply because he was run away with by his sudden feelings. They were like wild horses bitted to him, without curb or rein.

Last summer Tom took it in his head to make a little excursion into the country. So taking down a large map of the State, he studied over it, and studied over it, till he fixed his thoughts on Obed as the very place where he wished to sojourn. It was exceedingly inland, it had public houses of one kind and another, and it was understood to be a locality full of the delightful rural associations.

Accordingly, on the twentieth day of July, he crammed his summer effects into a good-sized carpet-bag, bade his anxious landlady "good morning," and sallied forth. First to the cars. The cars took him within two miles, or such a matter, of Obed, and a coach, such as you cannot find anywhere except in the country, trundled him on the rest of the way.

Once installed in his little seven-by-nine room at the hotel, he began to look industriously about him. On investigation, he discovered that there was another establishment for summer boarders right next his hotel, and easily overlooked from his own little window. Here was a subject for him to study. His curiosity was piqued, as usual. And down he sat, with open window, day after day, and for so many hours each day, to watch for any stray developments that might offer.

It was not long before he thought himself paid for his trouble. For nearly opposite, at a window always open and with the curtains drawn completely aside, sat a beautiful young creature with dark curls and fair complexion, who to appearances was engaged in embroidering, but in fact was occupied with throwing glances over at our friend Tom.

There he sat, making everybody but her believe he was reading; and there she sat, trying to impose on the world the idea that she accomplished a deal of fancy work every day. They grew tender very soon with their eyes, and finally came to exchanging smiles. At this stage of the proceedings Tom certainly supposed he must be crazy.

By-and-by he bowed to her. What was his delight to find that she stared fixedly yet pleasantly at him a moment, and then nodded back as gracefully as a spirit! Now he was beside himself in truth. He wished he had wings, that he might fly straight across to her window. He wanted to throw himself out of his own window and go in some way through the air over to her, and hover about her charming face.

One day after another went along, Tom more a victim to his feelings than ever. She sat and looked at him and he sat and looked at her. In the course of his life, Tom had picked up, among other things, a sort of knowledge of the language of nudes. So he bethought himself that he would try an experiment with signs and dumb show.

He made a few letters in the air. She immediately replied in the same way, making other letters in return. He was delighted more than ever, and found he had finally "struck a vein." If they could in this way arrange it so as to talk with one another, the business was a safe and profitable one. By means of his signs he asked her Christian name.

"Bessy," answered she; "short for Elizabeth."

"Mine is Tom," he rejoined. "What is the color of your eyes, Bessy?"

"Black,"—with a hesitating smile. "Yours are blue; I can tell from here."

"Are you a stranger in these parts?" asked Tom.

"Yes; came out to pass a few weeks with some friends."

"Friends boarding in the house with you?"

She nodded yes.

"I wish I had taken rooms there too," communicated Tom.

"Why didn't I?"

"We are full here now," returned his fair friend.

Throwing a kiss to her from the tips of his fingers, as he heard some one rap on his door, he closed half his shutter and sprang up to let in the applicant.

Next day he returned to his exciting occupation, taking care to secure himself against sudden interruption. This was an adventure that occupied his thoughts and his heart. He was in for it in good earnest. This time he found his new inamorata punctual at her post, and apparently awaiting him. Her face lit up with a smile, she bowed, and, in response to his own advances, kissed her hand to him. This, surely, was getting on bravely. With his thumbs and fingers he went to work again.

"I think you are beautiful," said he. "I feel as if I had known you always. Are you from the city?"

She nodded yes, as a quicker way than by signs.

"Parents?"

"No."

"Brothers?"

"Not here. One in town; the other in California."

Tom half wished they were both in California.

"Relations with you?"

"An uncle and aunt. That is all. But they watch me, you know."

Tom here clasped his hands across his breast, made up a face of the most deeply sympathetic pretensions, and declared that he would like to tie them both up in a bag and hide them down cellar together for a month. She shook her head and curls at him playfully, as much as to say—"That never would answer in the world; for they are going to leave me something one of these days!"

"Rich?" pursued Tom.

"Yes,"—with her head only.

Tom could have clasped the dear creature in his arms only for the distance that lay between them. "Now," said he to himself, "this girl's a prize. I'll have her or die in the attempt! Let me once handle the bonds and stocks that her Jew of an uncle is going to leave her, and I think I can make a different thing of life entirely!"

"I wish we could meet," he went on, "I have so much to tell you. I want to see you closer; take your hand; and talk with you. I want to hear your voice; to look into your eyes; and watch the play of your countenance. Can't we meet somewhere?"

She hesitated. At length she gave a timid assent to his proposal. Tom could have died that minute, for joy. Thrice he kissed his hand to her, rising to his feet and bowing. His manner was already that of a most passionate lover.

"In the orchard," he suggested, "down the lane below," pointing in the direction of the locality that was thus to be made sacred. To that she agreed also.

"What time?" he inquired.

She dared not suggest herself. She would leave that to him.

"To-morrow afternoon!" said he, in the form of an interrogatory.

"Yes; that would answer very well."

"At three o'clock?"

"Yes," again.

And so it was arranged.

Tom could scarcely sleep at all that night, and no wonder. To a person of an impulsive and nervous temperament, like himself, a matter of this sort was a great affair. It made his pulses flutter and trip a good deal faster than those of people in more ordinary circumstances.

In the afternoon, and at a little past three o'clock, he stole off for a stroll down to the orchard in the rear. His way was through a pleasant lane, shaded here and there with a broad-spreading apple-tree, over long strips of most delicious green grass, and through a gate or two that kept out vagabonds and stray cattle.

Arrived, finally, at the spot designated, he leaped the bars that stretched across his path, and looked carefully all around the enclosure. Old stone walls shut it in on every side, and the grass was as thick and vigorous as in June. The apple-trees stood in dense order, their shadows giving an almost forest-like look to the whole orchard. The sun glistened in through the leaves, and touched up with a yellow brilliancy the young fruit that had begun to make its boasts to the eye of the proprietor. Altogether it was a very beautiful rural scene, and just the place that youthful lovers would select for the exchange of vows or admiration.

Tom went strolling about here and there, almost at random, gazing all around him, and wondering whereabouts he should find his friend Bessy. For some minutes he inclined to the opinion that she had not yet arrived. But suddenly catching a glimpse of a white dress beneath a distant apple-tree, and seeing that the person's back was turned to him, and leaning against the tree, he took heart and inwardly returned thanks for his luck. He went nearer, to satisfy himself of the identity of Bessy. Yes—there were those long, dark curls, and that same black hair. He was certain of her now. His suit was accepted, and his fortune was made for his lifetime.

In order to afford her a delightful surprise, he resolved to creep stealthily up behind her, and then to rush forward and throw his arms around her neck. All of which would, no doubt, constitute a very pretty arrangement.

So up he stole a-tiptoe, working his way slowly through the tangled grass, till he came very near to the tree; then, with a laugh and an exclamation of tenderness, he threw himself down on the ground beside his fair one, wound his arms about her, and began uttering protestations of his devoted attachment. Instead of reciprocating this sort of sentiment at all, the lady threw down the newspaper she had been reading, and screamed out at the very top of her voice: "Alfred! Alfred! ALFRED!"

It was a scream of terror and desperation.

In an instant almost, up sprang a man from the grass and shadows somewhere, in his shirt sleeves, carrying another newspaper in his hand. He looked to see what the matter was, and flew to the rescue as swift as lightning.

Before Tom could begin to recover from his astonishment at the lady's screams, he found himself set on by the fists of the gentleman in summer afternoon undress, pounded till he could not see one from the other, kicked all about the grass, and ordered to take himself out of the orchard in no time at all! So different a reception from what he had expected. The difficulty was, he had mistaken another man's wife for the girl of his heart. They were a couple who hoarded in the same house with young Bessy.

Blind, bloody and swollen, and mortified even more than he was disfigured, he dragged himself away without a word of explanation, and started for his room by the most private way. In the lane he met Bessy herself. He could just recognize her; but she did not know him, though so much surprised at his appearance. She thanked Heaven that she did not know him, and passed quietly on. It was a sad termination indeed to prospects that ten minutes before were so golden.

The same night he paid his bill at the hotel, hired a conveyance to the cars, and slipped off to parts unknown to the dwellers of Obed. The story got about very soon. Only one person really understood the secret of it, and that person was Bessy; but she was prudent when it was absolutely necessary, and nobody was ever the wiser for what she knew on the subject.

It was said that Tom Horn was cured of his amatory impulses; but there is no telling how that is. As likely as not, he will get into a worse scrape, ten times over, when the next summer shines over our heads. Such sad dogs never will learn a new trick,—not even when it will protect them against the results of the old ones.

SAGACITY OF DOGS.

Among many curious yet well authenticated anecdotes, illustrating the wonderful sagacity, or reasoning powers of the canine race, the following deserves a place: A large Newfoundland dog, belonged to the captain of a ship engaged in the trade between Nova Scotia and Greenock. On one occasion, the captain brought from Halifax a beautiful cat, which formed a particular acquaintance with Rover; and these two animals of such different natures were almost inseparable during the passage. On arriving at Greenock, the cat was presented by the captain to a lady of his acquaintance, who resided nearly half a mile from the quay, in whose family she remained for several weeks, and was occasionally visited by her friend and fellow-passenger, Rover, who seemed not a little displeased at the separation which had taken place between them. On the day, however, when the ship was to leave the port for another voyage, the usual bustle on board gave Rover a hint of what was going on, and he decided on his course of conduct without delay. He jumped on shore, made his last visit to pass, seized her in his teeth, much to her astonishment, and carried her through the streets to the quay, just as the ship was about hauling off. He made a spring, cleared the gunwale, and fairly shipped his feline friend in good order and well conditioned, in and upon the good ship called the Nancy of Greenock; and then ran to his master, wagging his tail, as if entreating that she might remain on board.—N. ## FEEDING FISH.

The last efficient sea-fish pound we chanced to examine is situated near Port Nesson, Wigtownshire. It was constructed in 1800. A flight of steps leads downward to a small platform, by the water's edge, and the moment the old woman, who was our conductress, showed herself in the act of descending those steps, the whole body of codfish moved toward her, just as a flock of poultry follows a henwife. She had in her hand a basin filled with sand-eels and limpets; and when we neared the surface of the pond, and were seen by the fish to be manipulating the contents of the basin, as many as could press themselves close in shore raised their heads, or at least the anterior portion, quite out of the water, opened their mouths wide, and made a gurgling and occasionally a snapping sound, the latter occasioned by the sudden shutting of their jaws when they felt or fancied that something had dropped between them. As we stood on the lowest step, au niveau of the water, some of them laid their large, languishing faces over our feet, allowed us to put our hands beneath them, and roll them over, or even raise and repunge them—as nurses do children—out of, and then beneath their native brine. The species were chiefly cod, with a few lithe, a gurnard, and a small grise or sea trout.—Blackwood.

THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA AND HIS BROTHERS.

The spirited engraving on this page presents us with equestrian portraits of the present emperor of Russia, Alexander II. and his brothers, the grand dukes Constantine, Nicholas and Michael, who appear as we have named them, in order, from left to right, the imperial group being depicted as they exhibited themselves to the loyal eyes of the populace of Moscow on the recent grand gala of the coronation, with the details of which the papers are now filled. The young emperor looks "every inch a king." The eldest son of the late Czar, Nicholas, he is about thirty years of age. He is said already to have given proof of energy and ability, and he passed through a training well calculated to fit him for the important station he occupies. On his accession to the throne, he found the empire involved in a terrible struggle, comparable only in its son of the emperor, since, at the date of Alexander's birth, Nicholas had only been grand duke. So late as the past summer, there were apprehensions of a revolution, with the object of dethroning Alexander and substituting Constantine in his place. The danger seems, for the present, to have blown over. Constantine is inferior in stature and personal appearance to his imperial brother. His features are regular, but bear marks of premature care; and, if the expression of his countenance be taken in evidence, his temper is the reverse of angelic. He was educated for the navy, trained on board ship, performed a voyage round the world in company with his governor, Admiral Lutke, seemed to identify himself with the maritime power of the empire, and is distinguished by manners and speech as bluff as any sailor need possess. He is reputed to hold England in the most cordial detestation, though he visited and sterile command—and of such family discipline there are precedents abundant in the history of Russian sovereigns—so long will it be impossible for any Russian liegeman to exercise aught but a delegated authority, or to foster a party that would have more than a semblance of influence, or, indeed, of existence." The czar's younger brothers, the Grand Dukes Nicholas and Michael—one born in 1831 and the other in 1832—are chiefly known to the public by the part they took at the battle of Inkermann. Previous to the conflict, the Grand Duke Michael, a fine, stout young fellow, who was noticed on several occasions riding about with a white dog for a companion, informed the soldiers that the czar had issued orders that every Frenchman and Englishman should be driven into the sea ere the year was closed; but when the grand dukes heard of the slaughter of their men, they turned pale; and magnitude to that in which it was engaged in the memorable year 1812, when Napoleon, at the head of the greatest army of modern times—an army that might be said to embrace nations in its ranks—undertook to "conquer a peace" in the capital of all the Russias. Though trained to arms, and the chief of a military nation, still it is said that Alexander does not love war for the sake of glory, and certainly the fall of Sebastopol is not calculated to inspire him with any great enthusiasm for military campaigns. The Grand Duke Constantine, who, from his fierce, daring and impetuous character is the hero of the Russian nobility, was born in the year 1827, after Nicholas had ascended the throne; and the circumstance of his having been thus "born in the purple," according to Petersburg gossip, raised, in their youthful days, a dispute between the brothers, Constantine asserting that he was the eldest that country in 1847, and inspected its naval arsenals and dockyards in the most minutest details, and with the most careful attention. He is said to be surrounded in St. Petersburg by a band of followers known as the "old Russian party," and is suspected to govern the empire over which his brother nominally reigns. Hitherto, however, he has given no proof of eminent talent. Speaking of the Grand Duke Constantine, the author of that interesting work, "Nine Years in Russia," says: "It has been insinuated that he rules the empire over which his brother nominally reigns; such statements, however, like those which affirm the existence of powerful opposing parties in Russia, must be received with great caution. As long as the czar, in the absoluteness of his authority, can, by a word, consign his nearest relative, like any other subject, to a dungeon, or send him into exile, or appoint him to a distant when the day was irretrievably lost they burst into tears, retreated with their staff, and implored Menschikoff to make the best capitulation he could and abandon the hopeless struggle. Such, at least, is the English account of their behaviour, which must, of course, be received with due caution. The Grand Duke Nicholas has recently been appointed chief of the division of the pioneers of the cavalry of the guard; and the Grand Duke Michael chief of the second division of the artillery of the guard. Promotion is rapid when one's brother is emperor and commander-in-chief. Over how vast an empire has Alexander II. been summoned to preside—the largest, probably, that has ever existed in ancient or modern times. All this vast territory, and more than sixty-five millions of people, are ruled by the will of the one man whose portrait faces us on this page.

SPANISH MINSTRELS.

The picture on this page is well executed and highly characteristic. It is a group of two Spanish maidens, one of whom is striking the chords of the national guitar, bending over it in the excitement of minstrelsy, her parted lips indicating that she's singing; while her companion accompanies her with the tamborine and voice. Fair they are not—these bronzed daughters of the sun—and yet theirs is a wild and gipsy style of beauty, not without its fascination. Dark hair, dark eyes, pearly teeth and rounded contours are their heritage. There is a charm about the Spanish women which the coldest hearts acknowledge. Their figures are generally supple and elastic; their movements full of grace and witchery. Their walk is a study; but it is as much impossible to imitate the walk of a Spanish senorita, as to copy her manner of managing the fan. In their gait, and in their fan exercise, they certainly surpass all the daughters of Eve. Doomed by the jealousy of the "lords of creation" to great seclusion, and to a forced silence, except among themselves, they find in the fluttering of their fans an eloquent mode of expressing their sentiments and emotions, as the ladies of the East make of a bouquet of flowers a most expressive drago-man. But we should forget the principal accomplishment of a Spanish girl, if we omitted her dancing. The stage gives us a faint, though fanciful idea of the character of the Spanish dancers. The bolero, and the cuchacha, and the Jalio de Nozres, must be danced by the daughters of Spain, to be fully understood and appreciated. Even Fanny Ellsler lacked a certain something, which only nationality could give. Nor are the Spanish women wanting in the higher qualities of devotion and heroism. If France has her Maid of Orleans, Spain can point with equal pride to her Maid of Saragossa, whom Byron's pen and Wilkie's pencil have immortalized. The characteristics of the women of Spain are preserved in their colonies and in the revolted provinces of Spain with singular fidelity. The women of Lima and the ladies of Havana and of Mexico have the same features, the same fascination of manner, and the same habits, as their sisters of the country of their origin.

CHAPTER XX.—[CONTINUED.]

Before Edith had time to say anything more, she was called from the room. The door by which she went out had hardly time to close behind her, when another communicating with the hall was thrown open, and Ishmael Withers entered.

"You are in trouble; allow me to offer you my sympathy," said he, advancing towards her and holding out his hand.

"I wish for none of it," replied Bessie, shrinking back and burying her hand within the folds of her dress.

"You would even shake hands with me, for old acquaintance sake, after so long a separation?"

"We avoid the viper for fear of its sting, even more than from its loathsomeness."

"I understand a part of your taunt, at least," said Withers. "If my features were not cast in one of nature's fairest moulds, it is no fault of mine, and now that you have seen to your sorrow that a fair outside may conceal a depraved heart, you might, I think, for the sake of common courtesy, be more chary in the choice of your words."

"I know whom you allude to, but there is not wealth enough in the wide world to tempt Wilton Richmond to the commission of a deed at once so wicked and so mean as the one he is accused of, and you, incapable as you are of appreciating anything which is true and honorable, know this. Nothing low or vile could ever harbor in a nature so open and frank as his. As soon might foulness and corruption be concealed in a crystal vase."

"You would do to deliver a Fourth-of-July oration, Miss Bessie," said Withers, with a sneering smile, "but facts are stubborn things."

"Yet stubborn as they are, they may be warped and twisted by cunning hands."

"This is all folly," said Withers, changing his tone. "Nothing is gained by bandying words. One thing is certain: this Captain Richmond, immaculate as you hold him to be, whenever he is brought to trial, to say nothing of the disgrace, will be found guilty of a crime involving a heavy penalty."

"Whenever he is brought to trial, do you say? Has he not already had his trial?"

"He isn't yet even arrested, for which you may thank me."

"Why should I thank you? What good can result to him from delay?"

"Delay might not be of much use. What I wish to do is to prevent his being arrested. If he is brought to trial, there will be no chance for him whatever."

"How are you to prevent his arrest?"

"As yet, the affair is known only to a few. To none, in fact, besides you and your immediate friends, except Ritson and Mercer. There has been a vague rumor afloat, it is true, bearing a distant similitude to the truth, yet nothing has transpired which can seriously implicate him. For this, too, you are indebted to me."

"You appear to possess great influence."

"The truth is, I went earnestly to work, and at once. I sought an interview with Ritson and Mercer, and obtained a promise from them that they would give me a chance to investigate the matter, previously to their disclosing anything which might implicate him."

"It appears to me as singular as it is unnatural for you to interest yourself so much in behalf of one whom I know you regard with such bitter enmity."

"I should not, of course, go to so much trouble without what I considered a sufficient reason—without the expectation of some reward. You can certainly be at no loss to guess what that reward must be."

"How should I guess? I have no aptitude at tracing the artful and crooked policy by which some like to bring about their designs."

"What I require is merely for you to obey what was your late father's wish."

"You may not know as well as you think you do what that wish was."

"I believe I understood it perfectly; but you may think his death releases you."

"No—it makes it doubly binding."

"All you have to do, then, is to obey it, and within twenty-four hours, Wilton Richmond shall be conveyed to a place where the arm of the law cannot reach him."

"A place of safety?"

"Yes."

"You have the power to do this?"

"I have, with the aid of that all-powerful talisman—gold."

"And is this place of safety one that an honorable man can accept?"

"That is a matter of opinion, and opinion may be modified by circumstances. If Wilton Richmond, or any other man of common discretion, holding a commission in the army, was required to choose between a place of safety and the disgrace of being cashiered, and then imprisoned for life, or even shot—for the severty of martial law may demand such an expiation,—I think there can be little doubt but that he would be of the opinion that he might accept the first alternative, and still be an honorable man."

"Though I may not clearly understand you, I believe that I can see that your notions of what is honorable differ so widely from Wilton Richmond's, that he would reject your offer of safety with disdain."

"The more fool he, then."

"Do you know that the penalty of such a crime is what you mentioned?"

Withers faltered a moment, for he had spoken at random, and merely with a view to intimidate her.

"You dare not say that you know it," said she, observing his hesitation.

"I fail you would have spared your feelings a little," he replied, quickly recovering himself. "I said that he might be doomed to be shot, whereas I should have said that hanging is the punishment for treason, which I think will appear to you, as it does to me, far more dreadful and ignominious than the one I first mentioned."

"Treason did you say? Surely the crime he is accused of cannot be called by that name."

"He has been guilty of an act of treachery against government, which he would hardly have committed had he not renounced his allegiance to that government. It can, moreover, be proved that he has renounced it."

Withers, on this subject, was somewhat at home. Having himself ventured on slippery places, he had taken the precaution to inform himself as to what really constituted the crime of treason, in the full confidence that he could at will refrain from overstepping the limits of safety. He found that he had deceived himself. Almost before he knew it, he had taken the dangerous step, which, had he been betrayed by his reckless coadjutors, would have branded him with the name of a traitor.

Withers waited to give Bessie a chance to reply, but finding that she remained silent, he went on.

"You know now," said he, "what this Captain Richmond has to fear, as well as hope. His fate is in your hands. Do you think that he will thank you for permitting him to suffer the death of a traitor, when you had it in your power to prevent it?"

"If I only knew what I ought to do," said Bessie, in a low, moaning voice.

"It is plain enough, I should think. We are commanded in a certain book, which you profess to hold in great reverence, to preserve our own lives and the lives of others."

"Not by unlawful means—not by taking on ourselves vows which we know it will be impossible for us to fulfil," said she, with a touch of the old spirit which she had manifested at the beginning of their interview.

"Let him die, then, and remember that his blood will be on your head. I shall urge you no more."

He turned to leave the room.

"Stay one moment," said Bessie.

He turned towards her, but did not speak.

"Let me be certain," said she, "that Wilton Richmond is not of danger, and I will do as you wish."

"I shall not trust to that. When once the knot is fairly tied, his safety shall be cared for, and not till then."

"Let it be so, then, and may Heaven forgive me if I have done wrong!"

"Will you give me your written promise?"

"No; if my word cannot be trusted, neither can my written promise."

"When I see you again, which, I expect, will be to-morrow, everything will be so arranged that Captain Richmond can at any moment be placed beyond danger of arrest. You will bear in mind that the ceremony is first to be performed, for which purpose I shall bring a few friends with me."

"But if you should fail to make the arrangement which will secure his safety?"

"Why, then, I shall not claim the fulfilment of your promise."

Half an hour after Withers had gone, Edith, who had been detained longer than she expected, re-entered the apartment. Bessie, who, when she returned, sat bent forward, leaning her head on a table, seemed under the influence of a kind of stupor. She neither looked up nor spoke.

"Come, Bessie," said Edith, laying her hand on her shoulder, "this is wrong."

"I have promised," said Bessie, raising her head from the table and looking up.

Edith was startled at her extreme paleeness.

"Promised what?" she asked; for, not knowing that Withers had been there, she feared that her reason was forsaking her.

"That I will marry him."

"I don't understand your meaning, Bessie."

"I have promised to be the wife of Withers."

"You never told me that before."

"It is only half an hour since."

"I didn't know that he had been here. But did you reflect well on what you were doing?"

"Yes; I did it to save Wilton's life."

"I didn't suppose that his life was in danger."

"If he is arrested, it will be."

"I think Withers has deceived you."

"No; he made it appear all plain to me, and yet I am unable to tell you how he made it appear so."

"Didn't he explain to you how he could save his life?"

"He says that he can cause him to be conveyed to a place of safety, and has given me his promise that he will."

"Have you faith in his promise?"

"If he does not make it appear to me that he can place him beyond the reach of danger, I am to be released from mine."

"When is Wilton to be conveyed to this place of safety?"

"As soon as it can be accomplished after the ceremony is performed."

"I regret that you have done this."

"What could I do? He would promise to save him on no other condition."

"The sacrifice, I am afraid, will prove to be a vain one."

CHAPTER XXI.

VALUABLE INFORMATION.

THE rumor, mentioned by Edith to Bessie in the preceding chapter, that Wilton Richmond left the inn, early in the morning, where he stopped the night after leaving Burder's, was correct. He rose at an early hour, while the morning star was still shining brightly in the east, and finding that no one was yet stirring, strolled away among the distant hills, intending to return by the time the people belonging to the house had risen.

He had ascended one of the higher hills, whence, in the distance, could be seen a broad, green valley bounded on one side by a river.

"I've surely seen this valley before now," thought he, and looking in the direction of some tall oaks and chestnuts, he could see, gleaming through the foliage, portions of a large and ancient mansion. He knew, then, that he was not mistaken. It was the estate now in the possession of Withers, and as he fully believed, his own ancestral domain. "Yes—it is mine, I have no doubt, but how am I to prove that it belongs to me?" said he, unconsciously giving utterance to his thoughts.

"When the right time comes, proof may not be wanting," said a voice behind him.

He looked round, and beheld a woman he had never before seen.

"You speak as if you knew what I was thinking of," said he.

"The knowledge of no forbidden art is required to tell people's thoughts when they think loud," said she.

"Did I speak?"

"Certainly, otherwise I could not have known what was passing in your mind."

"I was not aware that I did, and even if I had been, I should hardly have expected any one to be within hearing."

"I am in pursuit of my cow. She strayed away last night—a thing I never knew her to do before. I was vexed when I found she was gone, but have now reason to be glad, as otherwise I should have missed seeing you."

"You speak as if you knew me, and yet I am certain that I never saw you before."

"You have many a time, but you were a wee thing then—too young to remember me, even if I had not changed from a handsome girl of seventeen to what you now see me."

"You must have seen me since then. How else could you recognize me?"

"Yes, I have."

"When and where?"

"Near a little bay which opens into Lake Champlain. Bessie Hamlen and two others were with you."

"I remember the time, but didn't see you."

"I was close by, and I heard them call you Wilton Richmond. If I hadn't, I should have known you by your looks. I must go now, for I see old Cloudy-face, and she may stray still farther."

"Wait one minute. Why did you speak as you did in answer to the words which unconsciously escaped me?"

"I will tell you if I can see you in my own home. It will soon be time for people to be abroad now, and it won't be best to excite curiosity."

"Where is your home?"

"Do you see the smoke curling upward from behind that piece of woods?"

"Yes."

"The smoke comes from the chimney of a small house where I live whenever it suits me."

Wilton had a strong desire to hear what she had to say, and as there was no absolute necessity for him to be at Mrs. Hamlen's, whither he was going, at precisely the hour he had named in his letters to Bessie and Edith (the latter was spending a few weeks with her aunt and cousin), he told her she might look for him in the course of half an hour.

When he arrived, she had just finished milking her cow.

"I have sat on this door-sill many a time," said she, as he entered the house, "and held you in my arms."

"You have lived here many years, then?"

"Yes, but I did not live here then. Old Elsie, as she is called, lived here, and I often called to see her, and when your nurse would let me, used to bring you with me."

"Who was my nurse?"

"Her name was Anstis Fay. We both of us lived in the large house the other side of the woods."

"Where a man by the name of Withers lives?"

"Yes; but your grandfather, Mr. Edgar Percival, was alive then, and Withers was his steward."

"Mr. Edgar Percival was my grandfather, then?"

"As truly as you are a living man."

"Are you the only one that knows it?"

"There are others who suspect, or I might rather say, are satisfied in their own minds who you are; but there are some circumstances unknown to any one except myself. Even Withers is ignorant of some of them, and they will go further towards proving your identity than any of the rest. As I have already said, when the right time comes, proof will not be wanting."

"As I am the person most interested, you surely don't intend to keep me in suspense. Having excited my curiosity, you should gratify it."

"It may be as well. I thought to defer it awhile, lest by the impatience natural to the young, you might mar the good fortune which I hope is in store for you. Life is uncertain, and I may not have another opportunity. There was one who knew as much as I do, but his lips now have that seal of silence on them which will ever remain unbroken."

"Who was it?"

"A bad man, though not so bad as his employer."

"And his employer was Withers?"

"Yes. There was another—old Elsie—who had some faint knowledge of what took place, but Withers browbeat and threatened her so, that if she had had any inclination to speak of it, she wouldn't have dared to. After her mind became disordered, she used occasionally to say something to me about it, but what little truth there was in what she told, was mixed up with a great many wild imaginations of her own. I was to have been married to Withers, but he broke his solemn troth-plight, which may be the means of restoring you to your rights, and of exposing his guilt, as you shall hear."

"It may seem strange to you—it does to me now,—but I liked him then, and when he said to me that if ever he married, it would be some one richer and higher than I was, his words fell on my heart like a heavy blow. After he left me, I went and sought a solitary place in the woods, for I thought I could neither bear to be seen nor see any one. The spot was just back of Elsie's cottage, and so walled in by trees and tangled vines that I was perfectly screened from view, though I could easily see what was passing without."

"I don't know how long I had been there, it might have been only a few minutes, or it might have been hours, when I heard footsteps coming along the path which led to Elsie's cottage. I knew those steps, though they were so soft as to be hardly audible. I looked through an opening among the leaves, and saw Withers as he turned the bend of the path which led directly to the door. The windows were open, and by creeping as near to the house as I could, still keeping beneath the shelter of the trees and vines, I could hear all that was said. He spoke to the old lady more pleasantly than usual, and told her that he wanted her to send for Anstis. He had previously taken her close to a window at the back part of the house, not more than a dozen feet from where I was concealed. This was to prevent the girl Elsie calling her granddaughter from hearing what he said."

"Anstis," said he, "is in the little glade at the entrance of the wood, where she goes every pleasant day with the child. He is asleep now, and as I've already said, you must send for her to come here."

"I don't suppose she will come, if I do," said Elsie.

"Tell the girl to say to her you are sick—dying, you are afraid."

"She dared not refuse to do as he bid her. She sent the girl, who was much frightened, for she really thought that she was taken suddenly ill, and might even be dying. I didn't wait for her to return, but by a path less direct than the one she had taken, hastened to the glade. I was just in time to see Withers enter it. Anstis had gone. I could hear the voices of her and the girl, as they hurried towards the cottage. The child still slept. Withers took him in his arms, and then crept along close to the edge of the woods till he reached the river. I had so managed as to keep within short distance of him, and when he stopped at the side of the river, I crept still nearer. He gave a low whistle, when a small boat shot out from beneath the shelter of an overhanging rock. There was no one in it, except a coarse-looking, ill-dressed man. Withers handed him the child, after taking off his little blue cap, and then tossed something into the boat."

"There's your reward," said Withers.

"How do I know but what you've cheated me?" said the man.

"Because you know I ain't a fool," replied Withers. "Don't forget that he is to be lost overboard. It mustn't be very near the shore, though, for I've heard it said a young one like him can swim like a duck."

"The man promised, and Withers turned away and plunged into the woods."

"While witnessing all this, I seemed to be under the influence of some horrible dream. Apparently, I had lost the power of volition, and a heavy weight seemed to be placed on my head, crushing me to the earth. When Withers was out of sight, I remember of thinking that I would go and tell Mr. Percival, the grandfather of the child, all that I had seen and heard. What happened to me afterward, I never fully knew. When I awoke from what I imagined had been a few hours' sleep, I was told that I had been dangerously ill of a brain fever for a long time."

"As the light of the past by degrees entered my mind, I recalled the incidents which I have now related to you. Subsequently, when it was thought safe to let me know the truth, I was told that for many months my reason was entirely gone. Much had taken place during the interval. Your grandfather had died, and given the whole of his property to Withers, unconditionally, it was then said, though afterward this was found not to be true."

"And did you mention what you had seen to any one?"

"Yes, but those I told it to shook their heads and whispered to each other that my mind was not yet exactly right. I thought you were dead, and as I found that no one believed what I said, I let the matter rest. About two years after my health was restored, I fell in with a cousin of mine by the name of Hendrick Richmond. He had a child with him, who at once attracted my attention from his strong resemblance to the Percival family. I asked him many questions concerning the boy, in answer to which he told me that between two and three years previously, just as he was ready to start on a fishing voyage, a man came aboard the vessel with a child who appeared to be two or three years old, whom he pretended he found by the shore of the river. Nobody would own him, he said, and he begged Richmond to take him to sea with him. He didn't believe the man's story, but he thought he was no person to have the care of a child, and the boy was so handsome and appeared so well pleased when he took him on his knee and spoke kindly to him, that he told the man he might leave him."

"I didn't tell my cousin that I believed I knew who the boy was, for then, as I thought that you could hold none of the property Mr. Percival had left, I supposed you would be better off to remain with him. I feared, too, that your life might not be safe, if Withers found that his evil intentions towards you had been frustrated. But the time has now come when you can vindicate your own rights. Whenever you need it, the testimony of the man employed by Withers to put you out of the way, may be had. It was written by a man procured for the purpose, at his earnest request, and signed by him a few hours before he died. Christina Hurman was present, and witnessed it. It is now in her possession. What more it may be necessary for you to learn, that will show."

"And to whom am I indebted for this valuable information?" said Wilton.

"My name is Margaret Rustan."

"And he, whom till within a short time since I supposed to be my father, was your cousin?"

"Yes; his mother and mine were sisters."

Wilton rose to take leave, but as she had busied herself in preparing breakfast while relating her story, she now so earnestly invited him to stay and partake of it, that he could not well refuse."

As he had, the evening previous, in expectation of leaving before breakfast, paid his bill at the tavern, he decided not to wait for the afternoon coach, but to proceed on foot as far as the residence of an old college friend. He, therefore, wrote a note to the landlord, which Margaret said she should have opportunity to send, in the course of the day, requesting him to forward his baggage."

On reaching the residence of his friend, he found him preparing for a journey on horseback, and as Wilton's route lay in the same direction as his, he offered to furnish him with a horse for the sake of his company. Thus, by a series of unforeseen incidents, he was prevented from continuing his journey by the public conveyance, as he had expected, though subsequently, when those circumstances transpired, relative to the disposition of the money confided to his care, a very different reason was naturally assigned for his changing his mode of travel."

CHAPTER XXII.

TWO PERSONS TROUBLESOME TO WITHERS DISPOSED OF.

MAXON did not meet Withers according to agreement, to deliver to him the papers he had received from Wilton. When he found that Withers had intended to deceive him, the anger attending this discovery made him determine to appropriate at least one of the fifty dollar notes to his own use, in a way most gratifying to his tastes. For this purpose, he made the best of his way to a little hostelry, where he was pretty sure to meet some of his boon companions."

Though, to appearance, it was the same as other second class wayside inns, Maxon knew that, besides the little bar-room with its sanded floor, there was a comparatively large, and in his opinion, splendidly furnished apartment, where he could indulge in the excitement of the gaming-table, and in the choice wines and brandy provided by the host, who could change him a fifty or even a hundred dollar note, and would ask no questions. Withers, he knew, would not dare to openly call him to account, as it would implicate himself. He could not see that there was much danger of detection, and there probably would not have been, had not Mr. Ritson placed private marks on the bills. When Withers first became aware that Maxon had made free with some of the money, he was much alarmed, till he found that, as yet, the suspicion of Mr. Ritson was excited against no one except Wilton Richmond."

"This Richmond has done me one or two shrewd turns," said Withers, when speaking to Mr. Ritson on the subject, "and if you will leave this matter to me, I will engage that every dollar of the money shall be refunded. When this is accomplished, you can proceed against the culprit as you think honor and justice demand, but at present you will see the necessity of keeping the matter close, or he will steal a march on us, and find safe quarters in the British camp."

This and more was said in such a plausible way, Mr. Ritson was persuaded that the best thing he could do was to remain quiet, as Withers recommended. He also undertook to caution Mr. Mercer against spreading the affair abroad, lest Wilton, as Withers had said, should take alarm and steal a march upon them."

When Withers left Bessie Hamlen, it was with the determination to give himself no rest till he had found Maxon. Until he did find him, he felt that his situation was little better than that of Damocles, when sitting at the feast with a sword suspended above him by a single hair. He did not dare make any inquiries for him, but he knew him well enough to be tolerably well convinced that the temptation to return to his favorite haunt would be too strong to be long resisted. After a little reflection, he decided to go directly thither, and if he did not find him, to make an arrangement with the landlord to send him word the moment he came."

The inn was situated on a lonely, unfrequented road, no habitation of any description being nearer than half a dozen miles. He was still full four miles distant, when he saw, a little ahead of him, a man, who, like himself, was travelling on horseback. It was beginning to be quite dusk, so that he could not see him distinctly, though there was something in his general appearance which made him think it must be Maxon. He quickened his pace, and in a few minutes overtook him."

"Well, sir, I've found you at last," said he, riding up close to his side."

"And you'd have found me before, I reckon, if you'd happened to come where I was."

"I went where you promised to be. How did you dare to deceive me?"

"I think I can ask you the same question and with a better grace. By what you told me, I believed I was to receive from Wilton Richmond nothing more nor less than a roll of papers, not worth a red cent to any one but the owner, and if Captain Richmond had been as mean and underhanded as you are, I shouldn't have known to the contrary, but he knew what was due from one gentleman to another."

"We will discuss that question some other time, if you please. What I wish to know now is, how much you have spent of what you received from him."

"A mere trifle: five hundred dollars, lacking a few odd shillings, in the whole."

"And you have the rest with you?"

"Every dollar of it, safe as a thief in a mill."

"You may just hand it over to me now, if you please."

"And supposing I don't please?"

"Now, Maxon, what is the use in supposing any such thing? You know if you should keep it, you would be no better off at the year's end."

"There you are mistaken, for I should have had my money's worth in good cheer. But I'll tell you what I'll do; I'll go halves with you."

"Come, no more of this foolery; this is neither the time nor the place for it."

"For my part, I was never more in earnest in my life. I've as good a right to the money as you have, and better, too, as to that matter, for the risk in getting it all fell on me. My offer is a fair one, and you may accept it or not, just as you please."

"But don't you see that the whole affair will come to light, if the money isn't forthcoming?"

"Well, if it does, I shall stand as good a chance as you, I reckon, and a little better."

"But I am not going to keep the money; I shall restore it."

"That would be bright."

"You supposed that it was for the sake of the money that I engaged in this business?"

"Why, at first, I supposed it to be a little petty piece of malice against Richmond or Mercer, but when I found what a large sum of money you expected to get into your hands, I changed my mind."

"Do you know what the consequences will be, if you persist in keeping the money?"

"Yes; I shall have the pleasure of spending it."

"Can I say nothing that will persuade you? Are you determined not to listen to reason?"

"Listen to reason yourself. I have got four thousand five hundred dollars sewed up in this neckerchief."

"Which will soon be exchanged for a hempen collar, if you go on in this reckless way."

"I'll give you one half of it, and when we get to Crawson's, I'll stake my half against yours, and play any game you choose."

"I am no gamster, and besides, to be seen at Crawson's would be staking my reputation as well as the money."

"If the reputation was mine, I shouldn't consider it worth the snap of my finger."

"You won't give me the money?"

"Not on any other condition than the one I've named."

"I bid you a good-evening, then."

"But now that you are within two miles of Crawson's, you surely won't turn back? I bear no malice against you, Withers, if you do refuse my offer, and if you'll go and spend a few hours there, you shall have the privilege of drinking as much wine as you please, and at my expense."

"I want none of your wine," he replied; and as he spoke, he wheeled round his horse towards the opposite direction."

"I'll go slowly," said Maxon, "so if you change your mind, you can soon overtake me. But go or come, remember I lay up no malice against you. I never hoard malice nor money."

As he finished speaking, Withers again turned his horse in the direction of Crawson's, with a loaded pistol ready in his hand. Maxon, as he had promised, was proceeding slowly."

"The fool has forced me to this!" muttered Withers, between his shut teeth, as he raised his pistol and took deliberate aim at the unsuspecting man's head."

Maxon's horse, frightened at the report of the pistol, plunged madly forward, while his rider, after reeling a moment in the saddle, fell, though with a convulsive grasp he still retained his hold of the bridle. Withers, who, the instant he fired the pistol, dismounted, ready to secure the money, stood watching, expecting every moment to see him released. But this did not seem likely to happen as soon as he had anticipated, and remounting his horse, he determined, as long as he considered it safe to do so, to follow in the wake of the terrified animal. But still, through the deepening shadows of twilight, he could see by the light-colored clothing of his victim that he was still dragged along by the side of his horse. A glimpse of Crawson's tavern, though still half a mile distant, could now be seen through the trees. He dared go no further. Already, as he feared, he had ventured too far. He stopped his horse and peered uneasily around through the thickening gloom, half expecting to see some one start up from behind a rock or bush, and accuse him of the crime he had just committed. But he neither saw nor heard anything. The hush of evening had fallen on all around, unbroken save by the clattering hoofs of the flying steed, already growing faint in the distance. It was only for a moment that he stopped, and then turning, he urged his horse to the top of his speed, till he came to a cross-road which led to the more frequented highway.

Meanwhile, Maxon's horse dashed wildly on till he arrived at Clawson's, where, giving a plunge towards the stable-door, he stopped short, quivering in every limb. The landlord and several others stood watching in front of the inn, for they knew, while the horse was yet at some distance, that no animal under the control of bit and bridle, would rush onward at such headlong speed.

The next moment, a traveller on horseback arrived from the opposite direction, who, springing to the ground, joined Clawson and the others, who were already gathered round the terrified and panting steed standing at the stable-door.

"It is Rube Maxon's horse," said the hostler. "I can see well enough to tell that, if it is getting dark."

"And this is Maxon himself, I believe," said Clawson, who, turning to a stable boy, ordered him to bring a light.

"There's one already here," said a man, who had reached in at an open window and taken a lamp from a table that stood near.

"Yes—it is Maxon," said the landlord, taking the light and holding it so as to fall on the ghastly face. "His horse must have thrown him, and he supposed that by holding on to the bridle he could succeed in stopping him."

The traveller just arrived, who was no other than Mr. Ritson, bent down and with some difficulty released the bridle from the grasp of the hand, already beginning to be cold and rigid. It was not till he had been carried into the house that it was found he was shot through the head.

"Whoever did this meant to rifle his pockets," said Clawson, "but I reckon they wouldn't 'ave found much of anything," he quickly added.

A coroner's inquest was held, Mr. Ritson and others, who had, in passing, been attracted by the stir and bustle, composing the jury. During such examination as was necessary to enable them to render a correct verdict, the forged letter and the receipt signed "John Smith" was found in one of his pockets, together with a purse containing a few shillings in silver and copper coin.

"There must be more money than this somewhere about his person," said Mr. Ritson, after examining the letter and receipt.

Diligent search was therefore made, and four thousand five hundred dollars, as Maxon had told Withers, were found sewed in his neckerchief, which was readily identified by Mr. Ritson, as the same he had confided to the care of Wilton Richmond. This, in Mr. Ritson's mind, fully exonerated Wilton from the foul charge which Withers, without appearing to do so, had labored to fasten upon him.

This malicious scheme of Withers had now arrived at that point where all might be lost by a few minutes' delay; and though burdened with the guilt of his recent crime, he hastened to seek the commander (General Cockburn) of the powerful squadron in Chesapeake Bay. In two hours he was in the cabin with him, "whose name will ever be considered a stain among the officers of his country." The two had already met several times.

"How do you prosper, Withers?" asked he, when they were left by themselves.

"I've had ill-luck, and a plenty of it."

"This Captain Richmond you spoke to me about—what of him?"

"He must be aboard one of your vessels before morning, or all my labor will prove to have been worse than in vain."

"It isn't my fault that he wasn't aboard one of 'em a week ago."

"Stratagem must be resorted to; there's no other way."

"Well, you may plan, and I will see that you have the means to put your plans into execution. But first, you may as well put your name to this bond."

"The sum you demand is a heavy one."

"Nothing more than a fair percentage on what your estate is valued at, which is much better for you than for the heir to step in and claim the whole. You know where he is to be found, I suppose."

"Yes; so far I am fortunate. He isn't over two or three miles from here."

"Isn't there some way to entice him to the shore near here—to meet some friend, for instance? If that can be accomplished, a boat and two or three stout men will be all that's necessary to place him in such snug quarters that he won't be likely to be in your way again very soon. How long will it take to get him here?"

"It might be done in two hours, or less, if he should prove to be manageable."

"Two or four will make no difference, if it can only be done under cover of night. Here's the bond I spoke of. You may not have another so good a chance to sign it. It can do you no harm, you know, for I can claim nothing unless I come up to my part of the agreement."

"I'm aware of that."

"Why, Withers, how pale you are! I didn't notice it till you came forward into the light. And your hand shakes like an aspen. What has happened?"

"Nothing—but I don't feel quite well. I'm fatigued, and haven't slept well for two or three nights."

Something like an hour after this colloquy, Wilton Richmond was roused from a sound sleep by a loud knocking at the outer door of the house where, as Withers had previously ascertained, he intended to spend the night. Wilton raised the sash and inquired who was there.

"A messenger from Mr. Grosvenor to Captain Richmond," was the reply.

"You may deliver the message to me, then. My name is Richmond."

"Mr. Grosvenor has met with an accident, and wishes you to come to him. He is about two miles below here."

"What accident has he met with?"

"I haven't heard the particulars, but he was thrown from a carriage. There was a lady with him, but she was not injured."

Wilton knew that Mrs. Hamlen had taken the opportunity to go some distance from home, where her presence was required on account of some business connected with her late husband's affairs, while Mr. Grosvenor and his daughter were at her house, that she might have the benefit of his protection and counsel. Hence the answer to his question was considered satisfactory, and without any unnecessary delay, he prepared to accompany the messenger. The distance being short, he thought he should probably be able to return early in the morning, and finding that no one except himself appeared to have been disturbed, he left the house with as little noise as possible. Finding a horse had been sent for him, he suffered his own to remain in the stable. They had proceeded about two miles, when the man with him reined in his horse.

"We must leave our horses here," said he, "and cross this creek."

"Why?" demanded Wilton.

"Because, to follow the windings of the shore, we should be obliged to go half a dozen miles, while it will take only a few minutes to clip across this narrow creek."

Wilton could discern a house on the opposite shore, from one of the windows of which shone a light, and concluded that it was there he should find Mr. Grosvenor. Without saying anything more, he stepped into the boat, in which were two men, who were, as he was told, to convey him across. The messenger followed him, first telling a boy who stood near to take care of the horses.

Not a word was said, and the men commenced pulling hard at the oars. Wilton, suspicious of any fraud, leaned his head on his hand, and gave himself up to his own thoughts. Suddenly it occurred to him that they must have nearly reached the opposite shore. He looked up, and found that they had struck out into the broad waters of the bay, and were already alongside of a vessel belonging to the British flotilla.

"What's the meaning of this?" he inquired, starting to his feet.

"You'll have plenty of time before morning to find that out," was the gruff reply.

Something like the truth flashed upon his mind, but he knew that to remonstrate would be alike foolish and futile. Bitterly upbraiding himself with his carelessness, as well as credulity—for he had neglected even to take his pistols with him,—he submitted to his fate, and stepped aboard the vessel.

The following morning, there was a story afloat, which, before evening, was known far and wide, that Wilton Richmond, after shooting a man by the name of Maxon through the head, who undoubtedly had been his accomplice in an affair relative to the embezzlement of certain funds belonging to government, had, as was supposed, sought safety among the enemy, a person answering to his description having been seen, as it was said, riding at furious speed, late in the evening, in the direction of the British camp.

The intelligence carried sorrow and dismay into the abode of Mrs. Hamlen, and revived in full force those doubts of his integrity and patriotism entertained by herself, Mr. Grosvenor and Edith. Bessie alone refused to believe anything which could criminate him, though this did not detract from her anxiety for his safety. In another piece of intelligence received shortly afterward, there was comfort. Withers was so unwell as to be confined to his room, and Bessie was, therefore, for the present relieved from the hourly apprehension of being molested by him.

It had been decided that Edith should remain with her aunt and cousin the remainder of autumn, if not the coming winter; for now that a large naval force was on Lake Champlain, her father, who was obliged to be absent much of the time, did not think it prudent for her to return home in its immediate vicinity.

A number of weeks after Wilton Richmond disappeared, Hammett sought an interview with Bessie. He had, he informed her, just parted with Harefoot, the young Indian, who told him that Captain Richmond was not at the British camp, as had been reported, but that he had by stratagem been conveyed aboard one of the vessels of the British flotilla in Chesapeake Bay, and that he was on the lookout for an opportunity to escape, which, he thought, he should before long be able to effect. This was all that Hammett had learned, yet it was enough to lighten the burden of anxiety and suspense, which had so long weighed down her spirits.

THE TWINKLING OF THE STARS.

According to M. Arago, astronomers and others have failed to arrive at a satisfactory explanation of the twinkling of stars on account of their failure to give an exact definition of the term scintillation. He affirms then, that, in so far as naked-eye observers of the heavens are concerned, scintillation, or twinkling, consists in very rapid fluctuations in the brightness of the stars. These changes are almost always accompanied by variations of color and certain secondary effects, which are the immediate consequences of every increase or diminution of brightness; such as considerable alterations in the apparent magnitude of the stars, and in the length of the diverging rays, which appear to issue in different directions from their centres. It has been remarked from a very early age that the phenomenon of twinkling is accompanied by a change of color. It is asserted that the name of Barakech, given by the Arabians to the star Sirius, signifies the star of a thousand colors. M. Arago also asserts that the planets twinkle.

MARTIN LUTHER.

A coarse, rugged, plebeian face it was, with great crags of cheek bones—a wild amount of passionate energy and appetite! But in his dark eyes were floods of sorrow, and deepest melancholy, sweetness and mystery were all there. And often did they seem to meet in Luther the very opposite poles in a man's character. He, for example, of whom Richter had said that his words were half battles, he, when he first began to preach, suffered unheard of agony.

"O, Dr. Staupitz," said he, to the vicar-general of his order, "I cannot do it. I shall die in three months. Indeed, I cannot do it."

Dr. Staupitz, a wise and considerate man, said, upon this: "Well, Sir Martin, if you must die, you must; but remember that they need good heads up yonder, too. So preach, man, preach, and then live or die, as it happens."

So Luther preached, and lived, and he became, indeed, one great whirlwind of energy, to work without resting in this world; and also before he died, he wrote very many books—books in which the true man was—for in the midst of all they denounced and cursed, what touches of tenderness lay! Look at the table-talk, for example. We see in it a little bird, having alighted at sunset on a bough of a tree that grew in Luther's garden.

Luther looked up at it and said: "That little bird, how it cowers down its wings, sleeps there so still and fearless, though over it are the infinite starry spaces, and the great, blue depths of immensity! Yet it fears not—it is at home. The God that made it too is there!" The same gentle spirit of lyrical admiration is in other passages of his books. Coming home from Leipsic in the autumn season, he breaks forth in living wonder at the fields of corn. "How it stands there," he says, "erect on its beautiful taper stem, and heading its beautiful golden head in it—the bread of man sent to him yet another year!" Such thoughts as these are as little windows, through which we gaze into the interior of the serene depths of Martin Luther's soul, and see visible, across its tempests and clouds, a whole heaven of light and love. He might have painted, he might have sung—could have been beautiful like Raphael, great like Michael Angelo. As it was, the streams of energy and modesty met in his active spirit. Perhaps, indeed, in all men of his genius, one quality strongly developed might force out other qualities. Here was Luther a savage kind of a man, as people thought him—a wild Orson of a man—a man whose speech was ordinarily a wild torrent that went tearing down rocks and trees—and behold him speaking like a woman or child!—Records of the Great.

THE BITER BIT.

After the restoration in 1814, among the titled followers of Napoleon, who were the most anxious to obtain employment at the court of Louis XVIII., none showed more servility and assiduity to accomplish his purpose than Fouché, Duc d'Oranste. He at last had a private interview with the king, when he expressed his desire to dedicate his life to his service. Louis replied: "You have occupied under Bonaparte a situation of great trust, which must have given you opportunities of knowing everything that passed, and of gaining an insight into the characters of men in public life, which could not easily occur to others. Were I to decide on attaching you to my person, I should previously expect that you would frankly inform me what were the measures, and who were the men, that you employed in those days to obtain your information. I do not allude to my stay at Verona, or at Mantua; I was then surrounded by numerous adherents; but at Hartwell, for instance,—were you then well acquainted with what passed under my roof?" "Yes, sir; every day the motions of your majesty were made known to me." "Eh, what!—surrounded as I was by trusted friends, who could have betrayed me? Who thus abused my confidence? I insist on your naming him immediately." "Sir, you urge me to say what must wound your majesty's heart." "Speak, sir; kings are but too subject to be deceived." "If you command it, sir, I must own that I was in correspondence with the Duc d'Angoulême." "What! De Pienne, who possessed my entire confidence? I must acknowledge," added the king, with a malicious smile, "he was very poor; he had many expenses, and living is very dear in England. Well, then, M. Fouché, it was I that dictated to him those letters which you received every week; and I gave up to him twelve thousand out of the eighteen thousand francs which you so regularly remitted to obtain an exact account of all that was passing in my family.—Hulifax News.

DUTCH CUSTOMS.

In Broeck, no one enters a house by the front door, nor is any one seen at the front window. The front of the house is where the best "parlors" are, which are sacred to cleanliness and solitude. Irving's description of such an apartment is rigidly true—"The mistress and her confidential maid visit it once a week, for the purpose of giving it a thorough cleaning and putting things to rights, always taking the precaution of leaving their shoes at the door, and entering devoutly on their stocking feet. After scrubbing the floor, sprinkling the floor with fine white sand, which was curiously stroked into angles, and curves, and rhomboids; after washing the windows, rubbing and polishing the furniture, and putting a new bunch of evergreens in the fireplace, the window shutters were again closed to keep out the flies, and the room carefully locked up till the revolution of time brought round the weekly cleaning day." The people of Broeck always enter their houses by back doors, like so many burglars; and to insure the front door from unholy approach, the steps leading to it are removed, never to be placed there but when three great occasions open the mystic gate, and these are births, marriages and funerals; so that to enter a Dutchman's house by that way is indeed an "event."—Art Journal.

STORM OF AN ENGLISH CASTLE.

The large illustration on the next page depicts one of those sanguinary episodes in the civil war of England in the 17th century. A party of Puritans, or "Roundheads," as they were termed by their adversaries, are rushing to the assault of a castle held out by the cavaliers against the Commonwealth. No siege artillery is on the ground, and the adventure is a desperate one, to be decided by endurance and valor. From the battlements and from the loopholes of the strong towers, a close fire of musketry is raining down bullets on the steel head-pieces and iron corselets of the assailants, while huge rocks are precipitated from above, falling with crushing weight. Many of the besiegers have already fallen; but still they press onward with indomitable valor. They have planted their ladders against the curtain flanked by the square towers on the right, and appear determined to make good their way into the interior of the fortress. Once there, those terrible swords, wielded by iron hands, will sweep away opposition, and the flag of the Commonwealth usurp the place of the royal banner of England on the "outer wall." The desperation of battle is well depicted in the thronging figures of this startling scene. The wars of the Commonwealth in England, like all civil wars, were excessively sanguinary and productive of great domestic misery, yet still not disgraced by atrocity, like the civil wars of France.

DREAM-THOUGHTS OF KATIE.

BY BLANCHE D'ARNOISE.

Tricky, gladsome little sprite—
Laughing wild to sheer delight—
Dancing ever, morn till night—
Dainty little fairy!
Clinging curls of golden brown
Circling round thee—nature's crown—
Lips so rosy—eyes so brown—
Long may thou be merry!

Eye so sparkling, bright and gay,
Scintillating liquid ray;
Even in thy tricky play
Genius is out-beaming;
And I start, and thrill, and sigh,
At the gleaming of thine eye;
Silently I seat me by,
Of the future dreaming.

Glance I at my life of old,
Ere my heart was grown so cold;
Ere the sorry tale was told—
Life is sad and weary;
Was I once so like thee, child?
Joyous? gleesome? glad and wild?
Smiling back as fancy smiled—
Like thee—little Katie?

Life was lesson hard to me—
I would make it light for thee;
I would rather have thee be
A true, loving woman,
Than aspire to visions high—
Feed the lamp and burn it dry—
Make the spirit mount the sky—
Scorning all that's human;

So I hid thee—fly the lyre!
Tough it not—it burns like fire—
Making life a funeral pyre—
And we're not long merry.
Surely—as they fly the bowl—
Fly the lyre! it drains the soul;
Quick enough thou'lt win the goal,
Dainty little fairy!

THE MAGICIAN'S DOOM.

BY GIDDINGS H. BALLOU.

It was about the time of the feast of the Grand Lama, when Guiscard, the young French traveller, made his entrance into the city of Belkar in Western Tartary. Turning aside into a by-street to avoid the crowd of comers, he was beset by two Chinese rascals, whose loud invitations to the "world-renowned ian of Taledh," as they termed it, he quickly disappointed by taking refuge in an ancient but respectable looking hotel which stood near at hand. Its master, grave and portly, and wearing a turban on his head, met him in the middle of the great apartment which served the fourfold purpose of kitchen, dining-hall, reception-room and sleeping apartment.

"Welcome, hadji," said the host. "Wilt thou place thyself on the derven till the repast is ready?"

The derven, as it is termed in Western Tartary, is a raised platform of stone or brick, lying back of, and somewhat elevated above the ovens. Here the better sort of the inn's guests sleep, eat and drink, or amuse themselves by smoking or conversation. On this platform was soon placed a repast of beef, goat's flesh and curds, with soft butter and other accompaniments, served in platters of coarse, white earthen. As the guests attacked it with their fingers, helped by spoons of mixed metal, they kept up among themselves a running discourse, partly jocose, partly serious, of which Guiscard heard but now and then a word, till the raised voice of a greybeard Tartar overtopped the rest.

"O, Hassan," he said, "beware lest Azef himself come to a hearing of thy slander. Surely thou art aware that he is able, if he will, to return thee to the shape which was thine before a human form was bestowed upon thee. Alas, if the magician overheard thee, thou wilt immediately become an ape once more!"

Guiscard's attention was fully aroused by the name of Azef, whose reputation as a performer of magic feats had already excited his curiosity. In answer to his inquiries, an old Bukharian merchant informed him that the sorcerer was in the city, and that he was presently expected at that very inn. Busying himself with the various humors of the guests, Guiscard awaited the arrival. A half hour had thus passed away, when one of the servants rushed in, exclaiming in a low voice:

"El Azef, El Azef!"

There now entered a man rather past the middle age, of clear, tawny complexion, and features that would have been pleasing had it not been for the expression of a pair of small, glittering eyes which gave to the whole countenance a sinister intelligence. The magician had two companions, or assistants; the one a female, veiled, and clad in loose drapery; the other a young and good looking lad. The latter bore in his arms a small chest or box, curiously inlaid with pearl and metallic ornaments. The magician and the girl, or woman, whichever she might be, also bore some small articles in their hands. Without a word of preparation, the wizard formed a circle on the inn floor whose curve encompassed himself and his attendants. Placing a brazen vase in the centre, he lighted a lamp which was held in the lower portion or pedestal. The box was taken from the arms of the boy, and being opened, was seen to contain a small mirror and several strangely formed implements, of which only one or two were selected for present use. A smoke began to ascend from the vase, and a sharp pungent odor diffused itself through the apartment.

"You were in error," said the sorcerer, now for the first time speaking, and turning toward the host. "You supposed me to be a juggler or acromancer of the common order, only unusually skilled and expert. You were in error. Neither am I wont to go to inns and the houses of strangers, to display for money the secrets of nature. But fear not; I have answered your summons in order that I may convince a profane disbeliever who has never witnessed and is therefore incredulous concerning the wisdom which is revealed to the sages of India."

Guiscard was startled at encountering at this instant the penetrating glance of the wonder-worker, but immediately composed himself to observe what might follow.

"I have power," continued the sorcerer, "to present to whomsoever I will the secrets of his past life. Is there any one here who chooses to put my assertion to the proof?"

Guiscard was amused by the awe which suddenly seized the company. Each seemed desirous that one of his companions should test the assertion of the juggler, but none were quite willing to accept the offer in person. At last, however, a sprightly young fellow stepped forth.

"Here I am, father Azef," he cried; "and now for your promise."

Azef turned to the female figure which stood by his side.

"Chant me the mystic chant of Hieros."

Some strange words, sung in a low, musical voice, followed the command thus given. The smoke ascended higher and higher.

"Place thyself close to the edge of the circle," said the magician; "but beware how thou attemptest to cross it. Gaze fixedly toward the centre of the vapor, and thou shalt soon behold that which thou desirest."

The young man obeyed his directions in silence. Placing himself at the outer edge of the circle, he gazed intently towards its centre. In a moment after his face lighted up with a smile. Then he uttered a rapturous exclamation, stretched forth his arms, and threw himself forward into the forbidden area. An immediate and deafening explosion ensued. The hall was filled with turbid vapor.

"Mash Allah!" exclaimed the frightened inn-keeper, as soon as he had partially regained his senses. "In the name of the prophet, why comest thou hither with magic arts which are to destroy us all?"

"Hut!" replied the sorcerer, in a stern voice. "It is not I who am to blame, but this foolish youth, who chose to despise my caution. Let him rejoice that he has not suffered more harm from his ignorant intrusion. Bathe his face with water, and presently he will be as usual. And now if any other desire to make trial of my art, let him first promise to obey the directions which I have given."

Although the young Tartar quickly recovered from the swoon into which he had fallen, nevertheless, the spirits of the company were somewhat dampened. Silence was, for the time being, the only reply. The magician looked around with a smile, half of triumph, half of contempt, and was about to remove the brazen vase, when Guiscard leaped from the derven, and came towards the circle.

"Hold!" said the Frank. "I wish to try the power of thy magic."

"Dost thou promise to follow the conditions?" inquired the juggler, regarding him with a look of fire.

"I do," replied the traveller, placing himself in the required position.

"Your wishes lead you to a scene of your childhood. Behold!"

Guiscard was astounded, even while striving to regard the vision before him as an illusion of the imagination. Amid the light-blue vapor he saw, as it were, a picture filled with moving figures. It was the household field of the good pastor of Marien, in his own native valley of the Loire. The village youth, just let loose from Father Guillaume's school-room, were bounding along in joyous glee. The gazier distinguished the well-known features of his schoolmates, and even his boyish self; and, more vividly than all the rest, one childish face, whose lineaments remained imprinted on his memory, hallowed by the sadness of early bereavement. Guiscard stood spell-bound, while the vision faded away into the surrounding vapor.

"Desirest thou another scene?" asked the magician.

"I wish no more," answered the traveller, sadly. "I will own that thou possessest an influence over the minds of others which I cannot at present comprehend. But that thou or any other man hath power over things superhuman, I believe not."

"Sayest thou thus?" exclaimed Azef, with a look of indignation. "Thou wilt then be obliged to disbelieve the evidence of thy own senses. Thou disbelievest? Come, then, to my own abode; where, if thou choicest, thou canst be fully convinced. But I cannot remain here longer. There are those who at this moment await my return with impatience."

At the time when the events of our story had action, the boundaries between philosophic truth and superstitious fantasy were even more uncertain than at the present time. To the mind of an ardent and enthusiastic seeker after knowledge, there were many fields of bewildering inquiry. Guiscard had now entered on one of these. He had heretofore listened with an incredulous interest to stories of the wonderful feats of the eastern jugglers. But in Azef he now met, not merely a skill altogether incomprehensible, but a mind and a grasp of intellect which he had scarcely known in the most favored societies of Europe. Since the opening scene of our narrative, the young Frank had been for a fortnight an intimate in the mansion of this eastern magus. At the close of that period he had become, as it were, almost completely fascinated by the learning, the eloquent discourse and the artful sophistry of Azef. And truly the latter had exerted every power of sensible and intellectual novelty to bewilder his intended convert and bring him into submission to the mastery which he desired to exert over him. And now, having conceived that the mind of his pupil was ripening for further action, this master of magic began to hie at the rise of a mighty realm in the East, the initiation of which was soon to take place. He darkly indicated the fact that he was the agent of a vast conspiracy which was daily gathering strength and growing to its completion. He compared the fertile plains of Cashmere with the jaded lands of the West, oppressed by a race of tyrants whose dominion was too firmly fixed to admit of revolution. He commended to his hearer the smart and agile natives of the border mountains. Brave and faithful of purpose, they wanted only the proper leaders to accomplish the foundation of a powerful nation. The tendency of events was such, that to those who willed it, there would soon offer an opportunity of gaining fortune and honor.

Thus the wily Azef plied the young Frank with varied allurements. Curiosity, intellectual thirst and ambitious desire were in turn aroused to exertion. And it needed only that Guiscard should behold Erenthe, the beautiful pupil of Azef, to awake a passion stronger than all the rest. By such attractions as these, was the youth bound a willing captive in the toils of the magician. Yet not altogether so, since Guiscard's glance never met the small snaky orbs of the master without an innate feeling of repulsion. Sometimes, too, there were words of doctrine uttered, at which even the blunted perception of the student recoiled indignant. Still, these undertones of discord were sedulously suppressed. A glimpse of the queenly figure of Erenthe was sufficient to dispel the lingering doubt which for a moment might assert itself. "For how," said he to himself, "could such purity and loveliness be found associated with evil influences?"

It was on a night when the magician had exerted more than usual fascination over Guiscard, that the latter retired at a late hour to his chamber. Music and converse had wielded unwonted power; and wearied with the play of various emotions, he threw himself at once on his couch, and gave himself up to a dreamy reverie. He had already sunk into unconsciousness, when a rude touch recalled him to himself. Opening his eyes, he saw imperfectly, through the glare of the lamp, the dark, high-cheeked features of a Tartar gipsy. At this moment of astonishment, a soft voice, scarce above a whisper, fell on his ear.

"I am Erenthe. Rise and follow me. Make no noise. Take your valuables, but delay not a moment unnecessarily."

Surprised at this command, but without an instant of hesitation, Guiscard obeyed. Through secret passages and a corridor, damp with mouldering decay, Erenthe, just visible in the dim light which hovered in the unhealthy atmosphere, moved onward in advance of her companions, till all three at length emerged in the open air.

"You wish to know the reason of my conduct," exclaimed Erenthe, suddenly pausing, and turning towards Guiscard. "You shall be satisfied. I was, but the other day, your fellow-pupil and your fellow-dupe. I am no longer. This so called magician veils the basest designs under the garb of the noblest offices. To me the veil has fallen forever. He is a daring and skilful villain. I have sought to warn you, and it may be, rescue you from the net which he is drawing about you. If you mistrust me, return. Make your decision at once, for there is no time to be lost."

"It is made," replied Guiscard, quickly; "if you will but allow me to follow you."

"The path lies before us," answered Erenthe.

Without other word, they proceeded on their way, sheltered by the shadow of neighboring walls. The chance gleams of moonlight occasionally tonching the face of Erenthe, displayed features faultlessly regular, of a noble and even somewhat haughty expression. Soon they gained the open country, and, striking across the plain to a distant wood, entered within its shadowy depths. Presently the gipsy companion of Erenthe uttered a sharp, hissing sound, which was immediately answered in like fashion. Then Guiscard was led to an open space, or lawn, encircled by evergreen and oak, in which stood an assemblage of tents and hastily crected huts. In and about these moved forms of motley shape and costume. Guiscard saw before him a gipsy camp.

"Behold the people whereof I am a princess royal!"

Guiscard looked at the fair speaker with a puzzled air; but the pleasant smile which lingered on her lips re-assured him.

"You are pleased to jest," said he. "Were it not so, I should congratulate the tribe on the genius and beauty which in some degree presides over them."

"There was more seriousness in my words than you suspect," returned his guide. "These are indeed my people, with whom my lot is cast, and of whom I am the rightful superior; as I also am of all the gipsies (as you call them) at present sojourning in Western Tartary. And though regarded, by the world at large, with such undistinguishing scorn, yet there are some among us who have received a knowledge which should rather be prized than jeered at by those who are thus deeply prejudiced against our unfortunate race. My father left me not wholly uneducated. Eager for improvement, I sought to avail myself of the teachings of Azef, renowned through the whole East as a master of the mysteries of nature and art. I deny not his learning nor his ability. It is true that he possesses these; but, unsuspecting as I was at first of his true character, I learned at last its real baseness. I deem myself indeed fortunate that I have escaped from his wiles unharned. Woe to the wretch over whom he may obtain his full and desired mastery. Body and mind alike are desolated by his pernicious seductions, his stimulating drugs, his poisonous perfumes. You he had pitched upon as one who might be fashioned into an efficient instrument of his ambitious purposes. I have warned you; and I must add that the more quickly you remove yourself from his neighborhood the better will be your security. His influence is secretly and widely diffused; and you can scarcely be said in any case to be safe from the pursuit which he will surely contrive against you, as well as against myself. On the highway you would be at his mercy. If you choose, I can send forthwith to your inn, and remove hither such packages as you may have there; that done, I can make your passage from hence comparatively safe."

Guiscard's countenance betrayed a momentary embarrassment, and the pride of his companion took instant alarm at his hesitation.

"Nay," she added; "on second thought it were better otherwise. Yonder is Hamed, who may accompany you to the inn, and who shall guide you on the by-roads whithersoever you may choose. I will pledge my word for his trustiness, when commissioned by myself."

"You mistake my thoughts," replied Guiscard, feelingly, but with composure. "It is not readily, nor even to avoid danger, that I would wish to part from you forever. There is no better moment than this to tell you that I have already learned to regard you with an honest and true devotion. I would almost choose to give up all my aims in life, and become one of your own wandering subjects, rather than henceforth to be banished from your presence. Pardon my bold abruptness. I will say, Erethe, join your fortune with mine. Let us leave these scenes, and this people of yours who cannot, whatever may be their merit, truly appreciate one like yourself. In the far West I have a pleasant and an honorable home, Erethe; will you not make it yours as well as mine?"

"You indeed speak abruptly," answered his fair companion, with a countenance flushed and half averted, yet by no means displeased; "yet I distrust neither your honor nor your sincerity; nor will I deny that I have received your words with emotion. But while these people are true to me I must be true to them. Till contrary fate order it, a gipsy I am, and a gipsy I must remain; doing my poor best for those who have certainly, heretofore, regarded me with love and confidence. Nevertheless, frankly I say it, I cannot be displeased with what you have said; and let this finish the subject, for mark you, we approach the tents. Yonder, at the door of her canvass dwelling, sits Mother Berbie, who, I mistrust, would have no objection to assume in her own person, complete supremacy over the tribe. We shall meet her face to face, for a little way beyond lies the hut wherein you must need for the moment establish yourself."

Entering the gipsy hamlet, they came to the tent where Mother Berbie, a malicious-eyed, kilt-dried beldame, sat crouching at the doorway. Erethe gave her greeting, which was acknowledged by a sort of ungracious mumbling on the part of the old witch-woman, who moved scarce a single muscle as Guiscard and his companion passed by. As the latter moved forward, however, a stout young fellow, wearing a tunic striped with rather pretentious-looking colors, came forward from the back of Mother Berbie's tent, and stood by her side.

"Have no fear, grandson Milov," said the hag, "she shall be yours. Have I not cast my spell? As for this dog of a stranger, his broth shall be poison in his vitals. Do you hear, grandson Milov? Such a dinner as he shall make of it!"

"No, no!" replied the other; "I like not that way of managing it. It will bring ill luck, I tell you."

"You are a fool!" retorted Berbie, with a spiteful look. "You and your cronies think nothing of an old woman like myself. He! But you'll rue it, some fine day or other."

"Softly, good Mother Berbie. What is it that I have said? I meant no harm. Besides, you know young people must talk; no doubt you did the same, when you once stepped the fairest of all the Romany maids."

"He! he!" chuckled Berbie. "That's true. Not many now who are equal to what I once was. You shall have the girl, Milov; you shall have her, even though I should call in the aid of Azef himself, who pretends to such a knowledge of magic. I have said it."

Not more than two days had passed since the return of Erethe, when she became convinced that a complete revolution had taken place in the feelings of a majority of the tribe. In fact, she was openly informed that they no longer owned the authority which she had formerly exerted. It needed little observation to prove to her that Mother Berbie had been busy in her absence, and that she had fully succeeded in arraying against their mistress the superstition and prejudices of these unaccountants. Moreover, the uncounted advances of Milov declared themselves too plainly to be mistaken. Guiscard himself had narrowly escaped an attempt on his life. Erethe's resolution was formed accordingly. Secretly collecting the remnant of the tribe who remained attached to her, she set forth by night for the mountains. On the morn after their departure, they were ascending the highlands which border on the plains of Thibet, and which are tributary to the Himalayas. Like these last, the mountains of Thibet and Cashmere present a series of climes, forming a cosmorama of the vegetable productions of different and widely separated lands. The bamboo, the orange and the luxuriant parasites of the torrid zone are found at the base. The towering palms, the Indian oak, the cedars and plane trees occupy their special territories; and the landscape varies continually with the ascending steps of the traveller. The roughest and most frightful crags, the softest and most verdant lawns excite the surprise and delight of the beholder, inspiring him with sensations of the rarest novelty. The air is fierce and sultry, or full of pure and balmy fragrances; or again, at loftier heights, it braces the system with grateful strength. The mood of the skies is as changeable as the scenery of the earth. Storms burst in sudden fury on the unwary wanderer, and floods, unknown before, dash down the devastated steep.

Into these regions, Guiscard and Erethe entered with feelings of pleased astonishment. On the minds of their followers were produced emotions of equal but different wonder, in which superstitious ignorance bore its full proportion. The attention of the lovers was, however, soon engaged by other considerations. For, gazing down the precipitous descents, Erethe, with an exclamation of alarm, caught Guiscard by the arm and pointed to an opening in the wooded slopes far below. Her companion followed with his eyes the direction which the movement indicated, and beheld a cluster of forms moving slowly upwards, and for the most part scarcely to be particularized by reason of their distance. Nevertheless, the white turban and the crimson-colored tunic of one of them sufficiently distinguished him to the eyes of the observers.

"It is Azef, the magician," exclaimed Guiscard. "He pursues us with his satellites, and as I now perceive, with many of your own people, whom doubtless he has enjoined into furthering his ends. Have a care, or we shall be seen by them."

Although instantly acted on, it was plain that the caution had come too late; and that Erethe and Guiscard had been perceived by their pursuers. The latter gathered in haste around the magician, whose orders they appeared to receive, and then, again putting themselves in motion, pushed onward up the undulating acclivities. Guiscard took from the pocket of his coat a small travelling glass, and turned it on the crowd below.

"Behold," said he, delivering the instrument to Erethe. "Yonder is Mother Berbie, borne on a litter in the midst of her people. Mark how she urges on the tribe with frantic gestures of her thin, bony arms. Nearer is our friend Milov, as stolid-looking as ever. And Azef; observe you not his evil countenance, and the serpent-like glimmer of his eyes, watchful for their prey! Erethe, in these rude regions, and among your untutored wanderers, there is no safeguard against such influences as those of the magician, and old Berbie, the witch-mother of the tribe. Come then, fair Erethe, relinquish the poetic dream of your tutelary dominion, a fancy no longer tenable in reason. In our southern Europe there are brighter skies than these, and, indeed, a fairer field for the intellect and the imagination. Thither let us fly at once, and leave these regions of baleful influence, whither an unsatisfied curiosity no longer attracts us."

Erethe sighed, gently returning the hand pressure by which her lover added emphasis to his earnest pleadings. Meanwhile, they and their companions delayed not retreat. They pressed on through forest depths and sunny glades, over rocky shelves and greenswards bright with flowers unfamiliar to European eyes. Ever and anon, the sound of voices borne to their ears, warned them of the vigilant and untiring quest which Azef directed, and which Berbie and Milov eagerly encouraged. To add to the peril of the lovers, the gipsies who had hitherto accompanied them, began to manifest signs of dissatisfaction. Their sullen looks, their murmurs of displeasure at being thus separated from their fellows, remained not long concealed from Erethe. An interchange of glances passed between Guiscard and herself, significant of the action that was now to be taken.

"Children of Romany," she said, addressing herself to her little band of followers, "I will no longer divide you from your kindred. As you cannot now accompany me with willing hearts, it is better that you and I now separate. I am to accompany this stranger, to whom I am now betrothed. Only I entreat you not to strengthen the hands of Azef, my enemy, who leads on your fellows in pursuit of us, making them the ignorant instruments of his own evil purposes."

The gipsies received this somewhat unexpected announcement with embarrassment and hesitation. They were governed by different emotions. Some were filled with sorrow and regret; others, on the contrary, appeared at first to meditate mischief. After a few words among themselves, however, they agreed to abide by the proposition made them. One or two even sought to exculpate themselves to their former mistress; and a little, pleasant-looking young fellow came forward and offered his services as a guide, promising to show the lovers a way of escape which their pursuers would be unable to discover. Erethe and Guiscard accepted his offer; a bestowal of confidence which was received with the most lively satisfaction.

"It is odd," said the guide, as he proceeded with agile steps just in advance of his companions, "it is odd, surely, that I am the only one who knows of this curious cavern passage through which I am going to lead you. I found it one day when hunting among the hills for fox skins. I thought I would keep the thing to myself a while, just to punish my mates, who have often said that I am the only Romany in the tribe who cannot keep a secret to himself."

Amusing them thus with his simple chat, he brought them to a thicket of young palms. Forcing his way among a growth of underbrush, he pushed aside the thick foliage, and revealed the entrance of the cave, a gloomy and forbidding portal. But Tokel (as the guide was called), producing a little tinder-box, kindled some shavings of balsam-wood from which he lighted sticks of the same material.

"Now, then, for the cavern," exclaimed Tokel. "I know not that I should have had courage to explore it, had it not been that I remembered some old story of my grandmother, concerning a cave which existed in the mountain passing through to the other side; so as I had no great fear of the demon, whom I don't so much believe in after all, I thought I would see what was to be found in the place."

As Guiscard and Erethe followed the gipsy into the cave, the baying of a dog faintly reached the ear of the young Frenchman, and sent a thrill through his bosom.

"Can it be a bloodhound?" he said to himself; "if so, the wily mountebank has indeed an unerring guide."

For the present, he thought it best not to communicate his apprehensions to the guide, otherwise than by urging his advance as much as possible. Tokel pushed forward at a pretty rapid pace, waving his torch from side to side, throwing the light in fitful gleams over masses of rock and fantastic petrifications. Presently he stopped.

"Hold there!" he cried. "We must now move more cautiously, for we must be nearing the pit, which I call the Bottomless Well."

At this moment, the baying of the hound was heard near the mouth of the cave. Tokel started at the sound, and in his agitation dropped his torch. Its sparkling cinders, dashed on the floor, sent forth a momentary brilliancy in which the edge of the abyss was vividly marked out before them.

"Move on," said Guiscard, taking up the torch and restoring it delighted to the guide. "There may yet be time for us to gain the end of the cave, when it is possible that we may have our foes at some advantage."

Tokel hastened forward with redoubled speed; but soon he encountered an obstacle altogether unexpected. A huge mass of fallen rock, filling up the whole passage, denied them further progress.

"An earthquake, an earthquake!" exclaimed Tokel, in despairing accents. "The roof of the cave has fallen in."

The barrier was complete. No possible means of surmounting it could be found. The noise of the pursuers was already approaching. Drawing from the bosom of his frock a pair of pistols, Guiscard examined their condition; and while thus doing, the glare of torches saluted his eyes, and Azef and Milov made their appearance with a crowd of gipsies and retainers.

"Lo, the hunt is up at last!" exclaimed the magician, surveying his victims with an air of malignant triumph. "Men of Romany, it is this vile Frank who has conjured away your fair mistress by his wicked spells. Seize him, lads, and bind him fast."

"Stand back, at your peril," cried Guiscard, aiming a pistol at the foremost.

Needless, however, of his menace, they rushed on him. The fall of one of their number did not prevent Guiscard from being immediately overpowered and bound hand and foot.

"Drag him to the edge of the pit, yonder," said Azef, advancing to point it out. "Meanwhile, let some of you see to your mistress; look you, she is ill."

"My lad," he continued, turning to the trembling Tokel, "you are not the only one who has visited the cavern passage, and looked into its fathomless pit. I am truly obliged to you for having served my purposes so well in coming hither."

Azef now bent over the motionless Frank, holding the torch in such manner that he could view him face to face.

"See!" he cried, suddenly pushing forward his captive, so that the head of the latter lay over the edge of the pit. "Behold the fate which awaits thee, miserable wretch!"

Gloating over the silent agonies of his victim, he knelt and lowered his torch to display the gloomy abyss into which the Frank was about to be launched. An instant, the flame glittered feebly above the deep; then, swift as sheeted lightning, a fiery volume sprang from below, enveloping the form of the magician. Starting, and stumbling blindly, with a cry of horror he fell over the precipice. With one impulse, the crowd rushed to the edge of the pit; and there, far below, impaled on a projecting point of rock, they saw Azef writhing in ghastly fire. Shuddering, they drew back to escape the view. Then quickly releasing Guiscard, they turned toward Erethe, vying with each other in humility of respect. They entreated pardon for their past conduct, declaring that they had been enticed by the sorcerer and Mother Berbie into a course which they now sincerely regretted. But Erethe, though uttering no reproaches for the past, had been fully warned of her danger in longer remaining dependant upon their caprice. After a short season of delay, therefore, she bade them a kind farewell, and with a single attendant, set forth with Guiscard, her betrothed, for her future home on the shore of the Mediterranean. But doubtless it will be long before, from among the traditions of the wandering people over whom she once held authority, will have vanished the memory of the gipsy-princess, and the sudden doom of her enemy, the magician.

ARMIES IN EARLY TIMES.

In 1682, Kara Mustapha commenced his fatal enterprise against Vienna. A revolt of the Hungarians, under Count Tokeli, against Austria, which had been caused by the bigoted tyranny of the Emperor Leopold, now laid the heart of that empire open to attack; and a force was collected by the Grand Vizier, which, if ably handled, might have given the house of Hapsburg its death blow. Throughout the autumn of 1682, and the spring of 1683, regular and irregular troops, both foot, horse, artillery, and all kinds of munitions of war, were collected in the camp at Adrianople, on a scale of grandeur that attested and almost exhausted the copiousness which the administration of Kiuprili had given to the Turkish resources. The strength of the regular force which Kara Mustapha led to Vienna is known from the muster roll which was found in his tent after the siege; it amounted to 175,000 men. Perhaps not less than half a million of men were set in motion in this last effort of the Ottomans.—Athenum.

THE MACKEREL CRUISE.

MR. BALLOU:—To the accompanying illustrations, drawn expressly for you, I add an explanatory text, the materials for which, as well as the sketches, were the result of a trip undertaken the past summer for health and recreation. Every summer the mackerel fishermen of Gloucester and fishing ports of lesser note, send out their tidy, trim built vessels to the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Bay de Chaleur. The fleet is mostly composed of fore-and-aft schooners, varying from 60 to 120 tons. They are fitted out by their owners, and provisioned for a ten or twelve weeks' cruise. The small craft carry from six to ten hands; the larger ones from ten to twenty. The men are shipped on shares with the owners—consequently each individual is interested in the well doing of his vessel. The captain, or skipper, as he is called, is usually part owner, and spares no pains to make the voyage not only profitable but pleasant. We left New York July 4th, and started for Gloucester, the largest fishing mart in the United States, where we were so fortunate as to procure a passage in one of the fastest sailers of the fleet, the "Republic," owned by parties in Gloucester, and commanded by Capt. George Friend, of the same place. After a mackerel season, many of these little vessels outride the winter on the Western and George's Banks, returning into port occasionally to discharge their cargoes of cod and halibut. Subject to much violence from the heavy northeast storms, they become badly damaged in both hull and rigging, making it necessary to overhaul and completely repair previous to the departure for the fishing grounds in the spring. The "Republic" was in this dilapidated condition then applied to the sides and bottom below the water line, to prevent any injury to timber by the destructive sea-worm. After which, the hull, masts, decks, etc., are painted to suit the fancy of the skipper. It was a glorious summer morning, wind and tide favorable, when our sassy little schooner, with her crew of sixteen hands, left the harbor of Gloucester for the town of Liverpool, Nova Scotia, our first stopping-place, where we dropped anchor early on the afternoon of Saturday, after an extraordinary passage of fifty-one hours. The picture of the schooner under way gives a correct idea of her appearance. Our object of the visit accomplished, the following day, with a spanking breeze, we were again on our course, making Cape Canso—the easternmost land of Nova Scotia, distant about four hundred miles from Cape Ann—on the afternoon of the following Tuesday. Leaving this point, our way was changed, and the vessel headed for Pirate's Cove, a romantic harbor midway in the Gut of Canso, where we arrived in good time, and remained a few hours to obtain wood and water. On Thursday, the wind, which had been favorable, suddenly left us becalmed in the Bay of St. George (this interesting incident is depicted in our first engraving), when active prepa-

lad at the bait-box half frantic with joy. And now they come! Hurrah! how fast from the bubbling water—all hands, from the weather-beaten skipper to the green hand aft, joining with wild delight in this most exciting sport. One of our illustrations depicts this exciting scene. The fisherman holds a line in each hand, but uses both to draw the fish, which is thrown over the right shoulder, and dropped into the barrel behind. A crack fisherman never moves from his position, only using his arms; and can endure three days' fishing without fatigue, though they sometimes drop asleep. when we stepped on board of her; therefore, we will begin at the beginning, and open the record of the adventure with the first important business—washing decks and discharging ballast, in order that the schooner may be beached for painting. The schooner is represented in this condition in the last engraving on the next page. She is floated broadside to the shore, and is left at low water high and dry upon her beam ends. Jig-moulding, especially, is one of the fisherman's delights, and is entered into with great zest by all hands. They are formed of the best quality of hooks of different sizes cast into sinkers of block tin and pewter. One of our sketches delineates correctly the "mackerel jig." After all necessary appointments for catching the fish are completed, the right rail of the schooner is divided, according to the number of men, into what are called berths, or stands for fishing. The best of them are then sold by the skipper to the highest bidder. One of our engravings shows the amusing scene of the auction. This proceeding is aland salt nights. In active times, it is not unusual to fish and salt three or four successive days. Success, however, does not always follow the mackerel catcher. A lucky man may return home with his vessel in a fortnight, and discharge a capital load of three or four hundred barrels; while his neighbor skipper that sailed out with him, may dodge about from place to place, till he is forced back by wintry storms, with only fifty. Nevertheless, among the unlucky ones there's a deal of contentment; for 'tis all play with fisherman Jack when tinkers are scarce. You will find him, on such occasions, either spinning out the toughest yarns, or dancing till he is black in the face, some good old-fashioned reel. Then there's the lark ashore, and the breakdown with the village girls; the political discussion with the Brits, and last, but not least, the "red-eye frolic," ending in broken heads and aching limbs. in a minute. Another hand immediately cleans the fish, and a third salts and packs them in the barrel. Each hand marks and sorts his own catch. This series of views will give your readers a correct idea of the details of a business which employs a vast amount of capital and tonnage, and involves the labor of a perfect army of men. The mackerel belongs to the family of Scomberoides. That found upon our coast is the Scomber vernalis (spring mackerel of Mitchell). Dr. Storer says that Mitchell describes under the name of "grey" and "vernalis" the common mackerel of our coast. Cavier, although he admits both in his great work, considers them as the same; and Richardson remarks, the "only difference between scomber grey and vernalis seems to be in their size and color, and they are very probably different ages of the same species." In the specimens brought to Boston market, Dr. Storer found the difference between the two too slight to constitute distinct species. From six to eight thousand barrels of fresh mackerel are sold annually in Boston market alone; but "their great value to this people arises from the means of employment afforded to an immense number, by the process of salting and packing." We believe the fishery of a single year in Massachusetts alone, has amounted in value to a million and a half of dollars. The number of barrels of mackerel inspected during a period of five years, in this State, was 1,079,116. As we have remarked above, the luck of the fishermen is very variable. "In some years," says Storer, "im-are cruelly maimed without being taken." The European mackerel was early known as an article of food, and was held in high esteem by the ancient Romans, as forming the celebrated sarcum—a pickle or sauce—of which they made great use. This was prepared from several different kinds of fishes but that from the mackerel was deemed by far the best. The generic character of the scumler are "scales on the body small and smooth; vertical fins not bearing scales; two dorsal fins widely separated; some of the posterior rays of the second dorsal and the anal fin free, forming finlets; sides of the tail slightly carinated; one row of small conical teeth in each jaw, the parts of the gill cover without denticulations or spines; seven branchiostegous rays." The delicate colors of this fish, shading from black on the head, and dark green on the back to silvery white with reflections on the sides, make it a perfect picture. It is certainly one of the nicest table-fishes we have, and when broiled by a skilful hand, fresh from the water, forms a dish that a hungry man can relish without much coaxing of the appetite. The mackerel, salted and cured, forms a staple of export and consumption, perhaps second to no other fish, a branch of business too well known to be discussed in this connection. A mackerel cruise, as an episode in one's life, is a pleasant thing to look back upon; while a life devoted to the business is one of severe toil and not unfrequently attended with great danger.

THE CREW DANCING.

the crew of the mackerel schooner dancing for dear life, and enjoying themselves, as men only can with whom recreation is an infrequent episode of a laborious life. We have also shown an incident in the cruise in the sketch of a squall, by way of contrast to the "dead calm" previously delineated. No vessel can outride a storm better than these fishermen. They haul down flying jib only, and "let her slide" into ten and twelve knots. These squalls are very common in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, blowing almost every day when the wind is off shore. Another of our views represents Arch Island. This extraordinary rock rises abruptly from the sea to the height of 288 feet, and is a third of a mile in length. It is uninhabited by man, but myriads of wild birds build their nests, covering the entire surface, which is as white as if capped with snow. The singular arch at the southeastern extremity was formed by the action of the tides, and can only be approached in calm weather. Six miles distant, Mont Perce, or Table Ronde, is seen towering 1250 feet above the town of Perce at its base, and visible distinctly forty miles from the ocean. In another sketch we have depicted the operation of splitting mackerel. The splitter takes the fish in his left hand, and draws the knife down through the back from head to tail. An expert hand can split sixty fish menso shoals of these fishes are readily met with, and the vessels return in a few weeks with full cargoes, while the same localities may be visited in other seasons, and the efforts of the fishermen prove fruitless and his fare meagre. So peculiar are the habits of this genus, that oftentimes weeks may pass, the fishing snooks be surrounded by millions sporting upon the surface of the ocean, and scarce one allow itself to be taken; while again, the success of a few days will retrieve the disappointments of nearly a season. Thus, a fisherman informs me, that last season, having been in the Bay of Chaleur, and taken but few fish, the vessel to which he belonged was returning home, when, off Cape Cod, the fish were so numerous and voracious, that the crew, consisting of ten men, captured in two hours nearly thirty barrels. At this time about two hundred snooks were together, and they were all equally successful, some of them taking even forty barrels of fish. Several of the most intelligent fishermen inform me that the difficulty of taking mackerel is yearly increasing, from the barbarous custom of gaffing them, of collecting them around vessels by means of throwing out bait, and then suddenly drawing up an instrument armed with numerous sharp iron points, by which many are captured, and greater numbers

THE YOUNG CHILD'S PRAYER.

BY WILLIE E. PARON.

They left the young child all alone,
To battle with the waves of life;
He read their names engraved on stone,
And felt unfitted for the strife.

A weary way the future seemed;
The present was uncertain ground;
But from the past one sunbeam gleamed,
And here the child some comfort found.

'Twas this: bent lowly at her knee,
The mother taught her child to say,
"When father and when mother flee,
The Lord will care for those who pray."

And father, mother, now had fled,
And left the young child in his grief;
The sod was on each withered head,
And on the sod a withered leaf.

He bent the knee upon the sod;
His folded hands were on his breast,
His child eyes were upturned to God,
"Who giveth those who seek it, rest."

He prayed that He might stoop to care
For one left lonely on life's shore;
And he who hears the suppliant's prayer,
Promised to guide him evermore.

And all through life went one whom men
Called holy, from the words he spoke;
And when he slept, these men said then,
"Surely, he hath in glory woke."

THE SALE OF A KINGDOM.

BY FRANCES P. PEPPERELL.

It was a masquerade in the wood of Ardennes, and the four o'clock sun streamed slantingly through the aisles of the great forest, and upon the varied costumes of the temporary inhabitants. Never since the days of Rosalind and Jacques had so motley a crew danced beneath the umbrageous oaks, nor one half so splendid. Fine ladies of the court had thrown aside their hoops and powder, and stepped out in the native dignity of peasant girls, or ascended into a blazing guise of borrowed royalty. Atalantas with buskins and apples, Dianas with crescents and hounds; graces, muses and dryads all mingled their gay array with gods and satyrs, Turks and yeomen. The dance was swinging round like a band of reeling bacchanals among the treeboles, when one withdrew fatigued, and wandering to a little distance, flung herself on the sward beneath wide-spread branches. Dressed as a sea-nymph, she went by the name of Nathalie, and was by far the loveliest one among all the merry masqueraders; and so doubtless thought the tall and graceful Apollo, who, with golden curls clustering round his temples, and golden arrows slung across his shoulders, joined her.

"It is not," said he, "the first time that Nathalie has been seen by her adorer; once and twice before in the evening shade of these woods has Le Norman worshipped her beauty, but never in guise so costly as now. What spell has come over the maid of Ardennes?"

Nathalie slowly rose, showing in every motion the waving grace of a true sea-nymph, and stood leaning against the tree-stem before him; her flowing robe was of an iridescent, pearly-colored stuff, changing now to the suggestion of a palest blue, now to the soft flesh tint of a shell, and now to a deep, watery shade of sea-green. Slender branches of scarlet coral made a vivid splendor in her dark hair, and hanging from their tips, a veil of lace fell down and half-smothered the glow and sparkle of jewels that adorned her. Diamonds flickered with every breath upon her bosom, as she sat there in the sunbeams; wreaths of mock sea-weed trailed festoonwise round her skirt, and rubies, emeralds and opals, strewn with a profuse hand on her attire, and glistening with lavish lustre, transformed her into the image of one who, just rising from the sea, was blazing with the myriad, dazzling waterdrops that dripped away from her, each first hiding in its bosom a sunbeam of this upper world to carry down into the still depths of twilight caves.

"Monsieur has perchance thought," returned she, "that because I lived with foster-parents in a hut among these woods, I had no ancestors; that because I wore russet, I could never wear satin; that because I decked my hair with flowers, I had therefore no priceless heirlooms. Monsieur, these jewels have been in our family six hundred years and over!"

"And my family scarcely counts behind that," said the young man.

"And monsieur has then a family and name?"

"None nobler in the kingdom. But Nathalie, how came you here?"

"Ah, the marchioness was my mother's friend, and to-day is my birthday, Le Norman. To-day I am fifteen."

"So young and so lovely," thought Le Norman; "and if she loves me (as I cannot doubt she does), born to how much trouble!" And he remembered with a double pang of both exquisite joy and pain the emotion manifested by her on the occasion of a slight accident to him. Then he had thought her a wild, charming forest girl, beautiful enough to beguile an hour away, although doubting even then, if his feelings towards her were not too deep for trifling. Now he found her of a certain noble rank—but what of that? It must be a high rank indeed, which should smite down the barrier between them; and nursed in different religious faiths, inexorable state laws would intervene, should all else prosper, and prevent their union. He should never dare tell her of his love; she would recover her affections in a little while, if he were silent, and be happy again—he would not entail wretchedness on her young life—he would never speak. Having made which doughty resolution, while his thoughts had been almost written on his face, he hummed a snatch of the distant dancing-tune before he spoke again.

And of what was Nathalie thinking? Of sorrowful things, if her face was any index. It was a moment before he dared trust himself to look at her; at last when he raised his head, her dark eyes were fixed on him, welling over with tears. There is a moment of weakness that is irresistible; if he had withstood now, he had been more than human. He need not ask if she loved him; he knew it. He need not swear his love for her; she would feel that. He took her in his arms, and lulled the grief that then first broke forth, with tenderest kisses and most endearing sentences. Alas for Nathalie!

A month had passed, and every day had witnessed an interview between the two lovers of the wood; and when once, half-tremblingly, Nathalie had requested to know the name of her lover, an almost stern tone had come into his voice, as he had her not inquire again—and with a strange pain in his face, warned her that, as it was, she would know all too soon.

"At least you are not one whom I need be ashamed to love?" she ventured.

"Not that, indeed, my darling! But one who, knowing what lies before him in the future, should be ashamed to love you!" And Nathalie, feeling he could do nothing wrong, was satisfied.

Now she sat in the drawing-room of her friend the marchioness, in full dress, awaiting her lover, who was to accompany and present her at court. A coach dashed to the door; another moment, and Le Norman stood in the apartment, with flushed cheeks and an anxious, vivid brightness in his restless eyes. As the marchioness turned and beheld his face, she began a sudden exclamation instantly checked by his warning look, and they were soon rolling along together to the royal palace.

Whenever Nathalie had seen her lover before, it had been in his simple hunting-dress, or that of some fancy disguise. Now in court costume, almost too dazzling Nathalie thought, he could not look better than he did in the woods; and her heart swelled with joy as she thought of the happy rustic life she should lead for all her future with this titled forester, who despised rank and courtly baubles—and she pleased herself with delicious images of quiet contentment as they rolled along. Coaches in the street made way for them by the flaring gaslight, ushers at the palace door swept open long avenues through the noble crowd, who respectfully withdrew. Bowing to the right and left, Le Norman, with Nathalie upon his arm, and the marchioness following directly behind with the chamberlain, passed the halls and staircase, swept through the ante-rooms till the doors of the throne-room were thrown open and they entered; while lords and ladies, who had been and still were patiently awaiting their turn, stepped aside. If the brilliancy of the ante-rooms had seemed gorgeous, what must the flood of lustre have appeared to her bewildered eyes as Le Norman paused at the threshold, giving her hand a lingering and re-assuring pressure.

Hitherto depending on him, she had been only the shrinking girl of Ardennes wood; now, and as it were instantaneously, a new force seemed to develop within her—her figure grew a shadow more erect, the rich folds of her garment shook out with a somewhat prouder grace—a prescience of what was to come seemed to surround and strengthen her. She cast her eyes round on the magnificent throng, and prouder and statelier than any empress, swept up the noble vista to the king. A moment, with Jove-like thunders gathering on eye and brow, the old monarch gazed on the approaching pair, while all the court anticipated his action, and were smacking their mental lips over the expected scene. But like a balmy, summer wind dispersing the clouds of tempest, a smile far worse than their scattered the frowns; and advancing a step or two, the king briefly exclaimed, in a voice inaudible to any but they:

"Son!"

"Father," said Le Norman, in the same tone, "wooing a peasant girl, I have found the Lady Nathalie d'Arenes."

While he spoke, Nathalie and the king measured each other with undaunted eyes.

"The prince, in his present, passing fancy," said the king, "does the court honor. Let us hope that when this boyish freak is finished, the Lady Nathalie will regard it as leniently as it deserves! Mademoiselle, your father rendered me distinguished services; but for him, I should have lost my kingdom. Command from me any favor!"

"Sire," answered Nathalie, "beyond protection from royal and princely insults during the reception, I neither ask nor will receive any favors from your majesty!" And with a courtesy as superb as the least possible loyal submission could render so graceful an action, she sailed between king and prince, and stood beside the marchioness, a little in the rear upon the right of the unoccupied throne.

"Well, sir," said the king to Le Norman, in the same low tone, savage in its almost inaudible intensity and slow pronunciation, while sunbeams could not equal the benignity beaming on his face, "well, sir, I have heard something of this before. I was not unprepared. A pretty affair you have made out of nothing!"

"Sire, I am in earnest."

"And so am I, you graceless wretch! Must you drag into court all your awkward country flames?"

"I have never before intruded, I believe."

"So much the worse now, to find you entangled so uselessly at this late day!"

"Could you choose in any royal house of Europe a queenlier bride?"

"By heaven, young man, you won't want a queen till you are king! And if you think of this again, I'll declare your brother heir in your stead."

"Sire," said Le Norman then with coolness, "nothing would better please me."

"Then, if that's your cue," returned his father, "you shall be both heir and king."

"I will not consent to be either, on any other terms than that my wife be Queen Nathalie."

"Your wife!" fairly whispered the exasperated king. "Has the boy ruined me? Are you married to her, sirrah?"

But not deigning to reply, Le Norman bowed, and stepping aside joined Nathalie, while the chamberlain immediately continued the presentations. They stood in the shadow of a curtain, and as Le Norman again drew Nathalie's arm into his, with a decided gesture she withdrew it, and only lightly laying her hand on his, gazed steadily into his face. What reproach, what passion, what great sorrow suffused her countenance. Though for his soul he could not have helped loving her, nor, as we have seen, forborne vowing fidelity to her, yet his heart smote him that he had ever concealed his rank.

"You would never have loved me, Nathalie, if I had told you," murmured he. "Forgive me—fortune will favor us—I shall yet make you my wife—we shall yet be happy!"

A sudden dizziness, like the precursor of a swoon, overcame him, and in the midst of it her voice tolled out low and clear as a bell upon sultry air, the one word, "Impossible!"

Great must have been her self-control; for in this moment of bitter pain, disappointment and emotion, so lightly had her fingers touched his hand, that he was not aware when the pressure ceased, but only felt her face receding, as a vision fades, while she flitted backward and away from him into the throng and out among side arches and distance, and with a low moan he reeled and fell; caught by an attendant, he was borne unseen to his own apartments, and the gaiety of the others continued. Thus frequently under the gayest masque are the saddest tragedies enacted.

Scarcely had Nathalie gained a remote corridor, when a sudden rush and murmur proclaimed that the king had withdrawn and the audience was broken up; and while she paused to look around her, she became sensible of an approaching step, and in a moment the king appeared, and taking her hand, led her back into a private apartment, and courteously requested her to be seated.

"Madame," said he, sternly, while seating himself opposite, "by what authority do you receive my son's addresses?"

Nathalie raised her eyes, and with her head somewhat thrown back, answered:

"I must be addressed altogether differently before I reply at all."

"Perhaps the Lady Nathalie will instruct her slave in some suitable conversational terms!" said the king, his face slightly on one side, his eyes leering upon her, and in his most insinuating manner; nevertheless, if any voice was ever plainly suggestive of scaffolds and broad-axes, this was one.

Nathalie, forest girl as she was, could not condescend to battle the king with these his own weapons, and as there did not appear to be any other, thought best to make a feint of surrender, and calmly said:

"I had wished to leave your majesty possession of your son. Be assured, I had no knowledge of the prince's rank when he offered me marriage. My religious faith will now be an invincible bar to his wishes. I love Le Norman the hunter; I will never wed your son the prince!"

"Madame," returned the king, "your frankness charms me! You have truly made me your friend. My son, I confess it, is more than a match for me. If you had been daughter of grand duke or minor king, I would not have whispered a word against your faith; but, as you well know, my kingdom, though recent, is important, and will become more so strengthened by a royal alliance. Still, generous as you are to resign your lover, human nature is not infallible; it were too much to expect this of you. Let me guard you; let me be always your friend. And as a proof of it, let me offer you a most worthy husband in the person of the Count d'Entremeur!"

The indignation of Nathalie was too great for utterance; but at last, as the king continued his harangue, it broke forth in wild and angry protest.

"Allow me at least to convey the future countess to a place not so liable to listeners." And Nathalie accompanied him perforce through several devious ways, till they stood in the dimly lighted palace chapel. "Now, madame," said the king, who had so lately professed friendship, and now speaking in his lowest tones, "I give you a choice. This is what is called a civilized community; nevertheless you are completely in my power. You have not a relative in the world! If you do not comply with my demands, I have dungeons so deep, that for all your life you will never see daylight again. Neither do I shrink from such terrific resources, although loth to mention them to ears polite—as starvation, tight cords, hot irons—"

She interrupted him haughtily. "I can never be frightened into submission!"

"Let me urge you, then. While you are single, my son will never complete the alliance I design. He will be wretched and unhappy; while, if you marry, he will resign himself to forgetfulness. Do you wish to be the cause of his misery? I have no great affection in my nature; it is chiefly pride. But all those pangs with which I threatened you, I now threaten and will pour upon him, if you disobey. You can go forward to the altar, where the Count d'Entremont awaits you, or back the way we came. In the last case, my guards will attend upon you, and you will be forced to witness how bravely the prince endures his tortures!"

It is not likely the king would have performed an iota of this grandiloquent threat; but Nathalie could have given credence to any evil from him. She trembled an instant, and then with a firm step went forward, placed her hand in the Count d'Entremont's—never seen by her before—and being quickly and irrevocably pronounced his wife, received the congratulations of the smiling king and the few witnesses. Leaning against the altar, pallid and cold as sculpture, the first object her married eyes discerned was Le Norman. He moved forward, with an expression as if every second of time was a sharp sword that stabbed him, and appeared to offer his compliments.

"What ardor!" he murmured; "what sincerity! what constancy! Madame la Comtesse is as firm as a rock in her determination to be faithless as shifting sand!"

Time, too fast for the most of us, lagged sadly with the young countess, scarcely more than a child, as she sighed far away in distant France, and from the windows of her chateau watched the shadows come and go on the purple, Pyrenean slopes, while her husband was absent the greater part of his time at Paris, or at the court she had so lately left. Time passed not so slowly with the prince; indeed, Le Norman had had a thousand events form in his years, for every one in the monotonous ages of the Countess d'Entremont. Having recovered from the first severe shock of his loss and disappointment, with the native energy of his nature, not deeming it right to waste his life in idle despair, he had wonderfully bestirred himself—superintending the education of his brother, arranging scientific expeditions, and performing all duties devolving upon him, but steadfastly refusing the royal match urged by his father, and clinging to the loose fragments of the love of earlier days.

Ten years had passed—seven since the death of his father and his own coronation—his brother had entered into manhood, and Le Norman, as the king, had already commanded the admiration of all Europe by his daring genius, when the Count d'Entremont appeared again at court after a short absence, and for the first time since his marriage brought with him the countess. Of course all the world were on the qui vive to behold the meeting; but in the calm, nonchalant air of the countess, who, not quite twenty-five, was in the full vigor and bloom of womanhood, and perhaps lovelier and with a better balanced mind than if she had not experienced these long, lonely years, as she received the rather sarcastically polite welcome of the king, all the world found very little satisfaction.

A few weeks had elapsed, and in one of the sea-shore palaces the whole court were assembled at summer festivities. The royal abode was on a cliff, which afforded in front of the building a promenade of several hundred yards, and abruptly terminating in a precipice, whose base was washed by the sea. On this cliff, one afternoon, a party of courtiers—among whom was the king, his brother and the Countess d'Entremont—were watching the approach of a small boat, which, out on a fishing excursion, could hardly hope to make shore before the squall should burst upon it. Erect in the prow, a keen eye could not fail to recognize the lofty figure of the Count d'Entremont.

Leaning breathlessly over the cliff, Nathalie remained with her eyes fixed on the boat; for although she had no manner of affection for the husband forced upon her, she could not view his danger with indifference, nor desire anything but his happiness. The boat was still far distant, the wind increasing—already it fluttered the ends of her white scarf into the air across the brink of the precipice, as with hands slightly extended forward, she stood silent and motionless. The courtiers withdrew a little, and the king and herself remained nearest together upon the edge. Great rain-drops pattered down slowly, then quickening their flood, poured down with broad gushes of speed, dashing down the hands of her hair, soaking her garments, blinding her eyes—yet still they stood heedless of it.

The count saw her, for, doffing his cap, he raised his hand to his lips with a knightly gesture, and waved it towards her. He was so near that the wind might be seen lifting his hair, when the little mast strained, cracked and broke, dragged the boat down into the sea that ran over her, and precipitated the occupants into the roaring gulfs. He was a strong swimmer! For after every green, cavernous wave broke its white crest over him, he was seen riding the next one triumphant. Now lost to sight, now again appearing, now supporting a fainting comrade, and now with rapid strokes parting the strong sea—a weaker man had sunk long ago. The rain and the spray mingled their strength with the wind and the waves, and a thick, white, curling mist arose and hung round him, closing him out from the sight of his wife, and hiding his beacon star from him. At last the wind veered, and the mist e'enred away; little patches of blue sky smiled out from the south and west, and the waves rocked to and fro in stray sunshine. The countess still strained her eyes, surveying the broad, vacant expanse—nor count nor fisherman was there; and at the end of an hour's intense length and watching, three bodies were tossed high upon the strand. One had been the Count d'Entremont. All the heavens and earth in their commotion spun back from Nathalie, and with "outflung hands and shapeless shriekings wild," she fell senseless.

A year's seclusion—due not to grief, but to respect—had passed, and the leafy echoes of Ardenues had lulled Nathalie into complete forgetfulness, for the moment, of the last eleven years—and again she sat beneath the oaks and plucked the flowers growing in the self-same nook, as in her girlhood. All but the first fifteen years of her life, seemed vaporous as a dream; and consonant with all around, the distant bugle of some royal hunting party stole upon her ear like "horns of elfland faintly blowing." And thus when one stood before her in a garb of Lincoln-green, leading a red roan steed, it seemed as if all the interval had never been; and looking up, merrily she said:

"It is my birthday, to-day, Le Norman! I am"—but here, as she would have said "fifteen," memory rushed back on her, and hiding her face in her hands, she turned and would have fled away, but his voice sternly arrested her.

"Stay a moment, madame!" he commanded. "Since Providence has thrown us once more together, let me return to you the truth you once gave me. It was broken by you, and rendered valueless to me, eleven long years ago."

With a certain wild vehemence, she exclaimed, turning at bay upon him:

"I was forced to break it! Had it been true truth, you had died in torture first! It was to save you from dying in torture, that I sacrificed myself to worse than death—more than torture—to marrying d'Entremont!"

A moment or two he regarded her.

"I have taken shame to myself for eleven years that I could not lose my own passion, while feeling its object to be faithless. Must I undo the work of so long a time?" She returned him no answer. "If that were done," he resumed—but she interrupted him.

"Your cruel father's death has not left in the inexorable state laws one obstacle the less!"

"I can annihilate all obstacles," he returned, triumphantly. Silence followed. Some time they thus stood confronting one another. "A singular fancy strikes me, Nathalie. It is your birthday. How old are you, my friend?"

"I am fifteen," she returned.

"And I, nineteen. It seems to me that an hour ago we plighted troth. Is it so?"

Not many days had elapsed ere a strange rumor flew trumpet-tongued through the kingdom, and was proclaimed officially to all the crowned heads of Europe. More than one king of different realms had congregated in this capital, and a universal wonder was displayed in the countenance of every subject and plenipotentiary.

The seventh of October, with all the sweet decadence of summer in the air, came, and the streets and cathedral were thronged for a triple ceremony. The procession left the palace to the sound of slow, pleasant music, and the shouts and blessings of the populace upon Le Norman, "the dear king," wound to its destination, and entered the great aisles of the solemn place. There, in the presence of subjects and brother kings, Le Norman took the crown from his own head and placed it on his brother's; and when a further ceremony of coronation was finished, knelt as count only, of his paternal heritage, and was the first among his brother's new subjects to swear fealty.

The new king stepped aside, while all the world wondered the reason of so great a sacrifice. The reason? It came through the open door of an inner chapel, whence Nathalie, unattended by any one save the spirit of radiant beauty, issued, and advancing, placed her hand in that of the abdicated king, Le Norman; and beneath the benedictal hands of the patriarchal archbishop, was declared the wife of the Count of Nassau.

SIBERIAN SLEDGE DOGS.

These dogs are said to resemble the wolf—to have long, pointed, projecting noses, sharp and upright ears, and long bushy tails; color various—black, brown, reddish brown, white and spotted. They vary also in size; but a good sledge dog should not be less than two feet seven inches high. Their howling is that of a wolf. In the summer they dig holes in the ground for coolness, or lie in the water to escape the mosquitoes, which in those regions are not less troublesome than one of Pharaoh's plagues. In winter, they burrow in the snow, and lie curled up, with their noses covered by their bushy tails. The preparation of these animals for a journey is carefully to be attended to. For a fortnight, at least, they should be put on a small allowance of hard food, to convert their superfluous fat into firm flesh. They are also to be driven from ten to twenty miles daily; after which, Von Wrangel says, they have been known to travel a hundred miles a day without being injured by it.

"We drove ours," he says, "sometimes at the rate of one hundred wrosts (sixty-six miles) a day. Their usual food is fresh fish, thawed and cut in pieces; and ten frozen herrings are said to be a proper daily allowance for each dog. A team consists commonly of twelve dogs; and it is of importance that they should be accustomed to draw together. The foremost sledge has usually an additional dog, which has been trained as a leader. On the sagacity and docility of this leader depend the quick and steady going of the team, as well as the safety of the traveller."—New York Journal of Commerce.

STRYCHNINE.

In Ceylon and several districts of India grows a moderate sized tree, with thick and shining leaves, and a short, crooked stem. In the fruit season it is readily recognized by its rich orange-colored berries, about as large as golden pippins—the favorite food of many kinds of birds—within which are the flat, round seeds, not an inch in diameter, ash-gray in color, and covered with very minute silky hairs. The Germans fancy that they can discover a resemblance in them to crows' eyes, but the likeness to them is purely imaginary. The tree is the strychnine nux vomica, and the seed is the deadly poison nut. The latter was early used as a medicine by the Hindus, and its nature and properties were understood by Oriental doctors long before it was known to foreign nations. Dog-killer and fish scale are two of its Arabic names. It is stated that at present the natives of Hindostan often take it for many months continuously, in much the same way as an opium-eater does opium. They commence with taking the eighth part of a nut a day, and gradually increase their allowance to an entire nut, which would be about twenty grains. If they eat it directly before or after food, no unpleasant effects are produced; but if they neglect these precautions, spasms result.—American Druggist.

WHAT FINGER-RINGS HAVE DONE.

Many have suffered imprisonment, and even death, on account of rings. The great antiquarian, Wicklemann, was murdered by a scoundrel servant for a very precious ring that he wore. Conrad, a Neapolitan prince, flying from Charles, King of Naples, was discovered to a sailor by his ring, informed against, examined, and there being found no sufficient reason why he should live, was put to death accordingly. Richard Cœur de Lion having made a three months' truce with Saladin, hoped to get safe home, but was betrayed to the enemy by a jewel on his finger. He had reached Vienna, when fearing to fall into the hands of Leopold, the Austrian archduke, whom he had affronted, he took a cook's place in a gentleman's family, but not taking the precaution to roast with his rings off, he was recognized, arrested, and thrown into prison. The last instance we shall cite of a ring proving inimical to the happiness of its possessor is taken from a remarkable relation of Phlegon of Tralles, Hadrian's freedman, who dealt in marvellous recitals, and who gives the following among others of his mirabilia: A young man by the name of Achates, travelling in Greece, became the guest of Demostrius. One evening, after retiring to rest, he was surprised by a visit from the fair Philinione (the deceased daughter of his host), who presented herself in the most bewitching guise before him, and persuaded him to exchange pledge-rings with her. This nocturnal visit was repeated for three nights successively, the young man having no idea while that his fair innamorata was a visitor from another world. On the third night, a maid discovering a strange lady in the guest-chamber, recognized her deceased mistress, and apprised the parents of the late Philinione of what she had seen. Incredulous at first at the young woman's story, they at length agreed to enter the chamber at the same hour the night following, when to their bewilderment and joy, they saw their own daughter before them; but this joy was soon turned into horror, for the maiden had no sooner recognized her father and mother, than, escaping from the embraces of both, she reproached them bitterly for thus coming abruptly to destroy the happiness which for three more nights she had so enjoyed with their guest, her brave of absence from the shades extending to a whole week. Saying this, she fell a lifeless corpse on the ground at their feet. On recovering from the shock, the first impulse of the parents hurried them to the tomb, whence the body had indeed departed, and all that remained there was Achates' pledge-ring, on seeing which, the unhappy youth, terror-stricken at having affianced himself to a spectre, fell upon his sword, and died immediately.—New York Dispatch.

LIFE THE WORLD OVER.

When Peter of Cortono was engaged on a picture for the Royal Palace of Pitti, Ferdinand II. particularly admired the representation of a weeping child. "Has your majesty," said the painter, "a mind to see how easily it is to make this very child laugh?" And, suiting the action to the word, the artist merely depressed the corner of the lips and the inner extremity of the eyebrows, when the little urchin seemed in danger of bursting his sides with laughter, who in a moment before seemed breaking his heart with weeping. If this be true in the world of living men, slight, very slight are the causes that make or break the happiness of life. The touch of a brush can dim heaven with a cloud, or brighten the prospect of the fair horizon.—Portfolio.

NOTICES OF NEW PUBLICATIONS.

DIED. By Mrs. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE. 2 vols. 12mo. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co.

This work is openly announced as an anti-slavery novel, so that readers who are surprised with that species of literature may pass it by. It appears, however, by sales of this book, that there are plenty of buyers. As a work of art, "Died" is written with more skill than "Uncle Tom." At the same time it is less dramatic and less exciting. The hero, as is frequently the case in fictitious narratives, is on the whole a failure, but several other characters are drawn with great power. This book is likely to suit the English market admirably.

THE HILLS OF THE SILEMONT. By the author of "The Wide, Wide World." New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1856. 12mo. pp. 516.

A work by the author of "The Wide, Wide World," whose reputation is "world wide," is indeed a treat. The new book is worthy of the writer. It is interesting, it is natural; it takes us into the midst of fresh and unfamiliar scenery, and the characters are fresh and blood, and talk and act like men and women. The book is spinning and interesting from beginning to end, and is as sound in morals as a sermon from the pulpit. For sale by Redding & Co.

IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND. By CHARLES READE. In 2 vols. 12 mo. 1856. Boston: Ticknor & Fields.

This work, though less terse and dramatic in style than "Peg Woffington," and "Clouds and Sunshine," is written with equal ability, and is none the less interesting for the fuller development given to its characters. The scene alternates between England and Australia, and the incidents though natural are thrilling and exciting; while the characters are no dreamy phantasms, but flesh and blood realities.

FRENCH AMERICAN DRAMA. Among the recent of this beautifully got up series of acting plays, are "Life in New York," by John Brougham, "My Wife's Mirror," by Ed. G. P. Wilkins, "Allie or the Race of Killaree," by E. Stirling, "A Confused Lesson," by H. Batters, and "A Good Fellow," by Charles M. Walcott, all capital and popular pieces.

LIFE OF PRINCE TALLEYRAND. By CHARLES R. McCLARG. New York: C. Scribner. 1856. 12mo. pp. 382.

The biography of Talleyrand is a romance from beginning to end. The "prince of diplomats," he was far from being an honest man, though possessed of brilliant talents, and making his mark upon the great period of the world in which he flourished. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

THE STATUE OF FRANKLIN.

As the extent of space covered by our large representation of the inauguration of the Franklin Statue, rendered it necessary to represent the figure on a small scale, we now present a large and accurate view of it from the pencil of Billings. The sculptor, Richard Saltonstall Greenough, who is still a young man, has been very happy in his characterization of our distinguished townsman. There is nothing artificial or constrained in the attitude. He stands resting on his staff, in the dress that pictures and descriptions have rendered so familiar to us, looking down from his position with a benevolent and intelligent expression, that satisfies the popular conception of the man, and is at the same time true to facts. The figure is so natural and life like that you almost expect it to move as you gaze on it. It must have been conceived in an hour of genuine inspiration. The inauguration day of this statue, September 17, will long be remembered in the annals of the city. For several days previous, strangers had been pouring in, and there was so great an accession of visitors on the day itself, that the whole number of the welcome outsiders was computed to be at least 100,000, which, added to our local population filled the city to repletion. At no previous celebration have we witnessed such a display of human beings. The weather was remarkably propitious, as if Heaven smiled approbation on the occasion. It was moderate, with gentle breezes, and at times light clouds tempered the glare of sunshine. Business was entirely suspended. All along the line of the procession and in many parts of the city there were splendid and tasteful decorations. The Tremont House was splendidly adorned with flags and streamers. Nearly opposite, from the Cadet's headquarters, floated a flag inscribed "Monstrat viam (it shows the way), 1741," the motto of the gallant corps. The decorations of the Boston Museum attracted much attention. On its lower piazza was the motto, "He snatched the lightning from the heavens, and the sceptre from the hands of tyrants." Scollay's building bore on its eastern side the same in Latin—"Eripuit celo fulmen sceptrumque tyrannois." In Court Street there was a store with this inscription, "Benjamin Franklin when he was twelve years old was apprenticed as a printer to his brother James, whose office stood on this spot." A flag suspended on the north side of State Street was inscribed, "The opinion of Benjamin Franklin in 1754, 'A union of the colonies is absolutely necessary for their preservation.' His motto—join or die." From the Old State House, "First settlement of Boston, Sept. 17, 1630." On the corner of Union and Hanover we were told "The father of Benjamin Franklin removed from Milk Street to this spot shortly after Benjamin was born. Here he worked for a short time in his boyhood at the trade of a soap boiler and tallow chandler with his father." The birth place of Franklin in Milk Street was most elegantly decorated. Beneath a star were the words, "He took the lightning from Heaven," under which was a painting subscribed: "The House in which Franklin was born. Benjamin Franklin was born on this spot on Sunday the 17th of January, A. D. 1706." In Federal Street were flags with the following inscriptions: "Born January 17, 1706. Tallow Chandler's apprentice, 1717. Printer's apprentice, 1719. Author, 1725. Dry Goods clerk, 1727. Printer, 1729. Legislator for Pennsylvania, 1732. Founder of the University of Pennsylvania. Deputy Postmaster General, 1751. The Inventor of Lightning Rods was the originator of the Volunteer Militia. Fellow of the Royal Society. Doctor of Laws by Oxford. Colonel of Militia. Representative of America in England, 1764. Concluded first treaty for America, 1778. Member of Continental Congress, 1775. Commissioner Plenipotentiary to France, 1776. Minister Plenipotentiary to France, 1778. Commissioner to treat with England, 1782. President of Pennsylvania, 1785. Delegate to Federal Convention, 1787. Died, April 17, 1790." Washington Street and Dover Street had many fine decorations and appropriate inscriptions, and everywhere apt quotations from "Poor Richard" met the eye. The procession was a fine one, and its arrangement reflects great credit on Col. Newell A. Thompson, the Chief Marshal, and his assistants. It was three hours in passing a given point. The military escort, consisting of the commands of Cols. Burbank and Ballock, with the Light Dragoons and the Lancers, led off in fine style. Col. Marshall P. Wilder appeared perfectly at home at the head of the Ancient and Honorable Artillery. The first division, under Gen. John S. Tyler as chief marshal, comprised the city government and invited guests, among whom were Gov. Gardner and his aids. The second division, Col. Thomas E. Chickering, embraced the trades of Boston, fully and finely represented. It would require pages to describe properly the interesting features of this section. The silversmith's establishment, a barge loaded with costly jewelry and plate was very conspicuous. The Ames Manufacturing Company of Chicopee, came out 200 strong. From Chickering's Piano Forte works came a large body of men. Hooper's Bell founders gave sonorous token of their presence. In the third division, marshalled by Capt. Charles O. Rogers, the leading feature was the display of the printers, led off by the Franklin Typographical Society and the Boston Printers' Union. They had two platforms, drawn each by five horses, on which were presses representing past and present eras of printing, the former by the old press worked on by Franklin himself previous to 1742. Upon this press was worked a fac simile of the Boston Courant, No. 80, in which the name of Benjamin Franklin first appears as publisher, copies of which, as they were thrown off, were distributed to the crowd. Among the invited guests who rode with the printers was "Father Boylston" of the "Farmer's Cabinet," Amherst, N. H., an old gentleman of seventy-five, and a printer of sixty years standing. From Mr. French's Hoe's cylinder press, a humorous metrical life of Franklin by B. P. Shillaber (Mrs. Parangton), was worked off and distributed to the spectators. In the fourth division, marshalled by Hon. Moses Kimball, the masonic fraternity made a splendid appearance, particularly the Knights Templars and the De Molay encampment. The fifth division, Major Lewis W. Tappan, chief marshal, contained the Bunker Hill Association, the Agricultural and Horticultural Societies, the Medal Scholars from 1792 to 1856 inclusive, and the recipients of the Lawrence Prizes. Edmund F. Cutter, Esq., was at the head of the sixth division, which included the several historical, scientific, literary and musical societies. The Mercantile Library Association sent an immense delegation. Harvard College was strongly represented. The seventh division, under the lead of Joseph West, Esq., numbered the various benevolent and charitable associations. The Highland costume was worn by the Scotch societies. Nathaniel Winsor, Jr., Esq., appeared at the head of the eighth division, devoted to the marine societies and boat clubs, and flanked by a body of mounted police. The ninth division embraced the public school children, who received the procession on Beacon Street, marshalled by John L. Emmons, Esq. The ceremonies at the City Hall were very interesting. Mr. Winthrop's address was a masterly performance, and that of the President of the Charitable Mechanics' Association and of the Mayor were appropriate and well received. The ode by James T. Field, Esq., was most felicitous. Dr. Winslow Lewis, as Grand Master of the Masonic Order in Massachusetts, assisted by Col. John T. Head as his deputy, performed the masonic ceremonies, and the day closed without a single untoward accident to mar the enjoyment and gratification of the vast assembled multitude.

JAMES FENNIMORE COOPER.

The admirable accompanying portrait of our great American novelist gives a life likeness of its subject. James Fennimore Cooper was a son of Judge Cooper, and born at Burlington, N. J., in 1789. He was educated at Yale College, and after the completion of his studies entered the American navy as a midshipman in 1805, and remained in the service until 1810, when he married and retired. Soon after this he turned his attention to literary pursuits, and made his first essay as a novelist in a work entitled "Precaution," which met with a very limited sale. He was not discouraged, however, by this disappointment, but followed it up by the "Spy," a revolutionary tale. This novel was immediately successful. The vivid delineation of the hero, the truthful portraiture of the period, the dramatic interest of the stirring scenes it depicted, and its thorough nationality, gave it great popularity. In the "Pioneers," he painted the history of an American settlement in the wilderness, deriving his facts and groundwork from the settlements of Cooperstown in New York by his brother and others. In this book he struck on that Indian trait which he afterwards followed out with so much spirit and success. In the "Pioneers," too, he first introduced his chef-d'œuvre character, "Leatherstocking," the hero of several of his subsequent romances. The "Pilot" was the first sea-novel proper ever written, and opened a path since crowded with successful adventures. To Cooper, therefore, we may apply the words of the "Ancient Mariner:"

"He was the first that ever burst Into that silent sea."

The work alluded to laid the foundation of Cooper's fame. He soon became world-renowned. His novels were translated into the principal languages of Europe, and became as popular in France, in Germany, in Spain, in Russia and in England as at home. He produced a large number of volumes, chiefly romances. His forte was in romance-writing, though his political essays and sketches of travel were not without merit. His history of the American navy, not completed at his death, ranks as a standard work. He died at Cooperstown, N. J., in 1854. A daughter has inherited much of his literary talent and has produced some well-written works. The works of Cooper, or rather a large portion of them, will live as long as English literature lasts. They are vivid pictures of events and manners of social life long since gone by.

A RUNAWAY STEAMBOAT.

An eccentric but most amusing cruise was recently made by a steam tow-boat in the waters of Southampton harbor, in England, the particulars of which are related by a correspondent, who was an eye-witness of the whole affair. It seems that the Belmont, a regular steam tug, had taken in tow the ship Walter Hood, bound from Southampton to Australia. On reaching the lower bay, the sails were set on board the ship, and at the same time the tow-boat cast her off with the intention of returning to Southampton for another vessel, but by some accident the ship ran into the steamer, a violent crash followed, and in the confusion, all hands, including the captain and the cook of the latter, jumped on board the sailing vessel, leaving their boat in charge of a dog and two cats—a strange crew for a steam-going craft. But her steam was up, and after a succession of plungings and crashings, she succeeded in shaking herself clear of the ship, and the next moment was seen "going it alone," starting off at a terrific speed, and in anything but the right direction for her. For a few moments her captain and crew, engineer and all, were struck with dismay. The long tiller of the rudder was seen dashing wildly to and fro, while the fierce barking of the dog, who evidently knew little of navigation or steering, rendered the scene at once absurd and terrific—ludicrous and frightful. Meanwhile, the captain of the steamer, having recovered his presence of mind and composure, obtained a small boat, and with his men started in pursuit of his absconding craft; but ere he was well under way, she had altered her course, and from some cause or other came around, and set out for the point whence she had started, thus making or describing a complete circle. The men bent lustily to their oars, but the chased steamer dodged, shied, and circled about in the most erratic manner, the dog keeping up an incessant barking and howling, as though seeking in this manner to head her off and bring her to reason. Soon she shot off in an opposite direction, and now made directly for a light ship in the outer harbor. Here the men on the look-out descried her position, and having manned their boat, also started in pursuit. The race now became truly exciting, the course of the steam-tug becoming more and more uncertain as her helm shifted to and fro at the sport of the waves of the channel. By this time, however, she had nearly run her race, her steam was getting low, and at length her speed gradually diminished, her paddles stopped, and she ultimately gave in from sheer exhaustion. The crew from the light ship was the first to board her, her own crew coming up about twenty minutes after. She was at length got into working order, and brought safely into Southampton dock, where she was sentenced to undergo complete repairs after her frolic. It is said that the crew were fully justified in leaving her as they did, she being in imminent peril of going down.—Boston Post.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

We have been told that "out of evil cometh good." A striking illustration of this truth is manifest in the halo of true glory that encircles the name we have placed at the head of this article. Out of the awful collision of rival nations meeting in arms, from the midst of a carnage the recital of which, as it was wafted across the water in successive episodes, made our blood run cold within us, rose one pure, radiant image of virgin womanhood, claiming our admiration for the sex which it represented, and producing the conviction that angels have their abode on earth as well as in heaven. It was reserved for a period of bloodshed and calamity, for the highest storm of human passions, to produce the spectacle of a high-bred and delicately-nurtured English girl, leaving her beautiful home in a peaceful country and plunging into abhorrent scenes of strife, not to lend on embattled hosts like Joan of Arc, but to breathe the pestilential air of plague-infested rooms, to face the most horrible forms of mutilation and suffering, and to soothe with her kind words, her glorious presence, and her untiring hands, the anguish of physical and mental woe, and the bitter pangs of the parting hour, "to shrive the dying, bless the dead." Her long and weary task accomplished, she set her face homeward. On her way, she did not seek reaction from brilliant pageants and splendid assemblies, but turned aside to visit the abodes of suffering and sickness. Had she chosen, her reception in England would have been such as the proudest conqueror might have envied; for she came wearing no blood-stained trophies, but the vires of all hearts. But she has declined every public demonstration of regard. Only when the mechanics, her neighbors, wrote her a letter of congratulation, she replied in the kindly, warm-hearted language befitting her modest and beautiful nature. As the type of truest womanhood, we honor Florence Nightingale from our "heart of hearts." Long after the laurels of the Crimea shall have faded, the wreath of immortelles that circles her name will bloom in unfaded brightness.

SPEECH AND SILENCE.—Bishop Hall says that "the ear and the eye are the mind's receivers, but the tongue is only busy in expending the treasure received." Now we have known a good many gossip tongues busy in retailing what eye hath not seen nor ear heard. To be sure, the stuff was slander, not treasure.

COMFORTABLE.—The "Prairie" shows that the production of breadstuffs has not kept pace with the increase of population in this country, with the single exception of Indian corn, and that, consequently, prices must continue to rule high.

SCOLDING HUSBANDS.—We hear stories enough of scolding wives, but none of scolding husbands. Yet there are plenty of male scolds, and they are the most unmitigated nuisances in creation.

BORROWED PLUMES.

There are very few people in the world who are not troubled with a propensity to masquerade it; to get out of the clothes and characters that fit them, and put on something else. Men as meek as Moses are intensely fond of donning tremendous bearskin caps, and carrying enormous muskets, and talking about volunteering, or privatizing, whenever a war breaks out in any part of the world. Savage looking and savage feeling fellows, who take fire at a word or a look, and occasionally knock down porters and hackney coachmen by way of airing their belligerent propensities, are almost always members and orators of peace societies. Excellent prose writers, whose essays have the charm and polish of Goldsmith, Irving and Addison, persist in writing what they call poetry. Little jolly men, overflowing with wit and humor, will do nothing but write tragedies. Undertakers are proverbially fat, well-to-do fellows, with a merry twinkle in the corners of their eyes and mouths; and Shakespeare understood human nature perfectly, when he made his grave-diggers, in Hamlet, crack jokes over the remains of poor humanity. Liston, the English comic actor, a glimpse of whose face was enough to set a crowded house in a roar, was consumed with a desire to play Richard III. and King Lear—the heroic and pathetic. The regal beauty, whose charms would be fitly matched by a display of costly jewelry, is generally attired with great simplicity; while the ugly old dowager, like Shakspeare's trollop,

"Wears yet a precious jewel in her head."

And speaking of jewels and borrowed plumes, the best illustration of our position is a scrap from the New York correspondent of the Evening Gazette. He says:—"Opposite the St. Nicholas Hotel is the celebrated jewelry establishment of the Tiffany's. A few weeks since, two ladies called there to look at some articles of jewelry. They could not decide upon them, however, but requested that a certain necklace and bracelet should be sent to the St. Nicholas at a particular hour. The party happened to be just going down to dinner, and the person was requested to leave them, and call in about an hour. Ascertaining at the office that they were respectable people, he did so, and the articles were returned with a message that they would call the next day. The next day about the same hour a note was received, requesting that another necklace and bracelet (describing them) might be sent to the hotel, which was complied with; they were likewise returned. And for three or four days the same thing was repeated, when the party left town without making a purchase! A few days afterwards a gentleman boarding at the hotel called at the store to select a present for a lady; and seeing some articles he thought he recognized, exclaimed: 'Why, surely I have seen those before.' He was assured that such could not possibly be the case, as the patterns were entirely original. 'Why,' said he, quite confidently, 'they were worn by a young lady who was stopping at the St. Nicholas, and who each day at dinner appeared with a different necklace and bracelet; and they were evidently so valuable, that she was besieged with interesting gentlemen, and enjoyed the envy of all the female boarders.' A light broke upon the mind of the storekeeper, and I do not think the trick can be repeated there."

THE BRIDE OF PARIS:

—OR—

THE ROLL OF THE DRUM!

A ROMANCE OF THE REVOLUTION, THE REIGN OF TERROR, AND THE DAYS OF NAPOLEON THE GREAT.

BY FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE.

We shall next week commence in "The Flag of our Union" a most vivid and interesting novelette entitled as above. We will not say one word in advance for it. It will tell its own story, and make a sensation exceeding all its predecessors in those columns. This is another of the brilliant series of novelettes which are constantly appearing in "The Flag of our Union."

NEW ESTABLISHMENT.—We have no hesitation in saying that our next door neighbor, P. J. Mayer, has the handsomest confectionery establishment in this city. It has just been fitted up at great cost, and in exquisite taste. Mr. and Mrs. Mayer, so long established in Tremont Street, have earned a high reputation for the excellence of their manufactory in all the delicate articles pertaining to their business.

A MAGICIAN.—McAllister, the magician, who died lately in New York, had travelled all over the world in his professional capacity. He was not only an excellent legerdemain performer, but a fine, liberal gentleman. His accomplishments were numerous; he was an excellent chemist and electrician, and conversed fluently in four or five languages.

AUSTRIAN MEANNESS.—Cesare Cantu, the Italian historian, has been refused permission by the Austrian government, to accept or wear the order of the cross of Saint Maurice and Saint Lazarus, presented him on account of his literary attainments, by the king of Sardinia.

A MODEL CORONER.—A man drowned himself at a Western city, recently. The coroner could not find the body, but to make sure of his fees, held an inquest on his jacket, which had fortunately turned up with the tide. Verdict, "found empty."

DEFAULTERS.—These gentry are not confined to the United States. The cashier of the Northern Railway, in France, lately went off with a million francs in his pocket.

A FEMALE ARTIST.

Miss Rosa Bonheur, a young Frenchwoman, is winning a most brilliant reputation abroad in a rather singular line of painting for a lady—the portraiture of animals. To this branch of art she has devoted herself for years with unswerving assiduity, commencing her studies from nature when a mere child. To further her pursuit, she frequents all the horse fairs in the neighborhood of Paris, disguised in male attire, and she is only known to the dealers as a very enthusiastic young gentleman with a remarkable taste for horseflesh. When she meets with a fine animal, she buys him—for Rosa is rich—mounts him on a carolier, and rides him home. The horse is introduced into her studio—a large parlor, where he stands on a brick platform, and Rosa goes to work on his portrait. There are two of her pictures in the Athenaeum gallery this year. Rosa possesses a remarkable power over animals. We don't know whether her secret of taming them consists, like her fair countrywoman, Miss Isabelle, in "carrots or kindness," or the fascination of a fearless eye, but certain it is she finds no rebellious subjects among her four-footed sitters. She has lately visited the Scotch Highlands in search of subjects. She receives fabulous prices for her works. And by the way, "talking horse," reminds us that we have a young artist in this city, Mr. Marsten, who promises to paint horses as well as Rosa Bonheur—he cannot—no one can—excel her.

AUTUMN.—On our last page we have placed a large allegorical picture, representing autumn. The figures in this scene are boldly and freely sketched. The huntsman and the reaper in the foreground, are bearing on their shoulders old Silenus—the preceptor of Bacchus, who has partaken so freely of the juice of the abundant vintage that he is unable to stand or walk. The horn of plenty, the heaped fruits in the foreground, the procession with sheaves of wheat and other produce, typify the prodigality of the season, while the round harvest moon rising in the distance, completes the fullness of the allegory.

FORESTIAN.—John Brougham has made a great hit in New York by his personation of the hero in his burlesque of "Metamora, the last of the Pollywogs," in imitation of Edwin Forrest. Brougham is one of the best mimics on the boards.

VOCALISM.—Madame Angri, as dashing a vocalist as Vestrali the magnificent, who has gone to manage the Mexican opera, is engaged for a six months' tour in the United States. We shall be angry ourselves if we are disappointed in her.

A FAT OFFICE.—The office of corporation counsel to the city government of New York is stated to be worth $10,000 a year. Quite a windfall to a poor lawyer of ability!

TWILL EVER BE SO.

BY ROLANDE.

I drift out on the sea of dreams,
In shallow-bark with silken sail;
And losing sight of life and friends,
I gaze beyond earth's dusky veil.

I catch a glimpse of coming things,
I see the holy saints of God;
And shed a tear to think that men
Have not more in their footsteps trod.

And o'er the sea there comes a wail,
That maketh moan, "Twill e'er be so;
And ever in the downward way
Their footsteps sad will come and go."

I wake to earth; I moor my bark
Upon the steadfast shores of life;
And losing sight of coming things,
I share again in earthly strife.

"Twill e'er be so! 'Twill e'er be so!"
It singeth sadly in mine ears;
Ah, more, why stearest not thy bark
Beyond this gloomy "vale of tears?"

RESTORING A HUSBAND.

BY JOHN THOMAS.

ONE pleasant morning in the fall, I was sitting alone in my office, conning over a brief I had just prepared for a case then pending, when I heard a knock on my door, and in walked a young looking woman, with a pleasantly sad expression of countenance, carefully dressed, who desired to know if I could transact a little legal business for her.

She immediately seated herself, and after some hesitation began and went through with her story.

It seemed that her husband, who was given to turns of extreme dissipation, had deserted her of his own choice, and she had heard nothing from him for a number of years. At first, she was unwilling to believe that his absence was anything more than temporary, as he had at several times forgotten his obligations to her in this way; but, finding it became protracted indefinitely, she entertained fears for his safety.

Thoughtless, apparently, of his wife's distress of mind, and caring nothing whether she ever received tidings of him or not, he followed after his own inclinations, and led the life of a wretched vagabond. Yet he carefully kept his whereabouts a secret from his wife's ears. Perhaps in this one particular he did have some regard for her feelings. She gave me her name as Mrs. Malloes.

"Henry," said she, "was once my all in all; and"—the tears swimming in her blue eyes—"I love him now as much as I ever did. I pity him so."

Poor woman! How much was she to be pitied herself!

"I have earned a living for myself and my little girl," she continued, "ever since I was left alone. Besides that, I have bought a little plain, but necessary furniture, and put something into the savings bank."

"He has been gone several years, you say?" I asked her.

"Yes, sir; he must have been, in order to give a poor woman like myself any time to lay aside a little money."

"I suppose you wish to secure your savings, then, against—"

"Yes, sir. He must not have them! It never will do! Think of my child!"

I told her what the law was, and regretted that such a law was tolerated on the statute book.

She looked at me as if she wanted to tear the leaf out of the statutes with her own hand.

"I knew how it was," said she, "and for that purpose have prepared to take a step that otherwise I never would take in the world. I must obtain a divorce."

I studied her countenance well, for it challenged my scrutiny then. It was that of a brave and noble woman, who from duty and principle makes a sacrifice whose greatness the world can never measure.

"I wish it could be avoided," said she; "but how is it possible? Even if he returns and claims what I have saved, before a separation is legally effected, he can take it all without any power of mine to prevent it. Is it not so?"

I was obliged to confess it was.

"Then," said she, with a sad resolution, "this step must be taken. It tears my heart, but I will do my duty to my child."

I therefore took such data from her lips as enabled me to bring a petition before the proper court. While I sat making the memorandum, she threw in various exclamations of sorrow at the state of things with her, that excited me with unusual sympathy. I know that lawyers are not apt to be the most sentimental of men, nor to cultivate on their part the liveliest of sensibilities. But here was a case to challenge, in many of its connecting circumstances, the sympathy of any living creature. I did not hesitate, accordingly, to render the poor lady a full measure of my better feelings in return for her sorrow; and I shall never hesitate, I hope, to do so in any person's case that may happen to come in my way.

"Poor Henry!" she would say. "Poor Henry! I loved him so much! I can't but love him yet! How can I forget those early days?"

The safest way for me was, while she talked thus and cried too, to hold my head down as closely as possible to my paper. At some points of her story, I do not believe I could have looked her in the face without helping the unhappy creature along with tears of my own.

"When we were married," said she again, "I didn't think of days like these. I wouldn't have believed it if my best friend had told me they were sure to come. I loved Henry—poor Henry! And I know how truly then he loved me. But he has been led astray. He never would do this of himself; some one else must have led him off into it."

After a time I succeeded in collecting all the facts from her that were necessary to the business, and pushed back from the table. She once more inquired of me:

"I cannot prevent his taking all, except by bringing this petition for divorce?"

"I see no other escape," I told her.

"Then," said she, with a heavy countenance indeed, "the matter is settled forever. I am to be without the husband of my youth! I am to live and die alone! Good day, sir. I loved Henry before he took to these courses. Ah, sir, I love him now! I would make any sacrifice, if I could thus avert this dreadful step!"

And she took her leave sadly of me, as if she were passing out into the dark shadow of a cloud.

I sat undisturbed in my office for several hours, rumioating on the hard case that had just been presented. I thought with myself it was a fearful matter this to divorce husband and wife forever, when perhaps happy circumstances might yet intervene to reconcile their differences; and I felt it worse than all that a law should be allowed to stand on the pages of the statute book, which drove an unprotected woman to petition for a divorce in order to save her little property.

The more I thought about it, the harder it seemed to me to be. Yet I knew well enough there was no present remedy for a case like this, but this single one she had felt forced to choose. Her husband had been away from her—had voluntarily deserted her for a number of years—long enough to warrant the granting of her petition, under the provisions of the law. He deserved to be cut off from a true and loving woman whom he had so basely betrayed, and I hoped to be an instrument in bringing about such a result.

Even while I sat there thus occupied, the door opened, and there walked in a man of perhaps thirty-five summers, who removed his hat at once and sat down in the chair which my unhappy client had vacated.

He stated that he was a person long absent from the city, and therefore he wanted legal advice. I expressed myself ready to deal it out to him, of course.

"I expect my wife is somewhere in the city," said he, "and I'm anxious to find her. Can you help me? And after that, I want more help."

"What is your name?" was my first question.

"Henry Malloes," said he.

I was thunderstruck. Taking another careful look at him, I discovered that his face and dress evinced every mark of dissipation. I could see plainly enough that he had but just returned from a long absence of that character, having abandoned his course only till he could in some way recruit his pockets, and come back determined to strip his poor wife of all she had. To see the man of whom I had been thinking, so soon—the very cause of the trouble over which my unhappy client grieved—rather startled me, albeit I am somewhat accustomed to surprises of this character. I watched and studied him closely. I could not for a moment keep my eyes off of him.

From his own telling, I became convinced that he was determined to find his wife again, simply to live off of her or to appropriate her savings if she had any. At one time even suggested that as he had been absent so long, according to his own confession, she might perhaps have obtained a legal separation.

He was struck with surprise at the possibility of such a thing; then declared it could not be possible, for he knew Mary would never do such a thing; and finally sprang to his feet with excitement, and said he must find her at once. I saw his urgency, and took advantage of it.

"I can help you," said I.

"Can you?" he asked, his face lighting quickly.

"Come here to-morrow afternoon at half-past three o'clock, will you? Not a moment before, however. Be punctual at that hour, and you shall find your interests all answered."

He promised me with much eagerness, and took his leave.

"Meantime," said I, as he was shutting the door, "keep perfectly quiet. Do not make a single inquiry of any one. I can help you if anybody can."

He bowed his thanks and was gone. A few minutes afterwards I left my office in search of the residence of the wife. She had given me her street and number, and I had no difficulty in finding her.

"I want you to be at my office to-morrow afternoon, at four o'clock," said I; "not five minutes sooner, however."

"Yes, sir," she answered, satisfied that I was looking closely after her interests.

I passed the night more awake than asleep, thinking how I could best secure the object I had in view; how that odious and inhuman law could be evaded, that otherwise was certain to make a wreck of this unhappy woman's household. The forenoon slipped away as it always did. After dinner I sat and waited for half-past three o'clock to come. I was apprised of the fact of its arrival by the opening of the door, and the entrance of my man again.

"Punctual!" said he.

He looked better than on the previous day, though I could see he had still been feeding the fires of dissipation over night. I led him into a back room, leaving the door ajar, and sat down and began conversation with him. I saw more plainly than before that he was determined to get all his wife had, whatever it might be. And still, from various questions put to him to divert his thoughts to other objects, I saw as plainly that at heart he loved his wife, and might possibly yet become a devoted and noble husband.

While we were occupied with nothing but these generalities, I keeping his curiosity piqued to learn what I might have of importance to communicate, the town clock hard by struck four. Involuntarily I started in my chair. At the same moment the door opened in the other room. I told my man to sit still a few moments and I would be back again. But in going out, I was careful to leave the door ajar, that all we said in the outer office might be overheard.

The poor lady was there, prompt enough. I asked her to be seated, she little thinking that the cause of all her trouble was just in the other room. She waited apparently for me to introduce the subject for which I had requested her attendance.

"I can obtain your bill for you, I think," said I, in a loud tone; "but if I should tell you that your little savings would be untouched without this proceeding, would you still insist on carrying it through?"

"No, never, sir; never in the world!" she answered, clasping her hands. "I would not cast Henry away! I love him yet! I always shall love him! He may wrong me more than he has, but it will make no difference with my heart. I do this only for the sake of my dear little girl. She must be cared for, let who may be the sufferer. O, dear Henry; why wouldn't you be to me what you once was?"

This last exclamation was uttered in such a touching tone, and came so fresh from her wounded heart, that a man must have been less than a man who could have heard it unmoved. In an instant almost, the repentant husband, moved by her words of anguish and supplication, came rushing out from the inner room and threw his arms around his wife. He called on her to forgive him—to forgive him! His heart was smitten. To find her thus true to him through the whole of his treachery, and to bear from her own lips that she still loved him in spite of his negligence, cut even him to the quick of his nature. He could bear it no longer.

They embraced, and wept, and embraced each other again. He confessed his guilt. He declared that she should thus suffer no longer. She forgave him all, and withdrew her petition for divorce altogether. I saw them leave my office with joy in company. They went home. Since that time he has been an altered man, and a model husband. And I sometimes love to think I may have had a hand in it all.

WE LIVE IN DEEDS, NOT YEARS.

A pleasant, cheerful, generous, charitable-minded woman is never old. Her heart is as young at sixty or seventy as it was at eighteen or twenty; and they who are old at sixty or seventy are not made old by time. They are made old by the ravages of passion, and feelings of an unsocial and ungenerous nature, which have cankered their minds, wrinkled their spirits and withered their souls. They are made old by envy, by jealousy, by hatred, by uncharitable feelings, by slanderous, scandalizing, ill-bred habits, which if they avoid, they preserve their youth to the very last, so that the child shall die, as the Scripture says, a hundred years old. There are many old women who pride themselves on being eighteen or twenty. Pride is an old passion, and vanity is gray as the mountain; they are dry, heartless, dull, cold, indifferent; they want the well-spring of youthful affection, which is always cheerful, always active, always engaged in some labor of love that is calculated to promote and distribute enjoyment. There is an old age of the heart that is possessed by many who have no suspicion that there is anything old about them, and there is a youth which never grows old, a lover who is ever a boy, a Psyche who is ever a girl.—Life Illustrated.

HOW THE FLY WALKS ON THE CEILING.

How the fly manages to walk over the smoothest surface with his feet upward, in defiance of the law of gravity, is a phenomenon that would interest us more than it does were it not so common. It has been generally supposed that his feet were supplied with valves or suckers, and that he is thus enabled to hold himself upwards by atmospheric pressure. Others have attributed this peculiar power to the secretion of a sticky liquid in the feet, which enables him to sustain himself in this seemingly unnatural position. The microscope has demonstrated that in many insects of the fly kind, the foot is furnished with a pair of membranous expansions, termed pulvilli, commonly known as valves, and that these are beset with numerous hairs, each of which has a minute disk at its extremity. There is no doubt that this apparatus is connected with the power these insects possess of walking with the feet upwards, but there is still some uncertainty as to the precise manner in which it ministers to this faculty. Recent observations of Mr. Hepworth, published in the Quarterly Journal of Microscopic Science, has led him to the conclusion that the minute disk at the end of the hairs on the pulvilli act as suckers, each secreting a liquid, which, though not viscid, serves to make its adhesion perfect.

NAVAL GUNNERY.

In firing into masses of timber, or any solid substance, that velocity which can but just penetrate will occasion the greatest shake, and tear off the greatest number of and largest splinters; consequently, in close actions, shot discharged with the full quantity of powder tears off fewer splinters than balls fired from the same nature of guns with reduced charges. In naval actions, shot intended to take effect upon the hull of an enemy should rather be discharged with a falling than with a rising side; but such pieces as may be appointed specially to act against the masts and rigging, should be fired, on the contrary, with the rising motion, the aim being taken low. In all close actions, the great object should be to strike as often as possible the enemy's hull. One or two twenty-four pound shot taking effect just below the water line, and perhaps perforating both sides of a small vessel, will in general either force her to surrender, or send her to the bottom; and such an injury is much more likely to be occasioned by firing with a falling than with a raising motion.—*N. ## CITY OF ROME, GEORGIA.

We present on this page a fine engraving, from a drawing by Hill, reduced from a most elaborate delineation made for us by Mr. A. Grinevald, on the spot. It represents faithfully the flourishing city of Rome, the capital of Floyd county, Georgia, which is situated at the confluence of the Etowah and Oostenaula Rivers, forming the Coosa. It is 170 miles northwest of Milledgeville. Its site, embracing several hills, affords an extensive view of some of the finest scenery in the State. Steamboats of light draught navigate the Coosa, and ascend as far as this place. One of these, with a stern paddle-wheel, is shown in the centre of our engraving, as well as a second boat with side wheels. The opening of the branch railroad from this city to the Western and Atlantic Railroad, at Kingston, in 1847, gave a sensible impulse to the business of the place, and hastened its growth. About 200,000 bales of cotton are shipped here annually. Rome was chosen as the county seat in 1834, and received a city charter in 1847. The population is over three thousand. The river which flows in front, is the Etowah, crossed by the Etowah bridge on the river—the Coosa River being shown on the extreme left. The water seen over Cunningham & Co.'s store, above the steamboat on the left is the Oostenaula, there crossed by a covered bridge. At the end of the Etowah bridge is seen the railroad station with a train of cars. The building just below the nearest steeple is the Etowah House, and the steeple belongs to the Presbyterian church. The Baptist church is just beyond it. The Episcopal church is yet further on the horizon, a neat building with a square tower. The court house stands just this side of it. On the same line, and in about the centre of the picture, backed by the trees, over the two funnels of the left hand steamer, is the Cherokee Female College, with the residences of Col. S. Fouch and Hon. John H. Lampkin on the right and left. Between the two steeples on the summit of the hill we have a glimpse of the male academy. The Odd Fellows have a neat hall in the place. The citizen and the traveller familiar with the city will readily recognize other local points in this picture, such as the Masonic Hall, the post-office, and the hospitable mansions of the leading citizens. The situation of Rome is certainly very romantic, and the buildings of which it is composed are neat, pretty and unostentatious. No matter how crowded it becomes, it will always be a picturesque place. The streets are laid out of a liberal width, permitting a free circulation of air, and allowing ample accommodation for present and prospective travel. Our olden cities on the seashore are sadly cramped in this respect. Their founders had no idea of the future greatness of the country, and probably did not look forward to the aggregation of more than mere villages, where now flourishing cities rear their roofs and spires. This want of foresight has entailed the most serious inconveniences on the people of the present day. The older portions of New York and Boston proper are examples of this. Narrow, dark and winding streets present formidable obstacles to the transaction of business, to say nothing of their unhealthiness. Even Broadway, in the Imperial city, is too restricted for the tide of life that flows through it from morning till night, and to cross it in safety during the busiest part of the day is quite an achievement. But we of the present day are forewarned. We see examples of such extraordinary growth in our towns and cities, that when the field is open, in establishing and regulating a growing place, we can guard against the unconscious errors of our forefathers. The settlers of villages in those days look to see them grow into large towns, and from large towns to large cities, and are therefore ready to meet coming contingencies. If our cities were laid out on a liberal plan, with broad streets and parks, they would no longer be proverbial for unhealthiness.

THE LOST HEIR:

—OR, THE—

YOUNG AMERICAN SOLDIER.

A TALE OF 1812.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

[CONCLUDED.]

CHAPTER XXIII.

BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.

ANOTHER year had made its advent. It was a clear, cold evening, and Mrs. Hamlen, her daughter and her niece were sitting before the fire, sad and dispirited. Footsteps were heard in the hall, and the next minute Mr. Grosvenor, accompanied by Wilton Richmond, entered the apartment.

"He has been weighed in the balance," said Mr. Grosvenor, "and has not been found wanting."

A single fervent, heartfelt exclamation of joy and thanksgiving escaped the lips of Bessie, as she rose and sprang to meet him who had so long been absent, while the welcome accorded him by Mrs. Hamlen and Edith carried with it a warmth and sincerity which left nothing to be desired. But in such cases, when tears are gilded with smiles, and questions are asked and answered in a way so earnest and eloquent as to show that they arise from the truest and liveliest interest in each other's welfare, imagination can well supply the place of description.

Wilton related to them the manner in which he had been decoyed to the shore of the bay, in the expectation of meeting Mr. Grosvenor, and how he had been conveyed aboard one of the vessels of the British flotilla, which soon afterwards ascended the Patuxet, for the purpose of aiding the troops of General Ross in the contemplated attack on the city of Washington. Previously to the attack, he succeeded in making his escape, and in joining the brave band under Commodore Barney, a part of which, when the moment of conflict arrived, being overpowered by superior numbers, were compelled to surrender themselves prisoners of war. Among these was Wilton, but an exchange of prisoners soon afterwards took place, which enabled him to assist in defending the American works at the time they were unsuccessfully attacked by Sir George Prevost, and to behold, instead of the British flag, the "star-spangled banner waving in triumph over the waters of the Champlain."

Of his own bravery he made no mention, but had there been a shadow of doubt existing as to his patriotism, caused by the ascription which Withers so scudulously labored to cast upon him, it must have been removed by the courage and valor which made him conspicuous, where all were brave.

Wilton had only time to fairly finish the narration of what had befallen him, when a letter was handed to Edith, superscribed in the well-known handwriting of Sedley Austin. She was silent as to the contents of the first closely-written page, but the remainder she read aloud.

"On the eighth of this month (January, 1815,) was fought the memorable battle of Orleans—memorable for its results, but still more so for the disparity of the loss on either side. Though in the midst of winter, the air was balmy and the sky serene. The British outnumbering, by more than half, the Americans, were composed of the veterans of a hundred battles. Trained in the school of the redoubtable Wellington, they had quailed to defeat and triumphed in victory. They had risen superior to the one, and gazed only on the splendor of the other. They had helped to remove the yoke, which for twenty years had galled the neck of Europe, and had now crossed the Atlantic in search of new fields on which to display their prowess. Having conquered victory in the old world, they sought fresh triumphs in the new. The idea of defeat had never flitted upon the imagination, or the thought of reverse embittered expectation. With the wreath of victory still fresh upon their brow, they marched to the conquest of booty and beauty. In their assurance, the one had been assigned as the reward of victory, and the other appropriated as the solace of toil.

"Without invoking the protection of Jove, or deprecating the wrath of Juno, they moved on in all the circumstance and panoply of war, to the work of death. Arrived within range, the American artillery swept away whole ranks of the advancing columns. Like the lion, conscious of impediments, but sure of the prey, without a step stayed or a spure unfilled, they steadily advanced to the assault.

"And now the infantry, posted in two lines behind an almost impenetrable breastwork, completed the destruction the artillery had so auspiciously commenced. A blaze of fire shot along the American line, as unerring as it was incessant. The field, as if by some sudden convulsion of nature, was strewn with dead and wounded. The leader fell, another bit the dust, and still another succumbed. The veterans of a hundred fights wavered for a moment, recoiled, and then fled in confusion. The proud array of the invader, confident of victory and bent on spoil, on which the morning sun rose, scattered the plain, or fled discomfited, ere evening drew her curtain. The night which followed a day so ominous, the enemy sought their ships, and the booty of Orleans remained safe in her warehouses, and her beauty slept quietly in their beds.

"On the first intelligence of the meditated attack, the general hastened to the defence of Orleans. His presence restored unanimity to the city and inspired confidence in the motley inhabitants. The citizen was lost in the soldier. One mind devised the means of defence, inspired the energies which raised the works, and directed the prowess which saved the city. Never was trust more complete, never was confidence more worthily bestowed.

"Aware that his forces were marksmen rather than soldiers, he set about the means to avail himself of that quality. He knew how little marksmanship profited in the open field, and that its preponderancy was incalculable behind defences. The staple of the country supplied the means, and the planter and the merchant vied with each other in furnishing the material. How well he availed himself of this advantage, the result has told more eloquently than language can paint."

"By this time," said Mr. Grosvenor, when his daughter had finished reading, "I should think that the British lion is covered with scars rather than glory."

"While our eagle soars higher than ever," said Wilton. "But Sedley might have said a few words as to what befell himself during the battle."

"We all know," said Mr. Grosvenor, "that Sedley's modesty is equal to his bravery, which may very well account for the omission."

Edith's countenance lighted up, and she cast a grateful look on her father, for the delicate, and as she well knew, just praise contained in this remark.

They were soon joined by several friends and neighbors, for it had already been whispered round that Edith had received a letter post-marked New Orleans. News of the glorious victory had arrived in the newspapers, but they were anxious to hear from Sedley Austin, who was their personal friend.

CHAPTER XXIV.

A MEETING ARRANGED BETWEEN RICHMOND AND WITHERS.

HABIT had made Wilton an early riser, and while standing on an eminence some distance from the house, to watch the rising of the sun, a glimpse of the cottage of Dame Anstis recalled her to mind. He had become convinced that the dark-eyed woman, of whom he had a faint remembrance, must have been his nurse and not his mother, as, at an early period, he had sometimes imagined. The cameo portrait had been carefully, even sacredly treasured since the time when, in the chamber of the mansion now in the possession of Withers, he had compared it with the likeness of Florence Percival.

If Anstis Fay was his nurse—and he had strong reasons for believing that she was—she might know its history. Full of this thought, he bent his steps towards her cottage. She had already risen, and as soon as the customary greetings were over, he withdrew the cameo, still attached to its silken band, from its enclosure. "Do you remember of ever seeing this before?" said he, placing it in her hand.

"It would be strange if I didn't," was her reply. "It was purchased by Mr. Thomas Percival, because of its striking resemblance to his wife, and this delicate silken band was mostly the work of her hands. Her health had for a long time been failing, and at last she grew so weak that she could do no more. So one day she put it into my hands, and requested me to finish it. When it was done, and the cameo attached to it, she called her little son to her, as she sat in her easy-chair, and put it round his neck—your neck, I should say, for I as much believe that Thomas and Florence Percival were your parents, as I do in my own existence."

Much more was said, and other incidents called up, which have been alluded to elsewhere, and which it is unnecessary to recapitulate. In less than an hour afterward, Hammett, mounted on a good horse, was on his way to the old Percival mansion with the subjoined note, addressed to Withers, in his pocket:

"Sir,—I have for some time past been accumulating facts, which now form a chain of evidence, by means of which I am prepared to prove that I am the grandson of the late Edgar Percival, and that my parents were Thomas and Florence Percival. A knowledge of this, I presume, is all that you will require to induce you to yield me peaceable possession of the inheritance of which I have so long been defrauded. I have instructed my messenger—Hammett Fay—to wait for your answer. From him long known as Wilton Richmond, though entitled to the name of Edgar Percival."

Hammett was not one to loiter by the way, and on his arrival, representing that he had pressing business, he was at once admitted to the presence of Withers. As he rapidly glanced his eye over the note which Hammett handed him, an almost cadaverous hue overspread his countenance, which was quickly succeeded by a dark, purple flush. This, too, soon passed away, giving place to that peculiar look of hypocritical meekness which had, in Bessie Hamlen, excited such a loathing, during the early part of their acquaintance. At the same time there was something in his whole demeanor which betrayed a strong desire to appear amiable and conciliatory. He ordered refreshments to be prepared for Hammett, and told him the answer to Mr. Percival's note would soon be ready.

Hammett had just drawn back from the table, when Withers entered the room, and with a smile, handed him a neatly folded missive directed to "Edgar Percival." Hammett, when he arrived at Mrs. Hamlen's, found Wilton and Mr. Grosvenor in the parlor by themselves.

"Here is a letter," said he, "for Edgar Percival."

"Ab, the villain recognizes your claim!" said Mr. Grosvenor.

Wilton tore open the letter, and read aloud:

"Sir,—I hope that you will do me the justice to believe that I have not the least inclination to contest your claim to the estate of the late Edgar Percival. Till within a short time, I entertained no doubt that, as was generally believed, you were drowned when only two or three years old. You cannot desire that the affair should be amicably adjusted more earnestly than I do. As I shall, as in duty bound, make immediate arrangements to quit the premises, I shall be happy to see you at the old Percival estate at your earliest convenience, where henceforth, after having been so long tossed on life's stormy waves, I trust you will find a peaceful haven."

"And do you mean to let the kidnapper, traitor and would-be-murderer escape the doom he so richly deserves?" said Mr. Grosvenor, when Wilton had finished reading it.

"Between ourselves, it is known by one individual, at least, that it is he who shot Maxon."

"Well, we will let things take their course then. Shall you act upon his hint, and proceed to take immediate possession of your estate?"

"I believe it will be the best way. He is so full of trickery that if I only give him time enough, he will hate up some vile piece of fraud which may put me to some trouble. For this reason, the person who can testify against him in the case of Maxon, is to keep still till he hears from me."

After the departure of Hammett, Withers paced up and down the floor for half an hour, with a rapidity that showed that he was greatly agitated. At the end of that time he left the room, and stepping across the hall, opened the door of Mrs. Grey's apartment.

"Where's old Elsie?" said he.

"She has been gone since early in the morning," she replied.

"When she comes, send her to me."

"Shall you be in the parlor, sir?"

"No—in my chamber. I am not to be caught by his conciliatory note," thought Withers, as he sat waiting for Elsie. "I can see through his policy. He intends to get peaceable possession of the property, and then I shall be arrested as a kidnapper, and maybe something worse than that, for some one must have heard and seen the whole transaction at the time he was carried off, or how could he be in possession of facts which will prove him to be the lost heir? The man I employed, and who died at Dorson's but a while ago, let drop some hints, but as near as I can find out, they were too indefinite to amount to much. It must have been Madge. I always thought that she knew more than I could make her tell, and I was a fool!"

At this moment, his mental soliloquy was cut short by the voice of Elsie humming an old song in a low, droning tone, as she came along the passage which led to his room. She opened the door, just so that she could put her head into the room, and glancing her eyes round in a wild, deprecating way, as if she felt afraid that she shouldn't be allowed to enter, she said, in a hoarse whisper:

"Did you send for me, Ishmael?"

"Yes, you old fool you! Come in and shut the door."

"Your days won't be long in the land, Ishmael Withers."

"How do you know?"

"How do I know? Haven't you just called your own mother a fool? And doesn't one of the commandments say, 'Honor thy father and mother, that thy days may be long in the land which—'"

"I will listen to that some other time. I've something of importance to say to you now. What has become of that little vial, full of a dark colored liquid, I saw you have a few weeks since?"

"It's safe."

"Give it to me."

"The vial is full of deadly poison."

"That is why I wish for it."

"You'll do some mischief with it. Two drops of it would kill a man."

"Are you certain?"

"Do you ask if I'm certain, when,

I gathered the roots at dead of night,
By the full moon's pale and spectral light,
When I muttered o'er each charm and a spell,
Then, in water drawn from the haunted well,
Distilled them and caught each drop as it fell,
Though o'er me the deadly vapors curled—
Though round me the scorching flames were whirled—"

"Enough of your senseless gibberish! Give me the vial."

"I won't be commanded by my own son, when 'tisn't to blind people. For your sake, Ishmael, I have for more than twenty-five years submitted to be an underling, because you said it would keep you from rising in the world, if 'twas known that such a poor creature as I was your mother. I've sat at the table with the servants and eaten from coarse earthen, when you sat in the sumptuous dining-hall, and was served from costly plate. Thinking about it, and how you've ordered me round like a dog, has crazed this poor old head; but I've never cursed you, Ishmael. I've tried to, but never could, for I always remembered how you used to smile upon me when you were a wee-bit thing in your cradle."

"This is all vain and idle talk. That vial I must and will have."

"I know what you want it for, but there's no blood on these hands, and I don't mean there ever shall be."

"You complain because you sit at table with the servants. You shall be treated the same as if you were the first lady in the land, if you'll give me the vial."

"And shall I have the keys of old Dame Percival's drawers, so that I can wear the brave silks and satins, the velvets and brocades, and the feathers and fine laces, the same as she used to wear them, when she sat at the head of the table in the dining-hall?"

"Yes, for all what I care."

"Promise solemnly."

"Well, I promise."

"Here it is, then, and woe to you if you use it for a bad purpose! Now give me the keys."

"You shall have them all in good time."

"Yet after all, what will it avail me? If I dress ever so fine, and tell people that I am the mother of the rich Mr. Withers they'll naly say to each other, 'Old Elsie is crazed!' And if they should ask you about me, you'll only smile the way I've seen you sometimes, and they won't know as I shall that there's a lie in your smile, and so they'll say, 'Poor creature, what strange notions she does have in her old crazy head!'

CHAPTER XXV.

RETRIBUTION.

ABOUT an hour after sunset, Wilton turned into the avenue leading to the mansion of the Percivals.

"Captain Richmond," said a voice.

He checked his horse, and some one from the side of the avenue approached him. There was yet light enough to show him it was Numa.

"My old friend, I am glad to see you," said Wilton, shaking him heartily by the hand.

"Yes—I am your friend, though a humble one," said Numa, "and that is why I am here. Be on your guard. Mr. Withers is expecting you, and it would have been well had you brought a friend or two with you."

"I have two, in the shape of a pair of double-barrelled pistols, well loaded."

"I fear that no good is intended you, but you have a coward to deal with, and with the two friends you speak of ready to your hand, I believe you have nothing to fear, if you keep well on your guard."

"I won't forget to do that," said Wilton.

Numa now fell back, for a turn in the avenue, a few rods ahead, would bring them in sight of the front part of the house. Wilton quickened the speed of his horse, and was soon at the door, near which a servant stood ready to lend his horse to the stable.

Withers met him and welcomed him in the most obsequious manner, and with many a smile, every one of which, to use old Elsie's words, had a lie in it.

"Welcome, welcome—a thousand times welcome to your home, Mr. Percival! It is best to call you by your right name, you know, that you may become familiarized to it;" and as Withers said this, he proffered Wilton his hand.

"No, Mr. Withers," said he, drawing back and bowing coldly. "There can be no feeling existing between us akin to friendship, or even good will, and we will, if you please, consider it the same as if we met under a flag of truce."

"As you will, though I hoped that bygones would be looked upon as bygones. I trust, however, I shall not forget, now that I am acting as host the last time in the mansion of the Percivals, and the first time to its only remaining heir, what is due to us both."

This speech, though of itself it was sufficiently courteous and manly, would have been thrown away on Wilton from an unconscious manifestation of that tone and air which bespeaks the hypocrite, had there not existed, in addition to Numa's warning, still deeper and graver causes sufficient to make him doubt his sincerity.

"Neither do I intend to forget what is due to us both," was Wilton's reply; "yet I see no reason why we should feign what it is impossible to feel, as it must fail to deceive either of us."

"You are prejudiced against me, sir, but as you have had a hard day's ride, we will let prejudices and business shift for themselves till after supper; but as I didn't know exactly when to expect you, there will necessarily be some little delay. Here is some wine, Mr. Percival, which was put into the cellar in the time of your grandfather. I was in the humble capacity of steward then, and saw to the storing of some five or six hundred bottles of the same vintage as this, besides thousands of an inferior quality."

While speaking, he had approached the sideboard and filled two large goblets of cut glass, exactly alike in shape and size, though one had a gilt edge, while that of the other was plain. Had Wilton been near enough to see the inside of the one edged with gilt, before it was filled with wine, he would have seen that it contained a few drops of a dark colored liquid. Withers had taken the silver salver on which the glasses stood, and was advancing towards Wilton, when he was arrested by hearing the tramp of horses, which were coming at a swift pace up the avenue.

"Who can they be?" said Withers, and at the same time he turned pale and cast a keen look upon Wilton. The next moment he rallied. "Let them be who they will, we won't let them cheat us out of our wine," he added; and going up close to Wilton, he held the salver in such a manner that the gilt edged goblet was the readiest to his hand.

But the combination of the poison with the wine had already turned it a few shades darker than that in the other, and had also detracted from its transparency. Wilton noticed the difference, and recalling to mind the warning of Numa, quietly passed his hand over it and took the other. At the moment he did so the attention of Withers was drawn towards the door, for footsteps and voices were heard on the opposite side.

"After all, they will cheat us out of our wine, I believe," and snatching up the goblet, he added, "I drink to the lost heir, about to be restored to the home of his ancestors," and raising the glass to his lips, he drained it to the last drop.

As he was returning the glass to the salver, the gleam of the gilded rim caught his eye. It fell from his unheeded hand upon the floor of polished oak, and was shattered into twenty pieces, at the same moment the men entered the room.

"Treachery has been met by treachery," he said, turning towards Wilton, with a face pale as death, and a dusky fire, expressive of malice and hate, burning in his eyes.

He then turned to the men who had just entered, and said:

"Your prey has escaped the clutches of the law."

"Has he gone? Has Ishmael Withers fled?" said one of them.

"No; I am the person you seek."

"I arrest you, then, for the murder of Reuben Maxon."

"For the murder of Maxon, did you say?"

"Yes; there was a witness to that affair, you little dreamed of."

"It is best as it is, then. I am glad I took it."

"What does he mean?" said the man, turning to Wilton.

"He has taken poison, I suppose, though it was unintentional. It was in a glass of wine, as I suspect, intended for me, which I exchanged for the one designed for himself, without his observing it."

"Is this so?" said the officer who had arrested Withers, addressing him.

"It is—it is! I haven't half an hour to live."

"And why did you wish to destroy him?" inquired Wilton.

"I was sorely tempted. These possessions I have enjoyed so long are all his. He is the grandson of the late Edgar Percival, who has, when I thought him dead over twenty years, risen up like a spectre in my path to claim his own."

"Is this true?"

"As true as that in a few minutes more I shall be nothing but a clod. The poison will do its work quicker than I thought."

"While yet you can, will you make oath of what you have told us?"

"Yes, though there is no need. He will have proof enough, even if he didn't carry it in his own person. Had I not known this, I shouldn't have mixed the draught for him, which is now stealing away my life. I've owned the truth, so you needn't come," said he, after a few moments' silence. "The old man looks pale and ghastly—the same as he did after he took the last drink I ever gave him. Wont some of you have pity on me, and take him away?"

"Whom do you mean?"

"Why Mr. Edgar Percival—he that died more than twenty years ago."

"It is the living Edgar Percival you see—not the dead one."

"The living one? Why should he look so ghastly then? He didn't take the poison. He is gone now. I'll manage to keep the place yet."

These were his last words, showing that his thoughts, in their incoherent wanderings, were running on the scheme of villany in which he had been defeated.

CHAPTER XXVI.

CONCLUSION.

"WHAT can have happened?" said Bessie Hamlen, speaking to her mother and Edith.

They all rose and went to a window, for a mingling of many voices, evidently expressive of joy and triumph, though no articulate sound could be distinguished, came surging along, borne on the clear, cold breeze of a bright afternoon.

"Hark!" said Edith. "If I mistake not, peace is the word which forms the burden of those rapturous bursts of exultation which are rending the welkin."

The words had scarce left her lips, when Wilton Richmond—or, as we may now call him, Edgar Percival, his claim to the name as well as to the estate being undisputed,—accompanied by Sedley Austin, who had, a few days previously, arrived from the South, entered the apartment.

"Why don't we find you waving your handkerchiefs and clapping your hands?" said Percival.

"Why?" inquired Bessie. "Have tidings of peace arrived?"

"Yes; the treaty has been signed at Ghent, and the whole country—those who were friends and those who were foes to the war—are indiscriminately rejoicing at the auspicious event."

"It promises to be a bond of brotherhood between those who have long looked coldly on each other," said Sedley.

"I hope you are not wanting in candles," remarked Percival, turning to Mrs. Hamlen; "for it is expected that, to-morrow evening, all good patriots will illuminate their dwellings."

"And the peace, as I suspect, is to be celebrated by song as well as by light," said Sedley; "for as I passed old Pompey's domicile, he with his fiddle, and his son Pete with his tamborine, were practising an Ode to Peace, while a score of voices joined in the chorus."

"Pompey, in anticipation of the happy event, has been practising it for more than three weeks," said Bessie.

"I have a proposition to make," said Mr. Grosvenor, who at this moment entered.

"What is it?" inquired Mrs. Hamlen.

"That we celebrate peace to-morrow evening by the double wedding, for which preparation has been making for several weeks."

"I am agreed, if the young folks are," said his sister.

"But we ain't half ready," said Bessie and Edith, both speaking at the same time.

"Tooh—nonsense!" said Mr. Grosvenor. "The time set is only two days later, so that it certainly can make no great difference. It is only to make your fingers fly a little more nimbly. What do you say, Edgar Percival? and you, Sedley Austin?"

"That your idea is a capital one," was Percival's reply.

"And one that I certainly shan't gainsay," said Sedley.

Bessie and Edith brought up numerous objections, but they being in the minority, these were overruled; and so it was decided as Mr. Grosvenor said, whom the inspiring news seemed to have put in a metaphorical vein, that the torch of Hymen should illumine the olive of Peace.

After all the misgivings and excuses of Bessie and Edith, everything was brought into ample order at the appointed time. The great hall, where the bridal ceremonies were to be performed, was decorated with evergreens, studded with lamps, and a cluster of which, in number answering to the States of the Union, hovered the American eagle. Nor was the national flag forgotten, several being so arranged at the upper end of the hall as to unfold their stars and stripes above those who were to kneel at the altar.

The two brides, always lovely, appeared transcendently so now, which was less owing to their tasteful and becoming attire, than the beautiful enthusiasm which lit up their countenances, inspired by the thought that the humblest sons and daughters of the land, as well as the highest, were at that moment bearing a part in the celebration of an event which would bring joy and comfort to their hearthstones.

Percival, with his frank, soldierly air, looked worthy to be at the head of one of the finest estates in the country, while the appearance of Sedley Austin, who had already made a friend in every acquaintance, was such as to excite the praise and admiration of all.

They fully shared the enthusiasm of Bessie and Edith. There might have been an unacknowledged pleasure and satisfaction derived from a slightly superstitious feeling that the festival which gave so much elat to the double wedding, was the precursor of the peace and happiness they were destined to enjoy in the untrod path which lay before them.

Dame Anstis was present, looking blooming, youthful and happy, while Hammett, her nephew, dressed in a fancy costume of her own selection, looked as bright and graceful as the youthful cup-bearer of Jupiter.

Harefoot, too, was there, quiet and sedate, the soft and radiant light beaming from his dark eyes, alone showing the fullness of his content. The servants, after witnessing the bridal ceremonies, and partaking liberally of the wedding-cake, in which, as might have been imagined, "each nice ingredient" had been chosen by the Cyprian queen, withdrew to proceed with the celebration of peace after their own fashion, and in a manner suited to their vivacious tastes. The Ode to Peace, which had been committed to memory with great care, was sung by Pompey to the accompaniment of his violin and Pete's tamborine, which, in the chorus, when more than a hundred voices joined—many of them very clear and sweet,—swelled into such full waves of song that, floating away on the still evening air, it was heard more than a mile distant.

After a number of toasts and sentiments had been given, several of which were to the newly wedded, when the guests were about to separate, Edgar Percival gave—"The American Eagle":

While the proud British lion lies crouching,
Not covered with glory, but scars,
Our eagle triumphantly hovers,
Midst splendor that bursts from the stars."

When, in a few days afterward, Edgar Percival bore his bride to the home of his fathers, Dame Anstis accompanied them. One bright day, after they were well settled, she pointed out to them the tree where, for the last time, she had suspended the shawl-hammock of her sleeping charge, little thinking of the unhappy consequences which were destined to grow out of it.

Hammett and Harefoot, whenever it suited them, always found a home at the Percival mansion, as did Christina Burnann, her step-sister, Dorson, having, shortly before the close of the war, lost his life in a quarrel with some of his vicious associates. Mrs. Grey still retained her place as housekeeper, and Numa, busy in the performance of self-imposed tasks, experienced a new accession of dignity and self-respect in being freed from the control of the despicable Withers, and in the restoration of the rightful heir.

Old Elsie, who, after the death of her son, could never be prevailed on to sleep beneath the roof of the mansion he had called his, and where his hands had been stained with crime, found a home in the cottage of Margaret Rustan.

Near the close of summer, according to pre-arrangement, Edgar Percival and his wife, in company with Mrs. Hamlen, made a journey to the North, and spent a few delightful weeks with Mr. Grosvenor, his daughter and son-in-law, at the old brown farmhouse on the shores of Lake Champlain.

SELF-IMPROVEMENT.

Propose to yourself an object that is noble; pursue it from motives that are high. Let what is best in you take the mastery. You shall be ranked with the wise and good long before you are fully either. And as you go on in the course of improvement, the idea of your better self shall become more definite, and the life of this idea of wisdom and goodness shall be dearer and stronger in you. You shall be named after the idea of your life; you are wise, for you are becoming so; you are good, for you are becoming so. In all right courses of life, a man resolutely desirous of becoming a wiser, a better informed, better disciplined, more useful individual, will find his thoughts, both of the end and the way, get clearer as he proceeds in his work. He sees more truly and more brightly what it is he wants; he sees more fully the means for its attainment. And with better prospect both of the end and the way, there comes increased motive for the self-improving effort of the journey.—Lyneh.

METHOD.

We are in danger of ruining our promising plans, in themselves very good, by the habit of putting off till to-morrow what may be done to-day. "That letter may be answered to-morrow; that request of my friend may be attended to to-morrow, and he will be no loser." True, but you are the loser; for the yielding to one such temptation, is the signal for the yielding up the whole citadel to the enemy. "That note and that valuable fact may be recorded in my common-place book to-morrow." True, but every such indulgence is a heavy loss to you. Every hour should be perseveringly filled up. But this is not all. It is not sufficient to take for your motto, with the immortal Grotius, "Hora tu, but let it be filled up according to some plan. One day filled up according to a previous plan is worth more than a week filled up without any plan.—Todd.

THE PRINCESS OF BABYLON.

BY CHARLES W. STEVENS.

THE venerable Belus, king of Babylon, believed himself the first man in the world, for his courtiers told him so, and his historians proved it to him. What might excite in him this ridiculous notion, is the fact, that his predecessors had built Babylon ages before him, and he had embellished it. It is known that his palace and park, situate some leagues from Babylon, were extended between the Enphrates and Tigris, that laved these enchanting shores. His vast edifice, whose front was three thousand paces long, rose to the clouds. The flat roof was surrounded by a balustrade of white marble, fifty feet high, which contained the colossal statues of all the kings and celebrated men of the empire. This roof, composed of two rows of bricks covered with a thick coating of lead, was spread over with earth to the depth of twelve feet. Forests of olive, citron, orange and palm trees had also been set out there, which formed walks impenetrable to the sunbeams.

The waters of the Euphrates, raised by pumps in an hundred hollow columns, filled vast marble basins, and descending afterwards through other canals, formed in the park cascades six thousand feet long, and an hundred thousand fountain streams, of which the height could hardly be perceived. The gardens of Semiramis, which, many centuries afterwards, astounded Asia, were only a feeble imitation of these antique marvels; for in the time of Semiramis, everything began to degenerate among men and women.

But the most admirable sight at Babylon, which eclipsed all others, was Formosant, the only daughter of the king. Belus, moreover, was prouder of his daughter than of his kingdom. It was deemed necessary for her to have a husband worthy of her; but where could he be found? An ancient oracle had declared that she could belong only to him who should bend the bow of Nimrod, that mighty hunter, who had left a bow seven feet long, of ebony wood, harder than the iron of Caucausus. No mortal since Nimrod had been able to bend this wonderful bow.

The oracle added, besides, that the arm which should have bent the bow, should kill the most terrible and dangerous lion that should be let loose in the Babylonian amphitheatre. The victor also was to have a cultured mind, be most beautiful and virtuous, and possess the rarest thing of the entire world.

Three kings presented themselves, who dared compete for Formosant: the Pharaoh of Egypt, the Shah of India, and the Khan of Scythia. Belus appointed the day, and the scene of the combat was to be the extremity of his park, the immense space bounded by the two rivers. There was erected around the list a marble amphitheatre that could contain five hundred thousand spectators. Opposite the amphitheatre, was the throne of the king, who was going to appear with Formosant, accompanied by all the court; and on the right and left, between the throne and amphitheatre, were other thrones for the three kings and other sovereigns who might be curious to see this august ceremony.

The king of Egypt arrived first, mounted upon the ox Apis. He was followed by two thousand priests clad in linen robes whiter than snow, by two thousand magicians, and as many warriors.

The king of India soon after arrived in a chariot drawn by twelve elephants. He had a cortege still more numerous and brilliant than the other.

The last was the king of Scythia. He had around him only chosen soldiers, armed with bows and arrows. He was mounted upon a superb tiger, which he had subdued. The form of this monarch was imposing and majestic, far surpassing that of his rivals. His naked arms, brawny yet white, seemed already to bend the bow of Nimrod.

The three kings prostrated themselves before Belus and Formosant. Pharaoh then offered to the princess the two most beautiful crocodiles of the Nile, two hippopotami, two zebras, two Egyptian mummies, and the books of Hermes, which latter he believed to be the rarest things on earth. The shah presented to her a hundred elephants, each of which carried a tower of gilt wood, and put at her feet the Veda, written in the handwriting of Xaca himself. The khan, who neither knew how to read or write, proffered a hundred war-horses, caparisoned with housing and black fox skin.

The princess cast down her eyes before her lovers, and bowed with graces as modest as they were noble. Belus conducted these monarchs to their thrones. "Would that I had three daughters," said he to them, "that I might to-day render six persons happy!"

He then drew lots for the one who should first try the bow. The names of the three candidates were cast into a golden casque. That of the Egyptian came out first, and that of the Indian next. The Scythian, looking at the bow and his rivals, complained not at being the third.

While these brilliant trials were in preparation, twenty thousand pages and as many girls, without confusion, distributed to the spectators in the rows of seats choice refreshments.

Everybody avowed that the gods had established kings only to give festivals every day; that life is too short to use it otherwise; that lawsuits, intrigues and war, which consume human life, are absurd and horrible; that man would not passionately and continually love pleasures, were he not made for them; that the essence of human nature is to rejoice, and all else is folly. It might be added, this excellent moral has never been denied, except by facts.

As they were about to commence these trials, which were to decide the destiny of Formosant, a young stranger, mounted on a unicorn, and accompanied by his valet, who, mounted in the same manner, held in his hand a large bird, presented himself at the gate. The guards were surprised to see in this equipage a figure which had the air of divinity. It was, as they declared, the head of Adonis upon the body of Hercules! His black eyebrows and long blonde hair, a mingling of beauties unknown at Babylon, charmed the assembly. All the amphitheatre rose to see him; all the women of the court bent towards him their astonished eyes; Formosant herself, who was wont to look modestly down, gazed at him and blushed. The three kings turned pale. While comparing Formosant with the unknown, the people cried out: "There is no one in the world who is as beautiful as Formosant, but this young man!"

The door-keepers, seized with wonder, asked him if he were a king.

"I have not that honor," rejoined the stranger, "but I have come a great distance, through curiosity to see if there are any kings worthy of the princess."

He, with his equipage, was introduced into the first row of the amphitheatre. He very courteously saluted Belus, his daughter, the three kings, and all the assembly, and then blushing took his seat. His two unicorns lay down at his seat, his bird perched upon his shoulder, and his servant stood by his side.

The exercise commenced. The bow of Nimrod was drawn from its golden case. The great master of ceremonies, followed by fifty pages, and preceded by twenty trumpets, presented it to Pharaoh, who had it blessed by his priests, and having placed it upon the head of his god Apis, doubted not that he would obtain this first victory. He descends in the middle of the arena, tries, exhausts his strength, makes contortions which excite the laughter of the populace and also of the princess.

"Let your majesty renounce this vain honor, which is only that of muscles and nerves," said his great almonar, approaching him. "You will triumph in all the rest. You have the sword of Osiris, and you will vanquish the lion. The princess is to belong to the one who has the greatest mind, and you have divined enigmas,—to the most virtuous, and you are so, since you were brought up by the priests of Egypt,—to the most generous, and you have given the most beautiful crocodiles and the books of Hermes. Moreover, you possess the ox Apis, the rarest thing in the world; so that no one can compete with you for Formosant."

"You are right," observed the king, and retired to his throne.

The bow was put into the hands of the king of India. He had blisters from it for fifteen days, and consoled himself by presuming that the Scythian would not be more fortunate than himself.

The khan handles the bow in his turn. He joined skill to strength. In his hands, the bow seemed to take some elasticity, and though it yielded a little, he could never wholly succeed in bending it. The spectators, to whom his noble mien inspired favorable opinions, groaned at his little success, and judged that the princess would never be married.

Then the young unknown descended with a leap into the arena, and addressing the Scythian, "Let your majesty," said he to him, "not be astonished at not having entirely succeeded. These ebony bows are made in my country. There is only a certain turn to give; so that you have more merit in having made it yield, than I in bending it."

He immediately took an arrow, adjusted it on the cord, bent the bow, and sent it far beyond the gates. A million bands applauded this prodigy, and Babylon resounded with acclamations. He afterwards drew from his pocket a little ivory plate, on which he wrote with a golden needle, and then attaching to the bow the tablet, he gave the whole to the princess, and with a grace, too, which charmed all the attendants. He then went to seat himself again, modestly. All Babylon was surprised, and the three kings were confounded; but the unknown appeared not to notice it.

Yet Belus, having consulted his magi, declared that none of the kings having been able to bend the bow of Nimrod, it was no less necessary for that to marry his daughter, and that she should wed the one who should succeed in slaying the great lion that had been brought up in his menagerie. The king of Egypt found that it was very ridiculous to expose a king to beasts for the sake of marriage. He confessed that the possession of Formosant was worth a great price, but maintained that if the lion strangled him, he would never be able to espouse the Babylonian belle. The king of India entered into the sentiments of the Egyptian, and both concluded that the king of Babylon was jesting with them; that they ought to levy armies to punish him; that they had numberless subjects who would consider it an honor to die in the service of their masters; that they might easily dethrone the Babylonian, and then draw lots for the beautiful Formosant. This agreement being made, the two kings despatched, each into his own country, an express order to assemble an army of three hundred thousand braves, in order to carry off the princess.

Yet the khan of Scythia descended alone into the arena, with his scimeter in his hand. He was not desperately smitten by the charms of Formosant. Glory had hitherto been his only passion, and it had led him to Babylon. He wished to show that if the monarchs of Egypt and India were prudent enough not to expose themselves to lions, he was valiant enough not to disdain this contest, and that he would repair the honor of the diadem. His rare valor did not even permit him to avail himself of the aid of his tiger. He advances alone, lightly armed, and covered by a steel casque garnished with gold, and shaded by three plumes white as snow.

There was loosed against him the most enormous lion ever nurtured in the mountains of Anti-Lebanon. His terrible claws seemed capable of rending the three kings at once, and his huge mouth of devouring them. His frightful roarings made the amphitheatre resound. The two proud champions rapidly plunge toward each other. The Scythian drives his scimeter into the lion's throat, but the point meeting one of those thick teeth which nothing can pierce, is shivered, and the sylvan monster, furious with his wound, was about imprinting his talons in the sides of the monarch, when the stranger, touched by the peril of so brave a prince, leaps into the arena quicker than a flash, and with wonderful dexterity beheads the lion.

Taking out, then, a little box, he presents it to the Scythian khan, saying: "Your majesty will find in this box the veritable dittany, which grows in my country. Your glorious wounds will be healed in a moment. Chance alone prevented you from triumphing over the lion; your valor is not less admirable."

The Scythian, more sensible to gratitude than jealousy, thanked his liberator, and after having tenderly embraced him, entered again his throne to apply the dittany.

The unknown gave the head of the lion to his valet. Having washed it in the great fountain near by, and drawn out all the blood, the latter drew from his bag a peculiar knife, with which he dug out the lion's forty teeth, and inserted in their stead forty diamonds. With his usual modesty, his master retook his seat.

"Beautiful bird," said he, giving to his bird the monster's head, "go and lay at the feet of Formosant this feeble homage."

The bird flies, holding in one of its claws the terrible trophy. Having presented it to the princess, it humbly bowed its neck, and spread itself out before her. The forty brilliants dazzled all eyes. They were not yet acquainted with this magnificence in prod Babylon, since the emerald, sapphire, topaz and pyrope were still regarded as the most precious ornaments. Belus and all his court were seized with admiration. The bird astonished them still more. It was the size of an eagle, but its eyes were as mild and tender as those of the eagle are baughty and threatening. Its beak was rose-color, and its neck resembled all the hues of the rainbow, but more lively and brilliant. Gold in a thousand shades glittered upon its plumage. Its feet appeared an interweaving of silver and purple, and its tail surpassed those of Juno's birds. The attention, curiosity and astonishment of all the court were divided between the diamonds and the bird. Formosant flattered, caressed and kissed it, and it seemed to receive them with pleasure mingled with respect.

Belus, who had attentively considered the diamonds, judged that one of his provinces could hardly pay for so rich a present. He ordered his attendants to prepare for the unknown gifts still more magnificent than those which had been destined for the monarchs.

"This young man," observed he, "is doubtless the son of the king of China, or of that part of the world which is called Europe, which I have heard about, or, perhaps, of Africa, that they say is near the kingdom of Egypt."

He immediately sent his great squire to compliment the unknown, and to inquire of him whether he were sovereign of one of these empires, and why, possessing such astonishing treasures, he had come only with his valet.

The squire approached the stranger, and delivered with dignity his message. At this flattering token of regard, the stranger deeply blushed, for his modesty equaled his worth. He then accompanied the squire to the king, and gracefully bowing, thus replied:

"Though unworthy these encomiums, I will with pleasure reply briefly to your curiosity, most noble king. I am the son of Ormar, the king of Mauritania. I was brought up to conquer the king of beasts in my country's jousts, and with my bow to bring dead to my feet the prince of birds. I will not speak of my achievements in battle; let vanquished nations relate them. I will not speak of mental acquisitions, for fathomless wisdom gleams before me in the golden distance. Reports of this intended occasion having wandered to my palace, I eagerly set out in order to be present, and behold this august scene, though I am conscious of being the humblest of the admirers of fair Formosant. As for these diamonds, they were gleaned from the depths of our own limpid streams, and relying on my arm that never learnt fear, I arrived without danger. May I add, that the pleasure of seeing Formosant has more than repaid me."

With what joy the princess heard these words is inexpressible, and her father, enraptured, quickly rejoined:

"Illustrious prince, your deeds respond to the ancient oracles, and Formosant is yours. I feel proud to call you my son—to welcome you to the shrine of my heart. I am confident a wreath of glory awaits you in the future as brilliant as your past is glorious. Sons of Babylon," pursued the king, turning to the people, "welcome the new son of Belus!"

Such a shout waved up to the azure arches, as was never heard before. Peal after peal reverberated. The young happy pair joyously embraced. As sombre twilight was creeping on, the vast assemblage happily dispersed, and that night revelly danced, and joy laughed, and hearts glowed over the ruby beaker.

The three kings, seeing the stranger's integrity and nobility of soul, and tacitly acknowledging his superiority, the next morning started homewards. After a month's festivities, a message having reached the son of Ormar that his father was deceased, he and Formosant set out, convoyed by a magnificent cavalcade, and burdened with costly gifts. Both in due time ascended the throne, and to acquaint all that their reign was happy and prosperous, it need only be said, that their subjects revered them as parents.

Bestow thy youth so that thou mayst have comfort to remember it, when it hath forsaken thee, and do not sigh and grieve at the account thereof. Whilst thou art young thou wilt think it will never have an end: but behold, the longest day hath its evening, and that thou shalt enjoy it but once, that it never turns again; use it, therefore, as the spring-time, which soon departeth, and wherein thou oughtest to plant and sow all provisions for a long and happy life.—Sir Walter Raleigh.

WATER-CARRIERS IN THE EAST.

We have grouped together on this page a number of striking sketches illustrating the manner in which that indispensable article, water, is conveyed and distributed in the East, where its general rarity causes it to be most highly appreciated. Whoever has read the narratives of intelligent travellers in the East, must have had abundant means of observing the shifts to which not only travellers but the inhabitants themselves are put in consequence of not having an adequate supply of water at hand, the wells being far away from their abodes. The conveyance of water from a river across a sandy encampment, or the retailing of water by itinerant dealers, gave rise to the use of portable vessels suitable to the object in view; and many of the oriental countries down to the present day, exhibit such persons, vessels and scenes as are shown in our engravings. In some few cases the vessels used are of earthen ware; but as these are hard and unyielding, and in that respect somewhat difficult to carry, a curious substitute has been adopted for them. These are skins of goats and other animals, prepared in a rough way, and fastened when necessary. The Arabs sometimes use water-bags made of tanned camel skin, but the skins most generally employed are those of the goat and kid. The most common sort of these bags make a curious appearance when filled with water, resembling an animal, of which the head and feet have been cut off. It will be seen from many of the figures in this page, that the pliable nature of the skin-bottles enables them to be carried very conveniently on the back, bending round to the front over the shoulder, or under the arm. One engraving shows three Sakekalis, or water-carriers of Cairo. One of them has a camel to transport his bags, another an ass, while the third supports his burthen on his back. The water-skins borne by the camels are made of ox-hide; those of the asses are made of goat-skin. These men have generally one cry, "Ya ow wud Allah!" (My God compensate me!) They exact nothing for the beverage, depending on the generosity of the consumer for remuneration. The Khem'alees, a more numerous class, are dervishes, and carry vessels of fine gray earth on their backs. One of our engravings exhibits these Khem'alees and their manner of serving the water. In the districts of Africa southward of Egypt, the system of carrying water in skin bottles has been described by travellers. Browne, in his "Journey to Dar-Fur," says:—"The water, in leaving Egypt, is commonly conveyed in goat skins, artificially prepared for this purpose; but no skill can entirely prevent evaporation. On their march from Soudan to Egypt, the Jelabs often use ox-hides, formed into capacious sacks, and properly secured with tar and oil. A pair of these is a camel's load. They keep the water in a better state for drinking than the former. And these sacks are sold to great advantage throughout Egypt, a pair of the best kind being worth thirty piastres. They are the common instruments for conveying water from the river to different parts of each town. The camels are not allowed to partake of this store, which, after all the care that can be taken, is often nauseous from the tar and mud which accompanies the drawing, and heat. Six of the smaller skins, or two of the larger, are generally esteemed sufficient for four persons for so many days. In many of the less civilized countries the natives often use some kind of vegetable substance, capable of being hollowed within, as a water-vessel. The New Zealanders, for example, make use of the calabash, the fruit of a tropical plant, as a drinking vessel—hollowing the vessel some distance above the head, and allowing the water to flow down in a stream into the mouth, as shown in our engraving. These pictures are all characteristic. One of them, at the foot of the page, shows a woman filling a cup from her skin-pitcher. Another shows the skins and manner of attaching them. The sketches of "skin water-bottles of the East," and "Arab bottles and water-carriers," are not only illustrative of our subject, but picturesque in themselves.

TOUCH-ME-NOT—A SONG.

BY FRANK FREELOVE.

There's a jewel by the brooklet
Uplifts its golden eye.
Whose leaves are glittering every morn,
In silvery-ruby dye;
O'erladen with the dewdrops
That sparkle bright and high:
And the trembling pendants glisten
Like the gleam of beauty's eye!

As this jewel by the brooklet
I one day chanced to spy,
I said: "To gild thee, glorious flower,
I certainly will try!"
Endearingly I pressed it—
Th' affected tendril fly!
Mock-indignation beaming
In a glance of beauty's eye!

Now—the jewel by the brooklet
I pass neglected by;
The leaves at morning fade with gems,
At noon are crisped and dry;
And the floweret, like a false coquette,
That once has made me sigh,
Now gleams upon me with the glare
Of jealous beauty's eye!

EVELYN SEYMOUR.

BY SUSAN H. BLAISDELL.

"WANTED, a seamstress. Apply early at No. 5, — Street," read aloud, from the evening paper, a graceful, pretty-looking woman, clad in widow's weeds, as she sat by the hearth in a plainly-furnished but very neat apartment.

"A seamstress—how would that do, Milly? I can do almost anything in the way of sewing, I think, Aunt Caroline was so particular with me. But no—I cannot take it—I forget. I should be obliged to leave home, and you, Milly; and I never thought of that."

She addressed herself to her daughter, a pretty, soft-eyed, brown-haired girl of some ten or twelve years, who sat at the opposite side of the hearth knitting and listening the while. She half-suspended her employment, as she raised her eyes to her mother's face.

"I don't know, mother, that you would. Do seamstresses always—"

She paused suddenly; and her cheeks crimsoned with a flush of painful emotion.

"O, mother," she broke forth, "to think of your being a seamstress!"

"O, nonsense—nonsense, Milly! Not a word on that score, I positively won't hear it!" said the pretty widow in her liveliest tone, and she bent down to hide the quick tear that sprang to her eye, and commenced raking the fire.

"Don't pray, give a thought to that, Milly," she continued. "You know we must do something, and as to my being a seamstress, there are hundreds better than I am, perhaps, who have starved for want of even a situation like that. I am going to try and forget the luxury and idleness to which we have been accustomed, and put my shoulder to the wheel in good earnest. Don't you try to discourage me, you little mouse—you will be disappointed if you do. Well, now, what were you going to say? I am sadly in want of advice. Make haste and give me some, Milly."

Milly was not deceived by this lively manner; she detected the tear so bravely and resolutely repressed, but she saw that her mother was trying hard to nerve herself for approaching trials, and she must also take courage and assist her. Keeping down the grieving sigh that filled her breast, she answered:

"Would you be obliged to go away from home? Would they not let you work at home, perhaps? And then, you know, I could help you a great deal. You know you have taught me to sew quite nicely; and nurse Nanny is as proud as can be of those caps which I embroidered for her. They are done, I am sure, too, as well as a great deal of the finest work one sees at the stores."

"That is very true, Milly," said Mrs. Seymour, cheerfully, "and I know you could help me; though I should not wish you to take a moment of time from your studies. But I do not know whether I should be allowed to take the work home; and yet, I cannot do less than find out, for indeed, Milly, I do not know what else I can do than this. I never could teach in the world. Suppose, then, I knock at the door of No. 5, to-morrow morning?"

The resolution was formed; and at an early hour Mrs. Seymour and Milly retired, that they might be up earlier to-morrow. The last words the young widow said to herself before sleeping, were: "I must conform in all things to these new and straitened circumstances in which I find myself. I shall be obliged to rise before dawn, every day, now, perhaps, that I may earn sufficient to provide us with bread."

It was with her as with hundreds of others. Dependent upon a proud and unkind relative from her early girlhood, she had married at the age of seventeen, a wealthy merchant, and after twelve years of perfect happiness and contentment, with not a wish ungratified, she became at once a widow and penniless by the simultaneous failure and death of her husband. She was thrown upon the wide world alone with her child, with nothing but her own brave, woman's heart to bear her up; and now commenced the battle of life.

She had endeavored to obtain pupils in music, and drawing, and found herself disappointed at the outset. The languages she felt herself incompetent to teach, though her acquaintance with them was not inconsiderable. Several other plans had been equally impracticable. She was reduced at last to her needle; but she never dreamed of shrinking.

On the morning after reading the advertisement, she prepared herself to apply at the place designated. Milly set off for school a little before nine, and in rather more than an hour afterwards, the widow took her way to — Street. A degree of irrepressible agitation possessed her, despite the courageous resolutions she had made, as she proceeded thither. She felt troubled and sorrowful; for now, as she went on this humble errand, the loneliness and distress of her situation were impressed upon her most painfully. Her countenance, usually bright, cheerful and animated, was much paler than it was wont to be, and an expression of inward grief and disquiet lay like a mournful shadow in the sunny depths of her beautiful, dark-fringed eyes.

A carriage swept round a corner which she was passing; within were three ladies reclined upon the luxurious cushions; and Evelyn Seymour knew them. They were an aunt and two cousins of her late husband; and never, after his marriage, upon the most familiar or friendly terms with him or her, had, since his death, scarcely noticed her at all. They merely bowed to her now in the most distant manner—Mrs. Acheson first, and then Miss Arabella, and lastly Miss Indiana—one after the other, and with the most frigid dignity. Mrs. Seymour's pride arose. Quickly and proudly she returned the haughty sign of recognition, and passed on. In that moment, with all their wealth, and all her poverty, she felt that they sunk immeasurably below her. With a lighter step, and a lighter heart as well, she went on her errand, treading her poverty under foot. She rose above it then.

And Arabella Acheson's carriage rolled on, while the scornful beauty smiled exultantly over what she termed the "downfall" of her cousin Harry's wife; for she had never forgiven Evelyn St. Leger for captivating her cousin Harry, whom she had counted on securing for herself.

"Poor and proud," said her mother, contemptuously. "Did you see her, Arabella? She looked as haughty as any queen."

A cold, triumphant expression sat on Arabella's countenance.

"Let her look as haughty as she likes; her pride will not help her poverty. For my part, I am glad—"

She paused suddenly, and bent forward, with a quick flush of pleasure breaking over her face.

"See, mama—there is Maximilian—see!" And she bowed with a sweet smile.

"Yes," said mama and Miss Indiana; and both followed the example of Arabella.

A handsome and distinguished-looking man on the opposite side of the way half-paused, lifted his hat, and smiled also; but instead of approaching, as Arabella evidently expected he would, and for which purpose the carriage drew up, he passed quickly along, and was lost amid the crowd.

"Provoking! ejaculated Miss Arabella, with her countenance clouding, "why in the world didn't he stop?"

"O, never mind—some business, I dare say," was mama's consoling answer; "but you will see him to-night, my dear, and then I think you had better bring him to a point as soon as possible. Pray don't let him slip as your cousin Harry did; for though you are certainly as brilliant as at twenty, you must remember that you were thirty last week, and it will not do to neglect so excellent an opportunity as this."

Away went the trio, discussing prospects matrimonial; and on in the opposite direction, hurried Evelyn Seymour on her morning's errand. It was a beautiful street, in the most fashionable part of the city—that to which her steps were directed. Number five was reached; and Evelyn, with a heart throbbing with agitation, paused at the entrance for a moment, to recover some degree of calmness. What an errand! * * * She felt sick and faint; but in an instant, shaking off her emotion, she touched the bell.

While she waited, she had time to observe the general appearance of the mansion. It was one of the finest in the street; but while an air of life and cheerfulness pervaded the rest, this had an air of unusual quiet—almost of utter loneliness. All the blinds, except those of the drawing-room and of one chamber, were closed, and had every appearance of having been so for a long time. Much dust, and not a few cobwebs, had settled here and there. The place looked still and nearly deserted.

Evelyn was just reading the name—"St. James"—on the door, when the bell was answered, and a servant appeared. Evelyn trembled, blushed and stammered, as she asked for his mistress. The man looked at her with an expression of something not unlike perplexity.

"My mistress? I beg your pardon, ma'am, but Mr. St. James is not—O, here is my master, ma'am."

And as Evelyn turned, a gentleman who had just turned the corner, ascended the steps, and stood beside her. He glanced from the domestic to the lady, and with a slight and graceful bow, inquired whom she wished to see. Twenty times in a minute the beautiful color went and came in Evelyn's cheek, as she answered, hesitatingly:

"Indeed, I scarcely know—I came—to answer an advertisement—which appeared in the Times of yesterday."

A look of surprise and perplexity flitted over the fine face of the gentleman.

"An advertisement, madam? You do not mean—"

"I mean, sir," said Evelyn, in a faint tone, "the advertisement for a seamstress."

A seamstress! No wonder his presence of mind forsook him for an instant. With Evelyn Seymour's graceful loveliness, and the air of elegant refinement natural to her, she seemed a strange applicant for such a situation.

"I beg your pardon, madam; will you come in?" he said, suddenly recollecting himself. And Evelyn found herself seated in the drawing-room. The gentleman drew a chair forward for himself, saying—"The advertisement, madam, was mine, on behalf of my aunt, who comes here next week to reside. She requested me to engage one for her by that time, if possible. Do I understand that you—"

He hesitated again; for he would not be quite sure yet. His deferential and respectful air gave Evelyn courage.

"You are right," she answered, calmly, anticipating his question. "I wished to obtain some employment of this kind; but it is necessary that I should remain at home, and I desired to ask whether, if I engaged to take it, the sewing can be taken out. If so, I should be glad to have it. I think my work would give satisfaction."

Her voice trembled, and her eyes dropped, to hide the tears that would spring as she uttered the last words. It was the plea of one earnestly seeking for the means of subsistence. It touched the heart of her hearer; for St. James's heart was a kind and noble one. He read her story in her appearance; he saw that she was in need. He was not only willing, but glad to have an opportunity of assisting her; and yet, it seemed a mean employment to offer one like her; and then, he would have given any amount if some one else had been there to speak the words that tendered to her the office and the wages of a seamstress. As it was, there was no help for it; and his manner was embarrassed as it was earnest and respectful, while he answered:

"Certainly, madam—as you please," then adding: "I could wish that my aunt were here to speak with you about this. She will arrive, however, next week, and then she would like to see you, if you will be so good as to call, or leave your address."

Evelyn drew from her pocket a tiny mother-of-pearl card-case, one of the last remnants of her former wealth, and gave him a card. Then, with gently expressed thanks, which it shamed him to receive for a favor which he had been equally ashamed to offer, she took leave of him.

In her proudest days, Evelyn had met no greater deference or courtesy than that which marked St. James's manner throughout this interview to its close; and with grave and gentle respect, that was almost reverence, he bowed her to the door.

For some moments after she had retired, he stood silently regarding the single tangible token left of her presence—the tiny enameled card lying in his hand. "Mrs. Seymour," he murmured to himself. "A widow then, as I thought."

Even as he spoke, a handkerchief lying upon the floor attracted his attention. It was hers—lying where it had fallen from her lap, unnoticed. He picked it up. In one corner was wrought upon the delicate fabric, in exquisite embroidery, the name of "Evelyn."

"Evelyn Seymour. What a beautiful name!" he uttered, "and yet, no less beautiful than its lovely owner. How fair she was! What mingled sadness and dignity pervaded every look and motion!"

Moment after moment he sat engrossed by his own reflections, with his eyes fixed upon Evelyn's card and handkerchief; then, with a half sigh, he rose and looked them in his writing-desk, to remain until he should have an opportunity of restoring the handkerchief. But though he had put them out of sight, he could not forget his beautiful visitant. Nor was he inclined to deny that he was deeply and earnestly interested in her. With pleasure undisguised he lingered in thought over her visit, and recalled her appearance. And now he desired the time to come when he might see her again. * * *

"My, dear, what in the world ever put it into your ideas to become a seamstress?"

For good Mrs. Mackenzie, looking at her graceful figure and exquisite hands, declared that Evelyn had selected the surest mode of spoiling both.

"O, I could do nothing else," said Evelyn, half sadly. "I had thought of so many things—but none of them seemed practicable; and those that I actually tried, failed at the very first. No, I could do nothing else, and I was very glad to get that," she added, with a gentle smile.

"Well, I am glad, since you were obliged to take up with that, that you applied where you did," said the old lady, kindly, "for I have seen trouble too, my dear, and I dare say, if you are the sensible little thing I take you to be, I can help you very often. My husband failed when I had been married only three years, and then he died, and I was left alone just as you are; so, after my first grief was over, I went out as a governess. I had a great many trials, and hard ones, to endure, and they seemed all the harder, as you may well conceive, after the easy and happy life I had led. But I had to go through with them. I had no one to turn to in my troubles. And after five years, when a very distant relative, whom I had never seen twice in my life, died and left me a fortune, you may be sure it was not to be despised. Still, I had learned many a lesson well worth the learning, in those days of poverty and hardships; and I have had reason, many a time since, to be thankful for them. I was quite as poorly off as you are, my dear; for I also was destitute of friends in those sad days. My parents were both dead, and my sister and brother, the parents of my nephew, whom you have seen, were dead too, so you see I had nobody. But I tire you with my prattle."

"O, no, no indeed," said Evelyn, earnestly, "your story gives me courage—your case was so like my own."

"Well, I hope you will consider me as your friend, my child, and then I shall try and lighten your cares all I can; for I like you"—and here she laid her hand gently on Evelyn's head—"I like you," she repeated. "You have good courage—you are not afraid nor ashamed to toil; and be assured that Providence always helps those who are willing to help themselves."

"I believe it," was Evelyn's serious response.

"And now," said the old lady, "here comes your little girl, running in from school. She is a little darling. Will you let me take her home with me and spend the afternoon? I will send her home safely before dark."

With pleasure Evelyn assented.

"Mr. St. James, to whom are you bowing?—pray tell me," said the fair Arabella, languidly, while chatting with that gentleman, who had encountered her during one of her shopping excursions.

"That lady in black—Mrs. Seymour—there, you may just see her face. Are you not acquainted with her? I thought she looked just now as though she knew you."

Arabella colored, angrily, and, without noticing his question, said: "So you know her?"

"Yes—I have that honor."

He regarded the lady quietly for an instant, and then excusing himself, hurried away. In a moment more he had reached Evelyn Seymour's side; and as he did so, the carriage of Mrs. Acheson dashed past them; and Arabella, seated within, beheld Maximilian St. James and her despised cousin, walking side by side.

"Alma—look!" was all she could say, for anger.

"My dear," was the quick response, as Mrs. Acheson remarked them, "I will find out, shortly, what all that means."

That afternoon, Mrs. Mackenzie was seated in the drawing-room at — Street, engaged in reading. The house had assumed a more cheerful appearance since her arrival, for Maximilian's was no longer the mere bachelor's residence it had been. Instead of being shut up now, with dust and cobwebs, it had suddenly thrown off its air of loneliness, for one of life and pleasantness, that completely metamorphosed it. It was one of the most elegant residences in town. It was the property of a man whose wealth had excited the most ambitious dreams of half the managing mammas and marriageable daughters about; and Mrs. Acheson had secured all this, prospectively, for her eldest darling, the magnificent Arabella, who was resolved neither to die in single blessedness, nor yet to make an insignificant match.

Mrs. Acheson had known Mrs. Mackenzie for years, and was on terms of considerable intimacy with her, though truth to say, the friendship was pretty much all on her own side, since Mrs. Mackenzie had no very faint suspicions of the lady's designs on her nephew, and was not over fond of the laughing and scheming Arabella. Maximilian himself, from his friendship for Wilton Acheson, the only son and brother of the family, was, consequently, intimate with the rest; but an attachment for Arabella was the last thing which would ever have entered his mind. Mrs. Acheson's carriage, on the afternoon of which we have spoken, drew up at St. James's door, and five minutes after, the lady herself was seated, engaged in the most affable style, in conversation with "her dear friend, Mrs. Mackenzie."

A thousand subjects of commonplace importance were touched upon before Mrs. Acheson ventured to introduce the one which she had come purposely to discuss. Finally, however, it was brought in in this way:

"O, by-the-by, my dear madam, I met Maximilian this morning, or rather passed him, I should say, and a lady was with him who strongly reminded me of a former friend of mine. The resemblance was certainly striking—who could it have been, I wonder?"

And thereupon followed a most minute description of Evelyn; so that nobody who had ever seen her could mistake it. Mrs. Mackenzie recognized it in a moment, and the more readily, because she already knew from Maximilian's own lips, that he had that morning walked with Evelyn, whom he overtook in the street, as far as her own door. The shrewd old lady guessed directly that her guest desired to find out whether she knew anything of Mrs. Seymour, and, if so, whether she was on terms of intimacy with her; because she discovered on the instant, that Mrs. Acheson was aroused to curiosity and uneasiness concerning Maximilian and this beautiful woman whom she had seen by his side. As yet, however, she was unaware of the connection existing between Evelyn and Mrs. Acheson.

"O, that was a young friend of ours—a Mrs. Seymour,"—she answered quietly, scanning the lady's face with a glance from over her spectacles—"one of whom we think a great deal. She is one of the sweetest women I know. Maximilian admires her very much."

He did, did he? Mrs. Acheson could not help turning pale, as she thought of Arabella's prospects. So Evelyn Seymour was an intimate friend of theirs; and Maximilian St. James admired her very much. She went home in a state of mind considerably disturbed. Was Evelyn Seymour destined to rival her daughter a second time?

She arrived at conclusions rapidly. Evelyn Seymour herself had never dreamed of such a thing. She continued to sew for Mrs. Mackenzie, resolutely pursuing her employment, and confining her ideas to it alone. She tried to forget what she had been, and to look upon herself merely as Mrs. Mackenzie's seamstress—to think of nothing more.

Mrs. Mackenzie, however, sought to make a friend rather than dependent of her. She tried to win her to visit her frequently—to accompany her when she went out—in short, so genuine and sincere had become her admiration of Evelyn, and so earnest her friendship, that she disliked to regard her as Evelyn's own noble, self-denying heart prompted—in the true position which she occupied.

Evelyn went to her only when it was absolutely necessary to do so. She worked steadily, saying to herself that she was dependent on her needle for support, and maintained the strictest seclusion in keeping with her station. Mildly, however, was a frequent guest of Mrs. Mackenzie and St. James. Both loved the child. She was an especial pet of the old lady, who declared she filled the house with sunshine; and Maximilian found a degree of pleasure in drawing her to his side, and tracing in the sweet countenance her mother's likeness, that sprang from no common interest in either mother or child. He saw Evelyn but seldom. The morning walk with her, when he had overtaken her in the street, after parting with Arabella Acheson, was the occasion of the longest interview he had yet had with her; and he remembered it; for it was with secret pleasure that he had seen that morning something like pleased surprise in the glance with which she discovered him walking beside her. Since then, he had seen her but once.

"Aunt, how long has Mrs. Seymour been a widow?"

Maximilian St. James was leaning over the work table, playing with the worsted in Mrs. Mackenzie's basket. He asked the question in a tone and manner that were calm, and yet not without some slight embarrassment.

Mrs. Mackenzie looked sharply at him over her glasses, and half suspended her knitting-work, then went quietly on; his glances, meanwhile, being fixed on the worsted he was entangling.

"A year and a half, or nearer two years, Maximilian. If you are going to propose to her, I advise you to put it off. She would not have you. You must wait some time yet."

This quiet and straightforward admission of her knowledge of his thoughts, somewhat disconcerted him; but since she had perceived their nature he went further.

"Aunt,"—he said, plainly—"do you think she would marry again?"

"I think she may, sometime—yes."

"Sometime?"

"That is, when she shall have—but no matter, Maximilian. It is difficult to judge one woman by the rest. I see Evelyn happy and cheerful and light-hearted; existence is a pleasure to her. She mourns no longer her husband's loss, but she has not ceased to cherish that saddened remembrance of him which would prevent her from marrying again yet. When that sadness has passed away, and she has learned to think of him without tears, you may hope. I am very glad, Maximilian, that you like her. I had always a kind of uneasiness, I confess, in relation to your opinion of Miss Acheson, her husband's cousin. How unexpectedly that relationship came out, by-the-by. They have treated Evelyn shamefully—those Achesons. Mrs. Jackson told me all about their ill-will towards her. Well, I don't wonder that Harry Seymour chose Evelyn in preference to his unbearable cousin."

It was some six or eight months after the time when the above conversation took place, that St. James sat at his writing-desk sending a letter which he had just finished writing. He was slightly paler than usual, as he rang the bell and delivered it to the servant who appeared, bidding him carry it to Mrs. Seymour, in — Street.

The man departed to deliver the missive; but as it happened, he found on reaching the lower hall that Mrs. Seymour herself had just been admitted, and was waiting in the drawing room for Mrs. Mackenzie, who was out. Evelyn was surprised when he entered and presented the letter, saying that he had just started to carry it to her residence. She supposed it a communication from Mrs. Mackenzie; but in the superscription she recognized, with a quick-throbbing heart, the handwriting of St. James. For a moment, she could not open it. What had he to say to her? Slowly the envelope was removed, and she perused the contents of the epistle.

It was an offer of marriage from Maximilian. The color wavered in her cheek—she was agitated—she blushed and trembled. She could scarcely comprehend it. A step descended the stairs—to the hall—to the drawing room door.

"Aunt," said Maximilian, entering, and then he paused, his glance encountered Evelyn's face. She was blushing; his letter was in her hand; she had read it. He moved forward; he took her hand. His countenance was quite pale; his voice trembled.

"Mrs. Seymour—Evelyn—what have you to say?"

He held her hands clasped in his own, with a gentle, timid pressure. He had no words of pleading, but there was an entreating tenderness in his voice that was eloquence itself, as bending over her, he uttered, earnestly:

"Evelyn—Evelyn!"

Reader—let us take our departure. You do not need to hear what was said there. I am half afraid we have lingered too long already for politeness. And I suppose it is very well known to you that Evelyn and Maximilian were married shortly after; an event which made every one happy but the Acheson family.

ANECDOTE OF AN ACTOR.

Madame Rollan, who died in 1785, in the seventy-fifth year of her age, was a principal dancer on Covent-garden stage in 1731, and followed her profession, by private teaching, to the last year of her life. She had so much celebrity in her day, that having one evening sprained her ankle, no less an actor than Quin was ordered by the manager to make an apology to the audience for her not appearing in the dance. Quin, who looked upon all dancers as "the mere garnish of the stage," at first demurred; but being threatened with forfeiture, he growlingly came forward and in his course way thus addressed the audience:—"Ladies and gentlemen, I am desired by the manager to inform you that the dance intended for this night is obliged to be postponed, on account of Mademoiselle Rollan having dislocated her ankle. I wish it had been her neck."—Anecdotes of the Stage.

WASHINGTON'S DIGNITY.

The visitors at Mount Vernon, many of whom have recorded their impressions, included a singular variety of characters, from the cottager of Versailles to the farmer of New England, from the English officer to the Italian artist; and it is remarkable, that, various as are the terms in which they describe the illustrious host, a perfect identity in the portraits is obvious. They all correspond with the description of Chief Justice Marshall:

"His exterior created in the beholder the idea of strength, united with manly gracefulness. His person and whole deportment exhaled an unadorned and inextinguishable dignity, mingled with haughtiness, of which all who approached him were sensible; and the attainment of those who possessed his friendship and enjoyed his intimacy, was ardent, but respectful. His temper was humane, benevolent and conciliatory; but there was quickness in his sensibility to anything apparently offensive, which experience had taught him to correct."

An illustration of the last named trait is afforded in an incident related by the late Gouverneur Morris, who was distinguished by an uncommon share of Washington's confidence and affection.

"At a convivial party to which Washington was invited, his remarkable traits were the subject of discussion among the company; and it was insisted that no one, however intimate, would dare to take a liberty with him. In a foolish moment of elation, Gouverneur Morris accepted a bet that he would try the experiment. Accordingly, just before dinner was announced, as the guests stood in a group by the fire, he indulged in a somewhat lively chat, and in the midst of it, apparently from a casual impulse, clasped Washington familiarly on the shoulder. The latter turned and gave him such a mild and dignified yet grievous surprise, that even the self-possession of his friend deserted him. He shrank from that gaze of astonishment at his forgetfulness of respect, and the gaze of the company was instantly averted to silence."

It is curious, with this anecdote fresh in the mind, to revert to the eulogy delivered by Morris after the death of Washington: "You have all felt the reverence he inspired; it was such that to command seemed to him but the exercise of an ordinary function, while others felt that a duty to obey (anterior to the injunctions of civil ordinance or the compulsion of a military rule), was imposed by the high behests of nature."—H. T. Tuckerman in North American Review.

MAGNIFICENT NIGHT SCENE.

I had occasion, a few weeks since, to take the early train from Providence to Boston, and for this purpose rose at two o'clock in the morning. Everything around was wrapt in darkness and hushed in silence, broken only by what seemed at that hour the unearthly clank and rish of the train. It was a mild, serene mid-summer night, the sky was without a cloud, the winds were whist. The moon, then in its last quarter, had just risen, and the stars shone with a spectral lustre, but little affected by her presence. Jupiter, two hours high, was the herald of the day; the Pleiades, just above the horizon, shed their sweet influence in the east; Lyma sparkled near the zenith; Andromeda veiled her newly discovered glories from the naked eye in the south; the steady pointers, far beneath the pole, looked feebly up from the depths of the north to their sovereign.

Such was the glorious spectacle as I entered the train. As we proceeded, the timid approach of twilight became more perceptible; the intense blue of the sky began to soften; the smaller stars, like little children, went first to rest; the sister beams of the Pleiades soon melted together; but the bright constellations of the west and north remained unchanged. Steadily the work of transfiguration went on. Hands of angels, hidden from mortal eyes, shifted the scenery of heaven; the glories of night dissolved into the glories of the dawn. The blue sky now turned more softly gray; the great watch-stars shut up their holy eyes; the east began to kindle. Faint streaks of purple soon blushed along the sky; the whole celestial concave was filled with the flowing tides of the morning light, which came pouring down from above in one great ocean of radiance; till at length, as we reached the Blue Hills, a flash of purple fire blazed out from above the horizon, and turned the dewy tear-drops of flower and leaf into rubies and diamonds. In a few seconds, the everlasting gates of the morning were thrown wide open, and the lord of day, arrayed in glories too severe for the gaze of man, began his course.—Hon. Edward Everett's Address at Albany.

THE CHINESE MONARCHY.

The era of the Chinese monarchy has been variously fixed from 2552 to 2132 years before Christ, and the year 2637 has been chosen for the lawful epoch. The difference arises from the uncertain duration of the first two dynasties, and the vacant space that lies beyond them as far as the real or fabulous times of Fohi. The thirty-six eclipses of Confucius, thirty-one of which have been verified, were observed between 722 and 480 years before Christ. China is, undoubtedly, the oldest empire in the world; its authentic history extends over the marvellous period of 4000 years. About two centuries before our era, the Chinese were possessed of ink, paper, and the art of printing. They were also acquainted with gunpowder, and excelled in pyrotechny.—Baltimore Sun.

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.

This city, of which we present some fine illustrations, drawn expressly for us in Klumb's best style, is situated on the northwest bank of Detroit River, in Wayne county. The city is supplied with water from Detroit River. The reservoir and hydraulic works, of which we present a view, are situated upon Atwater Street, in the upper part of the city. The reservoir which contains the water is of cast iron, sixty feet in diameter and twenty feet deep, and is supported by a circular brick building sixty-two feet in diameter at an elevation of forty-seven feet from the ground. The water is raised to the reservoir by a steam engine, which works a forcing pump that is fixed several feet below the surface of the river. The building occupied by this engine is seen on the left of the reservoir in our engraving. The old State House, seen in our first engraving, is a brick building of a florid style of architecture. It fronts upon State Street, and is enclosed in a fine park. The capital of the State being changed to Lansing, left this building without occupation, and it is now used as a school. The post-office and mariner's church are located in a Gothic stone building corner of Woodward Avenue and Woodbridge Street, and are delineated in our third engraving. A portion of this building is also occupied as offices. The Odd Fellows' Hall, depicted in our last engraving, is also located upon Woodward Avenue, near the corner of Congress Street. It is a neat, substantial building, and makes a pleasing appearance upon the street. A commercial college is also in the building. St. Ann's Church, upon Larned, corner of Bates Streets, is chosen for illustration from the peculiarity and picturesqueness of its appearance. The body of the building is of dark stone, the towers and steeples being of wood. On the left of our picture is seen a part of a building containing the water works office, and also an engine house. Detroit has several extensive manufactories. It has five large saw-mills, which turn out nine million feet of lumber and four million laths annually. Ship and boat building is also largely carried on. There are several large foundries and machine shops for the manufacture of heavy machinery, that employ several hundred hands. The business of Detroit is immense. The annual exports, coastwise, amount to above $4,000,000, and the imports to upward

$15,000,000. The shipping of the port, June 30, 1854, amounted to an aggregate of 52,456 tons, of which 21,368 tons were employed in steam navigation. Population in 1853, 34,436. The village of Detroit was incorporated in 1802. In 1805, it was destroyed by fire. In 1812, the fort and town surrendered to the British, but were re-occupied in 1813. The following is a condenser account of Hull's surrender at Detroit:—Soon after the declaration of war, on the 16th of August, General Hull, the governor of Michigan Territory, surrendered his whole army, and the fort at Detroit, without a single battle, to General Brock. "So entirely unprepared was the public for this extraordinary event, that no one could have believed it to have taken place, until communicated from an official source." Hull had been sent at the head of about 2500 men to Detroit, with a view of putting an end to the Indian hostilities in that part of the country. At the time of the surrender of the fort, it is said that his force consisted of more than 1000 men, that of the British was 1300, of whom more than half were Indians. When the British column had arrived within 500 yards of the American lines, General Hull ordered his men, who were placed in a favorable situation, to annoy the enemy, to retreat into the fort, and that the cannon should not be fired. "Immediately there was heard a universal hush of indignation." The order, however, could not be disobeyed. The men were ordered to stack their arms; a white flag was hung out upon the walls, and a communication passed between the two generals, which was shortly followed by a capitulation. Not only the American force at Detroit, but various detachments from the fort, the volunteers, and all the provisions at Raisin, the fortified posts and garrisons, and the whole territory and inhabitants of Michigan, were delivered over to the commanding general of the British forces. Two thousand five hundred stand of arms, forty barrels of powder, and twenty-five iron and eight brass pieces of ordnance, the greater part of which had been captured from the British in the revolutionary war, were surrendered with them. The American volunteers and militia were sent home, on condition of not serving again during the war, unless exchanged. The general and the regular troops were sent to Quebec as prisoners of war. Being exchanged, General Hull was prosecuted by the government of the United States, and arraigned before a military tribunal, who acquitted him of the charge of treason, but sentenced him to death, for cowardice and unofficerlike conduct. But in consequence of his age and revolutionary services, the president remitted the punishment of death, but deprived him of all military command.—As an amusing contrast to the city of to-day, we here copy a picturesque sketch of Detroit in the olden time, from that charming book, "Shoepac Recollections," by Walter March, which cannot fail to interest and entertain our readers:—"Ours was a little antiquated city. Its inhabitants were mostly French. At the time I came upon the stage of events, the transition to a modern American town had scarcely commenced. The body of the population was still of the ancien régime. The few Americans were officers, or ex-officers, of either the general or territorial government, and their families, relations, dependents and friends, whom they had persuaded to venture beyond the 'jumping-off place,' as Buffalo was then termed. The spirit of emigration had not been fully aroused; and the spirit of speculation, if felt at all, was confined to the fur-traders, a class made up of all nations. I cannot compare the society more nearly than to that of some principal East India Company station in a city of Hindostan. There were the governor of the territory and his family, the judicial, executive, and military functionaries, with their families and their dependents; like subahdar, nabobs, begums and the lesser lights—traders and natives, French, Indian and half-breed. But one could not well imagine a pleasanter state of feeling than mutually existed, with sufficient distinction between the different castes or classes to prevent wrangling, and yet sufficient community of interest, prejudice and pleasure to make everybody sociable. The French gave a tone of gaiety—the military, both elevation and hospitality. There were balls, where everybody danced with everybody's wife and daughter. There were theatricals, where the most dignified gentlemen took parts. It may be a mere whim, but I think I never have elsewhere met such easy polish and affability among gentlemen. There was no touchiness about position in the social scale, and consequently neither stiffness nor affectation; and to this day, the same easy grace of manner is notable among the sons and daughters of the good old city. The traveller, journeying at that period from New York westward, after leaving Albany, penetrated into regions where civilization grew dimmer and dimmer as he advanced, until he became quite certain of having passed the ultima thule, when he would stumble with astonishment on our little community. There he would be welcomed with a courtesy no less gracious, and a hospitality much warmer than he would himself have extended to a stranger in the metropolis. Yet there he would behold the Frenchman, riding in his two-wheeled cart to market with white fish and onions, and screaming a rascally patois. Or he might observe a wedding procession, of the same mercenary race, driving through the principal—or rather only—avenue, at full speed to church, two and two, in little antique calèches; the bride, of course, dressed in white, but wearing no bonnet, though rejoicing in a veil that sweeps the ground, and her bridesmaids driving after, as honeymooners as herself—a happy state of things to which the dear ladies of the present day are fast returning. As he sauntered along up the street, he would see old-fashioned buildings, stores and dwellings forming a promiscuous row, with high gables and dormer-windows, roofs peaked like Vandyke hats, with their edges notched and painted red, and doors panelled into four parts, and opening by subdivisions, like modern window-shutters. Motley groups, consisting of French, Americans and Indians, sit with their sociable pipes enjoying confabulations made up of words, nods, shrugs and the impenetrable "ugh! ugh!" of the taciturn red man. Peeping into the halls and rooms as he passed, he might here and there discern a carpet, but generally the floors were covered with Indian mats. The shops would be filled with bales of furs, gaily-colored calicoes—known as Indian calicoes—moccasins of maple sugar, bordered with painted porcupine quills, deerskins, moccasins and Indian trinkets; few such, however, as are now palmed off upon the curious and credulous stranger at Niagara. Often he may meet on the sidewalk an Indian—some dark Potawatimie, or tall, painted Sio or Fox—one of nature's own noblemen, erect and martial in his bearing, and with a single ridge of stiff, black hair, standing like the crest of a helmet on his head; or, peradventure, groups of Winnebagoes, with blue blankets on their handsome squaws, while their own arms, ears and noses would jingle with silver ornaments; or, skulking along, some thievish craven of a Menomonic, whose name was no less a term of reproach among the nobler tribes, than that of the Samaritan with the disinclined children of Judah. Passing above the town, he might find large, conical, birch-bark tents pitched on the long slopes of the river bank, and graceful, light pirogues drawn up in regular rows on the shore; these belong to the Indians, whom he may, if it chance to be payment season, behold in hundreds, or even thousands. Suetotash is boiling in huge iron moccasins, mats, or moccasins, or cooking game, or pilfered chickens in the sugar-baler, or smoking fish, depending from a stick sustained over the fire by two forked uprights. Shame to the pale faces!—he might hear drunken noises issuing from a lodge here and there; or worse, see an Indian and his wife, or several squaws by themselves, alternately caressing each other and quarrelling, moved by the demon that lurks in fire-water. There must be dark shadows in every picture, especially in a picture of human life. Gratefully, now, let him turn, at the soft sound of an Indian flute, played with no great skill or variety of cadence, but plaintively, by some young dandy. It is a reed, into which holes are buried for the gamut of notes, and around it are wound deer-skin thongs to prevent splitting. Possibly, your Indian Pan may be joined by a musical brother on the drum, which is naught else, after all, than a species of rude banjo—a skin drawn over a hoop, as everybody knows. Then fortunate the Gothamite might deem himself to witness an Indian dance at that comparatively primitive period. As he strolls out further from the town, he is struck with a peculiarity in the divisions of the farms; for each one is but a narrow strip of land running back into the woods two or three miles, so that every farmer may have a front on the river. A hundred or so yards from the beach stands the farm-house, similar to those already described, with only more amplitude of dimensions, and a broad, indolent, sun-loving porch, on which sleeps an old dog—practised no less in rascosity fore than experienced in swimming after wild ducks. In cozy familiarity, an old cat is blinking by his side, or purring as she rubs her electric coat against his sluggish hair; or perched upon his back, a piping chicken is with difficulty balancing itself, as it picks at the flies which buzz around his nose, or alight with a tickling mischief on his lazily-flapping ears. In front of the house are the cherry-trees, and in rear the pear and apple-orchards; and the traveller is surprised to find the best of fruit thus far beyond the pale of civilization—fruits brought from sunny France, and planted by the skillful Jesuit; apples, red to the core, large and luscious; cherries that rival nectarines; and pears of every variety, and of every season, from July to November. Nor will the patch of onions escape his notice: it is a Frenchman's flower-garden—the invariable concomitant of every family who may claim a foot square of mother earth. The fish-net or seine is stretched on the fence. The long, flint-lock duck gun, with leathern pouch and powder-horn, is hung on wooden hooks in the hall. The canoe is drawn up on the beach. Bot or brass pots over the fires. A small army of famished, wolfish-looking dogs lie around, winking lazily in the sun; and no smaller army of naked children are running everywhere—some pitching bright coppers, others shooting with their bows and arrows, and others swimming and diving in the limpid water; while around on the trees or fence, or sides of the wigwags, he may behold many infant papooses sleeping in their hanging cradles of hide and birch; or with their heads strapped back, looking on the scene with wise, unwinking eyes. They seldom cry, and are no impudent representations of patience on a monument. He would meet pretty, fawn-faced young squaws who glance coquettishly at him, and no less so at themselves, or rather some ornament, or little rude mirror half-concealed on their persons. Now and then one peeps at him from behind the blanket at the tent-door. Respectable elderly women would be sitting around, at work on hark! you hear the sound of distant voices come stealing over the water. Turn towards the river. See a long pirogue, or more ample Mackinaw boat—perhaps a little fleet of them in a single line, manned by voyageurs, or courteurs de bois, and loaded with packs of peltries. The oarsmen have fitted out at Mackinaw, to appear in style at Detroit—the greater station, and nearer civilization. Probably the present is the glad occasion to which they have looked forward, and they have talked over their plans concerning it for many, many months. Each garcon has a sash around his waist, and pulls a red oar. They keep perfect time—and it is joyous quick time—with the notes of a French song which was chanted in France a century ago: "Mallbrooks s'en va t'a general!" Or perchance the air is one you may not recognize: "A Lon-don day, S'en va coucher!" No music could be more lively or inspiring. It comes over the water—is accompanied by the plash of oars. It is roared out with the utmost spirit, too, by that most glorious of all instruments, the human voice. It has pealed through the woods, and over the rivers and lakes, for thousands of miles. It has animated those brave adventurers in camp, at portage, through summer and winter, rain and snow, sickness, peril and death; and now, joy! joy! it greets the steeples of St. Ann! The children run out of the houses, down to the river shore, to hear it; the maiden turns pale, and blushes, and hurries to the door; the old man hobbles out and waves his hat. Troops of people rush down to the wharves to see them land; and such shouts of welcome and rejoicing never were known before."

ISLAND OF SICILY.

The fair island of Sicily, once the garden and granary of Rome, is now an oppressed and neglected appanage of the kingdom of Naples. In years past she has had many rulers—Greeks, Carthaginians, Romans, Saracens, Normans, French Germans and Spaniards; but under none has she been so misgoverned as under her present masters, the Spanish Bourbons. The people are heavily taxed, but not for the promotion of great enterprises or internal improvements. The roads are few and in bad repair; the mines are unworked, and everything betokens the poverty of the country. The city of Syracuse, which once contained more than a million of inhabitants, has dwindled into a town of but fourteen thousand, and the total population of the island is but little more than a million and a half.—Charleston (S. C.) Courier.

A MEMORY.

BY ELIZA F. MORIARTY.

'Neath a beech tree's leafy shadow
One sweet summer day of old,
Happy children we were playing;
Care to us was then untold;
You and Jimmy were the lambskins,
I the shepherd of the fold.

Gamesome was our cousin Jimmy,
No young lamb was blither as he,
Richer rang his liquid laughter
Than a wild bird's melody;
'Neath the gentle skies of Eire
Few had gayer hearts than we.

All amid the grasses sporting,
Headless of the flying hours,
When bright butterflies pursuing,
Treading down the garden flowers;
Often since when pleasure seeking,
Crushed we some sweet peace of ours.

More like some dark dream of sorrow,
Seemed it than a chilly truth,
When they sought us in the garden,
Vainly speaking words of ruth—
"Jimmy, dead is thy dear mother,
Now from heaven she guards thy youth."

Hushed was darling Jimmy's laughter,
Drooped he like a flower woe,
Those sad words that Sabbath morning
Fell like night his heart upon;
Long he sobbed "Come back, sweet mama!"
All his young heart's glory gone.

Jimmy soon will reach proud manhood,
Our sweet childhood's years are o'er,
He in foreign climes in sorrow,
We upon a distant shore,
'Neath the smiling skies of Eire
We shall meet ah! never more.

TOO MISERABLE BY HALF.

BY HERBERT LINTON.

IN the wide range of open country that meets the traveller's eye in one of our Northern States, there is no lovelier spot than Cedar Vale. The house was low, and rather quaint than elegant in its architecture. But before it was a wide sweep of lawn and river, forming the loveliest landscape in the world; behind it were cultivated fields and dense forests.

There came a time when for me all the sunshine seemed pressed out of the visible world; when life looked dark to me, and Hope turned aside her head and wept. Almost I had begun to doubt even the goodness of God, for sorrow had hung a dark curtain between me and the light of his countenance. I sickened of myself, the outward world, and human nature; and my day-dreams only yielded in the intensity of their horrors to those which assailed me at night. I did not know how much I needed the kind and gentle hand of a friend to be laid on my suffering heart; and yet such was the only remedy which would touch or mitigate my disorder.

I was walking one day through the crowded city, careless of the gay throngs that passed me, and thinking how utter and complete was the desolation of the crowded thoroughfare, when I felt some one touch my shoulder. Mechanically I turned round and met the gaze of an old friend whom I had not seen for years. It was the first touch of gladness which had visited me for many months, and I aroused myself sufficiently to give Hervey Mansfield something like a cordial greeting.

"Why, doctor," I exclaimed, "so far from Cedar Vale."

"Even so far from Cedar Vale," he answered, "yet only here on pressing business, and deeply anxious to get back the moment I can accomplish it. Nothing would tempt me to stay in your unfounded city twenty-four hours longer! How you can exist here at all is a great mystery to me!"

I related to him briefly the sad and mournful experiences of the last few months, and received my friend's pitying and genuine sympathy. His full appreciation of my sorrow was in itself a balm to my heart, and I felt for the first time in my life, how fully such sympathy can reach the heart of the mourner.

My friend was a physician, deeply and devotedly attached to his profession, and by no means confining himself to the outward tokens of disease; he knew that they often lay far deeper than can be seen by those who only look superficially. Over me at this time he seemed almost to possess a mesmeric power, and I yielded at once to its influence.

"You are looking pale and ill, also, Herbert," said my friend. "Come home with me to Cedar Vale, and leave this dusty city for those who have strength and spirits to endure it."

I looked up into his good, honest face, and saw such an expression of genuine heartiness in the invitation, that I felt prompted to accept it at once.

"But your father and mother, Hervey," I said—"how will they like to have a visitor thrust thus unceremoniously upon them?"

"Don't trouble yourself about that, Herbert. They remember your last visit, and still speak of it with pleasure; besides which, you know that I am an only son, and my happiness makes theirs. So you need have no scruples on that score, but come at once."

"When do you leave?" I asked.

"This afternoon at four o'clock. I am impatient to get away."

I agreed to meet him at the station, and parted from him to pack my portmanteau for the journey.

A railway car is no place for conversation or sight-seeing; but we were amply remunerated the last five miles of our journey, for the railway extended no nearer Cedar Vale, and the doctor had left his chaise at the station. Sad as I was, I could not shut my eyes to the beauties which everywhere surrounded us, and my friend's conversation fairly drew me away from my sadness.

An hour's rapid driving brought us under the shadow of the old quaint gateway, in time to see the most glorious of sunsets. The elder Mr. Mansfield met us at the door, and gave me a hearty welcome, which was echoed by his wife, as we entered the pleasant parlor where she sat. Her greeting to her son was as warm as though he had been absent months instead of days.

"How is Anstice, mother?" asked the doctor.

"Much better," she answered, "but still unable to come down stairs. Will you go to her a moment before tea? She will perhaps expect you."

He replied by running swiftly up the broad staircase, and I heard a sound of joyful welcome as he entered the room above.

I was aware that Hervey had no sister, and concluded that "Anstice" must be some child who might be visiting Cedar Vale, for the laugh with which she greeted him was as low as an infant's. He came down soon, and we did ample justice to the delicious country supper. The old lady's steaming Hyson was equalled only by the thick rolling cream and nice white biscuit, flanked on each side by delicate preserves; while a cold chicken was considerably added to the evening meal for the benefit of the travellers. After this we had a walk under the rich August moon; we then separated for the night. How delicious seemed the wide airy room with its wealth of white dainty hangings, its cool straw matting, and the rich vines trailing over its windows. I had not experienced a sensation of such peace and comfort as now came upon me in the quiet home of my friend for many months. Sleep visited my eyelids unaccompanied by the horrors of which I had dreamed for some time previous; and I woke refreshed and invigorated in body and spirit.

The doctor was awaiting me in the pleasant breakfast-room, the windows of which were curtained only by the soft green of a trailing grape vine. As we sat down to the luxurious breakfast, I observed that Hervey was selecting the most delicate food, and placing it on a small tray.

"Take this up to Anstice," he said to the servant in attendance. A smile which his mother exchanged with him brought a deep blush on his brown, manly cheek.

"Surely, this Anstice can be no child," I said to myself; but in the earnest and interesting conversation, in which we were soon engaged, I forgot to ask any question respecting her.

After breakfast, Hervey went out to visit his patients, and I took a stroll in the garden. Returning, he joined me there, and began to select the finest and rarest flowers, tossing them carelessly into a small basket, which he found lying on a seat in the summer house. As we returned to the house, I noticed that he again ran up stairs, and again I heard the low, musical laugh.

A week passed in this manner, every day bringing me some fresh proof of my friend's devotion to the invisible being, whom I still thought of only as a child. One morning at breakfast, Mrs. Mansfield announced that Anstice would be able to leave the room.

"You had better take her down in your arms, Hervey," said she, "if you feel perfectly able to do so."

I looked at the strong, commanding form of Dr. Hervey Mansfield, as he rose from the table, and wondered what should hinder him from bringing so light a burden as a child down the broad, easy staircase.

"Can't I help you, Hervey?" said I, playfully; and was rather puzzled at the honest and unconscious way in which he answered, that he thought he should be able to take her down with some little assistance from the servant girl. He left the room, and as I passed into the parlor, I observed that a couch was prepared there, as for an invalid, just under the vine-shaded window. In a few minutes I heard a stir upon the staircase, and made my exit through one of the long windows, thinking that I might annoy the sick child. Half an hour afterwards, Hervey beckoned to me from the door. I joined him immediately, and leading me forward to the couch, he introduced me in his own cordial manner to Miss Milford. I believe that I blushed deeply, for instead of the child whom I expected to see, I beheld a beautiful young lady, whose bright color and rounded form showed that at least she had been no sufferer from illness. One delicate foot peeped out from among the folds of her white muslin dress; the other was enveloped in flannel, and lay upon a cushion.

The solution of the whole matter was, I now thought, before me. I saw it all in the doctor's handsome and satisfied face, as he bent down benignly over the recumbent beauty. She looked up at him fondly and admiringly, as he was explaining to me the nature of the accident which had kept her confined so long to her room. It had been done, he said, in jumping from her horse, "carelessly, too," he added, "for what were men fit for but to wait on these slender creatures?"

There was something in the countenance of Anstice Milford, which reminded me of one whom I had loved and lost. The same calm, clear blue eye, the same confiding look, and the same small, beautifully-shaped head—all reminded me of my married love. It came upon me so sadly, and with such deep force, that my heart uttered a deep cry. It was as though the image of my lost Caroline was suddenly placed before me.

I breathed nothing of this, however, to any mortal; and days, and even weeks passed by, and no thought came into my heart of Anstice Milford, except as the beloved of my friend Hervey. To her he was all devotion, and as she became convalescent, his attentions were as marked as ever. She could now walk slowly about the garden, and at the hours in which he visited his patients, I became her sole attendant. Looking at her as the future wife of my friend, I experienced for her only a tender friendship. At least I thought so; and even now my heart acquits me of all disloyalty towards Hervey Mansfield.

As time went on, we walked and rode together in the hours of his absence; and I know not whether it was most painful or pleasing to me to watch the gentle, confiding manner which she invariably used towards me. I thought I knew her feelings perfectly—that she looked upon me as Hervey's friend, and wished to make me her own. How well I accepted the trust, time showed.

Up to this time I had been perfectly ignorant of the manner in which she became an inmate of my friend's family. On this subject, Hervey's mother was kind enough to enlighten me. Hervey had once saved her from drowning, while she was under the care of her aunt. Anstice was an orphan almost from her birth, and was brought up entirely by her mother's sister. Mrs. Elwood had suffered the little creature to run at large, and she was thereby continually meeting with accidents.

On one occasion she had undertaken to paddle a boat, and lost her balance. Hervey Mansfield was just passing, and risked his own life to save her. This happened in the river, which runs just below Cedar Vale, and she, of course, was carried thither. From that time she made long and frequent visits to Mrs. Mansfield, who would gladly have adopted her for their own. It was on one of these visits that she had met with the accident which had so long confined her to her room.

Hervey treated her with the fondest care, such as one would bestow on a petted child—just such affection, in fact, as I had always supposed Hervey Mansfield would show to one whom he intended to make his wife. I found, however, to my consternation, that these walks and rides with Anstice were doing me a positive injury. Not that I was unfaithful to Hervey Mansfield, or his interests, but my heart began to tell me that I was loving Anstice too well, and I resolved to terminate my visit as soon as possible.

I told Hervey that I must go. He combated my resolution in his own frank, hearty manner, begged me not to think of such a thing, and declared that he was not going to have his month's work spoiled by having me fall into low spirits again, as I should inevitably do, if I went back into my bachelor's den. He called upon his mother and Anstice to try their persuasions to induce me to stay longer; and when I pleaded business, he turned away with a half-irritated, half-incredulous air.

I knew my own weakness, however, best, and left them in spite of their earnest entreaties for me to prolong my visit. Hervey's prediction proved true. My spirits relapsed into a still more despondent mood, and in a fit of desperation I embarked for Europe. Driven by a restless spirit, I wandered from place to place, visiting every scene of interest, yet bearing about with me a sad heart, and I suppose as sad a countenance. I passed much of my time in the picture galleries of Europe. There were faces constantly meeting my sight that wore the blended features of Caroline Ashton and Anstice Milford, and those I gazed upon long and sadly.

There were living faces, also, that captivated my imagination, if they did not appeal to my heart. Nay, I am not sure that, bachelor as I was, I was not always proof against the fascinations of the beautiful Italians. But after all, I was true to my first loves; the flashing black eyes and midnight hair of Gabrielle d'Este paled before the remembrance of the sunny locks and bright blue eyes of those whom I had worshipped in other climes. Those who cling pertinaciously to the idea that the heart can have but one love, may sneer at the blending of these two images; and yet the two-fold love had really settled in my soul into one and the same.

I had made an engagement one day to visit some ruins, which were said to be the finest in Italy. The day was glorious, and the sky that bent above us was such as that land of beauty alone can present. Every tree and hill rose up sharply against the sky, strongly and well defined, and were mirrored softly in the silver streams and quiet lakelets that were dancing and sparkling in the sunshine, or sleeping in their quiet beauty beneath the hillsides.

We started on horseback, in the early morning, reaching our destination about nine o'clock. We were vexed at finding that a party had preceded us, and we took pains to avoid them by going to a distant part of the ruins. I had lagged behind, however, to secure my horse, and my party had already gone in advance of me, when I heard my name called out by a voice which seemed familiar, although I could not remember when, or where I had heard it. I looked up, and among the group that had first arrived, I recognized the frank, sunny countenance of my friend, the doctor. He looked elate with happiness, and coming towards me with his cordial, earnest manner, as of old, shook my hand affectionately, and begged me to join his party. The thought of Anstice Milford came over me; and when he added that he wished to introduce me to his wife, all the old jealousy came up with fourfold intensity.

I pleaded engagements with others, but it was of no use; he fairly dragged me to his circle, where my eyes were bewildered by the sight of several beautiful women. I heard Hervey's voice introducing me to his wife, and I looked up and saw Anstice—Anstice herself, even more beautiful than in former days—and still another, larger and more noble beauty beside her. Both were proffering their hands, and I was trying to call Anstice Mrs. Mansfield, but the words died on my lips; and making an apology that I must join my party, I left them, Hervey earnestly entreating me to return and spend the day with them, which I promised to do, if I could persuade the others to do the same. I walked slowly enough to the place where my friends were sitting; my mind was full of sweet and bitter fancies. Anstice, with her full and glorious beauty, was then really lost to me forever—and yet I had not the heart to grudge her to my noble friend.

By the time I arrived I had preached a lesson of patience and forbearance to my heart, and fancied myself quite a hero in thus trying to subdue my feelings. I found my friends ready and eager to go back, as the place where Hervey had seated himself was decidedly the most picturesque part of the ruins. We therefore joined them again, and introducing my party to Hervey, I left to him the task of performing the same ceremony to his companions.

I found Anstiee willing, and in fact earnest to enter into conversation with me, and we passed a pleasant hour in recalling old memories of Cedar Vale. As to Hervey, his attention seemed to be equally divided between Anstiee and her whom I called the lofty beauty; but as I had not caught her name, I could not as yet address her.

The day wore pleasantly on. Almost I caught the inspiration of gaiety, that breathed out so fully from Hervey and his companions. I could not complain of Anstiee, for she bestowed on me all the attention that any friend of the doctor's could reasonably expect—may, even more than I had a right to expect; for must she not have remembered my devotion at Cedar Vale? Still, it was kind in her thus to forget all the past, and to treat me as her husband's friend. Nor was the other beauty behind her in attentions to myself; and as I gazed upon the glorious eyes and magnificent brow of her whom both Hervey and Anstiee called Cecile, I thought how well she would have been fitted to be the wife of my friend; and I could not help wishing that he had left Anstiee to one who would have loved her as fondly, to say the least, as himself.

We rode home under the bright moonlight, and I was astonished to see that Hervey left his wife to my care, while he himself escorted Cecile. I took the opportunity to inquire after all my old friends at Cedar Vale, and found that Mr. and Mrs. Mansfield still lived in the full tide of health and happiness.

"We are a happy family, I assure you, now," said Anstiee, "especially since Cecile has come among us."

"Indeed," I said. "I knew nothing of this new relation before; I perceive that you call her cousin."

"Yes, she is Hervey's cousin, and, of course," said she, smiling, "she must be mine also."

We parted at the door of my hotel, and I consigned Anstiee to the care of the doctor. All three pressed me for an early visit, and for a whole week, I went day after day to sun myself in the smiles of the two fair ladies. There was one peculiarity that struck me in the behaviour of the two; and that was, that when Hervey was absent, Cecile showed signs of unmistakable impatience and anxiety, while Anstiee was calm, serene and happy.

Truth to tell, I now sought Cecile's society much more than that of Anstiee. Indeed, our conversations, especially on the subject of marriage, became exceedingly confidential. So familiar had we become, that Cecile often rallied me on my choosing a single life; and one day she sent an electric chain throughout my whole being, by exclaiming, "Why in the world, Mr. Linton, do you not marry Anstiee Milford?" I looked at her in blank dismay. Had Cecile heard of my blind attachment to Anstiee—and was she amusing herself at my expense?

I could not believe it of one so habitually kind and friendly, and I gasped out a demand for an explanation of her meaning. She looked agnost, as if feeling conscious that some mistake had been committed, not knowing what. Indeed, we both sat blushing and stammering, until Hervey came in with his light, ringing step, and sitting down by Cecile, he asked her, tenderly, what was the matter. "I cannot tell," she said, "except that I must have asked Mr. Linton a very unfortunate question."

Hervey saw at once that there was something really serious between us, and asked her what could be the question that had disturbed us both so deeply.

"I simply inquired," she said, "half-seriously, half-jestingly, why he did not marry my dear cousin. I know now that it must have been an improper question, and I sincerely beg Mr. Linton's pardon for my rudeness."

"There is no apology necessary, Miss Mansfield," I said—I had always called her Miss Mansfield, as I understood that she was the elder Mr. Mansfield's niece—"I can readily forgive you, although I must confess to you both that the question touched a sore place in my heart. I did like Miss Milford, and could I have won her love, I would have resigned her to no person on earth, except to my friend Hervey. He alone deserves her, and I am glad that he has won the prize."

I cannot describe to you, reader, the look of blank surprise which pervaded the countenances of both Hervey and Cecile. Never was astonishment more strongly depicted. My friend looked as though he thought me mad, and Cecile's beautiful eyes filled with tears.

"There is some mistake here," she said, a little proudly, I thought, "which no one but Miss Milford can clear up. I will send her to you, Mr. Linton. 'Come, Hervey,' she said, playfully, as she clasped her small hands round his arm, 'we will leave them together. This must be some lovers' quarrel, which we may only widen by intermeddling with.'"

It was my turn to look astonished, and I did it with all my might. Hervey took Cecile away, and returned with Anstiee on his arm.

"I cannot tell what thought has taken possession of our friend; but if the idea was not too preposterous, I should almost think that he believed me to be married to you, Anstiee, instead of to Cecile."

What a fool I had been! Now that the solution was before me, it seemed so stupid of me not to have read the riddle aright. What could Anstiee—what could Cecile have thought of me? I didn't care at all for Hervey. I could make it all right enough with him, but to stand committed in the eyes of two beings like the others, was more than I, sensitive bachelor that I was, could bear with equanimity. An hour's conversation with Hervey set everything right; and he was even truer enough to betray to me that Anstiee Milford had more than a passing liking for my humble self.

"I love her next to Cecile," said the doctor, "and I shall be glad to bestow her upon you whenever you see fit to make the demand."

Again the doctor, remembering my ludicrous mistake, burst out into a long and hearty laugh, for which I forgave him in consideration of the crumb of comfort which he had just bestowed on me.

The wedding was begun under Italian skies, and completed in the following September amid the beautiful shades of Cedar Vale—an arrangement which seemed highly satisfactory to Mr. and Mrs. Mansfield, who had been patiently awaiting the return of their children, and who seemed to look upon me only as another link of the chain which bound all of their hearts together.

A beautiful cottage, in the immediate neighborhood of Cedar Vale, belonging to a gentleman who was about leaving America to take up his residence in Germany, was for sale, with all its furniture and appurtenances, of which I became the joyful possessor. It was so pleasant to think that I should ever be under the influence of Hervey Mansfield's hopeful and trusting spirit; and my marriage with Anstiee was like taking out a new lease of life. What had become of the faithless and untrusting thoughts which I had cherished before coming to Cedar Vale?

"Even for the dead I would not find my soul to grief." And even as the dead face of Caroline Ashton had mingled with that of Anstiee, in the picture galleries at Florence, so the two became now in my mind one and indivisible.

THE TRAVELLING MANIA.

BY MRS. E. WELLMONT.

THIS habit of travelling had become a second nature to the Bly family. Not a single soul of them could content themselves at home six weeks at a time during the whole year. For this reason they never had any quiet enjoyment in any place. We have often looked in upon them when some member of the eight children was sick, and supposed there could be no desire then to leave the darkened chamber, where everything was arranged with exquisite skill to make one comfortable; but still the words recurred, "we are hoping soon to be able to carry our child into the country," or, if at their country residence, "they did believe a trip to the seaside, or a journey to Niagara, would operate as a charm upon his or her debility." It is not a little curious to observe the accommodating spirit of physicians in recommending prescriptions which exactly take well with their patients. Dr. Blunt always told Mrs. Bly a "change was necessary," and she fully endorsed the sentiment.

And there sat the little pale seamstress, not allowing herself time to wipe the perspiration from her wearied and aching head, for the fifth flounce must be set upon Arabella's dress before tomorrow morning at seven o'clock, when she must take the cars for a western tour. Beside this, full a dozen pair of hose lay unopened upon the table, the eyelets to half a dozen pairs of boots need repairing, and a stitch here and there in this and that frock, that had been carelessly switched against a nail or other projection, all were ranged in the workroom, to be successively attended to in proper order. This same Arabella was sitting in a drawing-room below, ensconced in a recombent chair, fanning herself with great velocity, listening to every sound of the bell, since it lacked but three minutes of the time to the engagement Mr. Faber, the German flutist, had made to accompany her to Nahant that morning. Five minutes from this time he arrived; the coach conveyed them to the boat, and the eldest daughter without care or trouble had rolled away for the day.

Busily our seamstress pursued her task—the last time she looked out being upon the pair who had just left the house; then she more actively pursued her labors, as her thoughts took a disursive range. Now and then the low snatches of a song might be heard—the seamstress was picturing the probable end to the career of Miss Arabella. The young lady had told her some of her secrets, for it was ascertained long since, that although Malvina was obliged to work for a living, yet she had much common sense, and an education which would compare with many young ladies of higher pretensions. But her parents had died young, and the guardian of the orphan had carefully invested three hundred dollars for her, as her marriage portion, and to meet her daily expenses, and to secure for herself a home. She had been recommended to Mrs. Bly as "apt with the needle."

Malvina, too, had a lover. He was no French professor, nor Italian tourist, nor German philosopher, nor English nobleman; but a plain farmer's son, born and bred in her native village, of a good practical education, correct moral character, and a decent patrimony in expectancy. She had told Arabella of "her John," and had read to her random parts of his letters, and Arabella wondered how such a young man could express himself so happily. There can be no doubt but that the seamstress's engagement heightened all the labors she was called upon to perform. The compensation for her services mitigated her pain, and the prospect of a vacation when she should meet "John," made her more unmindful of her increasing debility.

By four o'clock she had completed the fifth flounce; she shook out the dress before the admiring gaze of the mother, who remarked "it ought to look well, as it cost thirty-five dollars, and should be carefully worn; but young ladies now-a-days had not much care of their apparel." The hose, the boots, the torn frocks were all completed, ready to be packed for the journey; twilight had deepened into darkness, the bells had rung their nine o'clock concert, and no Arabella came. Mr. Bly had been to the wharf where the boat landed, but nothing but the waves and a few merry boatmen met his gaze. He had glanced into more than one confectioner's saloon, had extended his walk both south and west, but there were no traces of his daughter; and with a disquieted heart he returned back with the most painful forebodings. Malvina was sent to search the chamber Arabella occupied, to ascertain if any scrap of writing or other clue could be found to account for her strange absence. The "Sorrow of Werter"—the romantic girl's idea of true love—lay upon her dressing-table, scored and marked in all its pathetic sentences, and a note on tinted rose paper protruded from the fly-leaf. Malvina, with her sacred regard to honor, carried it unopened to her mother, who read its contents amidst alternate sobs, and tears, and hysterical emphasis.

"My friends, call me not a blinded fool; say not I am the dupe of a mystical German lover; tell me not about severing the ties of kindred and friends at home. I am not mad when I tell you that there is only one true love that the heart ever knows; that mine is the concentration of a long struggle, a deep passion, an uncontrollable affection, all pledged to a reciprocating heart worthy to return the sacred flame, and keep it burning brightly. Yes, Julius Faber, when you read this, will be my husband by legal right, as he has long been my heart's idol. Do not grieve for me. I dread not poverty; I am not disgraced; nothing remains for me but to weep and be happy. I have travelled until I am weary with night-seeing—am sick of seaside and mountain scenery. Nothing that is grand or sublime in nature moves me; nothing fills my soul but a life of prospective enjoyment with my own Julius. We sail for Germany to-morrow—not Nahant, as you supposed. I am provided with suitable apparel. Do not grieve, my dear parents, over my complete happiness and the accomplishment of my long cherished purpose. We may meet again. A kiss for my father and mother, brothers and sisters, from ARABELLA."

Driven to frenzy, on the verge of desperation, Mrs. Bly could not think of remaining at home and brooding over her sorrows. "Could not the daughter's conduct be concealed? Need the world know but that they were aware of her departure?" There was comfort in these thoughts. Malvina and Mr. Bly only were in the mother's secret, and they would be silent. Mrs. Bly wiped her tears away, and her hopefulness returned. The three younger children would accompany her; the others were sent to different localities, the house was closed, the trunks upon the pavement, the coach-horses pawed, and Mrs. Bly and her three little ones, in one week from her daughter's elopement, were at a fashionable watering-place—Arabella not being missed among the crowd.

And how the opposite neighbors envied Mrs. Bly her indulgent husband, and her quiet, easy disposal of her children, and her rural enjoyments, and her fashionable trips! They wondered why it fell to their hard lot to always stay at home and drudge. Those with no families could not shut up their houses for fear of burglars; those with many children were always detained by sickness, or expected country cousins, or more generally because "the times were so hard," and board in "favored localities was so high." Nothing save a picnic in a burning hot sun, or a trip down the harbor when the silvery surface of the water put their eyes out and blistered their faces, or a ninepenny excursion on the horse railroad; these were all the enjoyments they could afford—and what pleasure was there in all this? To be happy, one must go from home—board in a luxurious hotel, dress like a duchess, look upon flirting maidens and silly coxcombs, or old beaux rejuvenated, color your hair, if gray, iron out your wrinkles and crow-feet by "Rowland's Kalydor," have a new upper and under set furnished by the dentist as "temporary," buy lace basques, silk flounces, sets of Honiton lace, an imitation diamond set of jewelry. And those who happen to be blessed with precocious responsibilities, why they must not be overlooked, for they are acquainted with young ladies who ride on horseback with nice young men—and this implies they must have a suit appropriate—and Master Buck drives his tame steed, and carries on a flirtation with Anna. All the while the old folks only look upon them as "mere children, determined to have a good time in their summer vacations." Well, I have not wandered from my story; for all this was just what the young Blys were doing, notwithstanding their sister's elopement stood so recently before their mother as a "horrible, unnatural thing."

And how was it with our stay-at-home neighbors? A paragraph in the evening paper informs them that "last evening some daring burglar entered No. 43—Street, the residence of Mr. Bly, and abstracted all the plate and other valuables, carrying off property to the amount of several thousand dollars; that the family are sojourning at Misty Springs, where one child lies dangerously ill, and the eldest one is suffering from a sprained ankle, and the third has dislocated his thigh by being thrown from a horse."

Poor Mr. Bly returns back to enter his premises—his neighbors gather in friendly sympathy—no trace of the thief is found; but the story has leaked out that Arabella has never been to Germany, and Julius has been seen surveying the premises in the family's absence, and they all seem to feel if travelling from place to place produces such results, the greater benefit results in staying at home, provided one does not leave home under favorable auspices. But Mr. and Mrs. Bly have engaged their passage to go to England the coming autumn, with the exception of two children, who prefer to go and live with Malvina the seamstress, who is now married to John, and lives upon a farm, where she works hard but enjoys the comforts of a good home. What she saved from her wages in flounce-making, etc., has furnished her parlor and spare chamber with every little requisite to give a comfortable air to her dwelling. She moralizes upon outward show and mistaken ideas of happiness, and finally concludes, as all sensible people must, that if one cannot be happy at home, it is pretty certain they will not be abroad.

HON. AMASA J. PARKER.

The career of Judge Parker, of New York, of whom a correct likeness engraved expressly for us is presented on this page, affords a striking example of the results of energy, determination and industry, and an encouragement to young men to struggle manfully in the battle of life. The ancestors of Judge Parker were of the old Puritan blood of New England, and residents in the western part of Connecticut for successive generations. Amasa Parker and Thomas Fenn, his paternal and maternal grandfathers, were soldiers of the Revolution, and widely respected for the sterling virtues of their character—the latter filling various offices of public trust. He was for thirty-eight successive sessions a member of the State legislature. Both were residents, throughout their lives, of the county of Litchfield, in the above State. Amasa J. Parker—the son of Rev. Daniel Parker, for nearly twenty years pastor of the Congregational society of Ellsworth, Connecticut—was born in Sharon, in the same State. In 1816, his father removed to Greenville, Greene county, New York, to take charge of the academy. Young Parker here commenced the study of Latin at the age of nine years; continuing at the academy for two years, he was then removed to Hudson Academy, where he pursued his studies diligently, and finally completed an extensive course in the city of New York. The devoted attention of his father, and of the best teachers of his day, was rewarded by the zeal and diligence of the pupil, whose ardor was such, that at the age of sixteen he had completed the usual collegiate course. Such were his accomplishments, that, notwithstanding his youth, he was made principal of the Hudson Academy, and held the position for four years. Under his supervision the academy was placed in a most prosperous condition, and attained a wide reputation; and such was his youth, that many of his pupils, since distinguished, were older than himself. He was not up to that time a college graduate; but in consequence of a rival academy adducing this as an objection to the young principal, he, in July, 1825, caused himself to be examined at Union College for the entire collegiate course. He passed the ordeal triumphantly, graduated with the senior class, and obtained his degree of Bachelor of Arts, and afterwards, in due course, received the degree of Master of Arts. After graduating, he resumed his duty at the academy; and during the latter portion of his career here he entered the office of the present Judge John W. Edmonds, then of Hudson, to prosecute the study of law. In the spring of 1827 he resigned his trust as principal of the Hudson Academy, and at the age of twenty removed to Delhi, in the county of Delaware, where his uncle, Col. Amasa Parker, a lawyer of distinction, was practising his profession. He entered the office of his uncle, finished his studies, and in 1828, at the age of twenty-one, was admitted to the bar. He then became a partner of his uncle, and for fifteen years a very large practice engaged the attention of the firm. As a lawyer, he displayed the same assiduity and zeal which had characterized him as a teacher and as a student. He was always distinguished for the energy of his character, and promptitude of his business habits. It was a rule of his office that no business letter should remain on the table unanswered over a single return mail. He had great facility in the despatch of business, and with his untiring industry and application, and the admirable system adopted and enforced in his law office, the amount of business transacted was as large as it was various in character. Entering into political life, as a member of the Democratic party, he was elected to the legislature, and by that body chosen a regent of the university—the youngest man ever before or since that time made a member of that distinguished body. At twenty-nine, he was elected to Congress without opposition, served with distinction on several important committees, and distinguished himself by sound speeches on the great questions of the day. In 1844, he was appointed circuit judge of the third district, and removed to Albany, which has since been his residence. The same promptness and system which distinguished him as a lawyer, characterized him as a judge, and enabled him to perform a vast amount of business. It was in 1845, while holding the Delaware circuit, that the energy of his character was strikingly manifested. The county was in a state of insurrection. The anti-renters had set the laws at defiance, civil officers had been shot down in the discharge of their duty, the military had been called out, and the county jails were filled with prisoners charged with every grade of crime, from murder down to misdemeanor. At the end of the third week of the session of the court, Judge Parker had disposed of every case; the jails were cleared, the offenders sentenced, and the majesty of the law successfully vindicated. The firmness of the judge, the mercy that tempered his justice, disarmed all opposition, and restored peace to the county. In 1846, at the expiration of his term of office, he was elected Justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, receiving the votes, not only of his own party, but a large number from the opposition. He is now the Democratic candidate for the office of governor of New York. His career affords a striking proof of what may be accomplished by the power of industry, perseverance and integrity.

HON. AMASA J. PARKER.

PILGRIM MONUMENT, AT PLYMOUTH, MASS.

A miniature model of the monument modelled by J. A. Jackson, Esq., from the architect's drawing, has been on exhibition at the Fair of the Massachusetts Mechanics' Charitable Association. This is merely a sketch, intended by the artist to give a more accurate general idea of the form and proportions, than could be done by a drawing. It is proposed to make this monument—as indeed it should be, both by reason of its purpose and its magnitude—a national work; one in which the people shall all possess that interest which we can only feel in that which is in the strictest sense our own. The memory of the forefathers belongs to us all; a memorial to them should also belong to all. With this feeling, arrangements have been made for a universal contribution of twenty-five cents from each individual throughout the country. None certainly can decline on account of want of means; and the spirit of intolerance which would deny a tribute to the worth and the virtues of the Pilgrims on account of their human shortcomings, scarcely casts a shadow over the universal liberality of feeling of the 19th century. Need we say to our readers, "Let every man subscribe?" Throughout the length and breadth of this land—now so filled with blessings, so prosperous, so happy—the spirit which actuated the pilgrims to leave home, friends, and the blessings of civilized life, and encounter the perils and hardships of the wilderness, has been and still is the moving impulse. Love of liberty—hatred of oppression; regard for the rights of others—invincible determination to hold our own. This it is which has made us a great and powerful nation; which has covered the land with our villages, towns, cities—the sea with our fleets of every sail and motive power; which is developing the riches of our mines; drawing to us the wealth of the ocean and of distant climes; conquering the elements to our use; crowning our prosperity with new advances of knowledge; with increase of intellectual and moral as well as physical greatness. We have thus adverted to our indebtedness to the Pilgrim Fathers as a fitting introduction to a description of the stupendous monument which is now being erected at Plymouth, from designs by Hammatt Billings, in grateful remembrance of their privations and sacrifices, and of the eventful sequel to their history. A monument unlike all others in the world in its purpose, and which will far exceed all others, at least of modern times, in the grandeur of the scale upon which it is to be executed. The national monument to the forefathers was originated by the Pilgrim Society of Plymouth, as a suitable manner of expressing the reverence in which the American people hold the memory of its illustrious ancestors, and of recording the events which have had so much influence in forming the character of our institutions. It is to be entirely of granite, with the exception of the panels and alto-reliefs. The centre portion of the structure is an octagonal pedestal, eighty-three feet high, upon which stands a figure of Faith, rising to the height of seventy feet above the platform of the pedestal—so that the whole monument will rise one hundred and fifty-three feet above the earth upon which it rests. Faith is here represented as standing upon a rock, holding in her left hand an open Bible, while the other hand is uplifted towards heaven. From the four smaller faces of the main pedestal project wings, or buttresses, upon which are seated figures emblematic of the principles upon which the Pilgrim Fathers proposed to found their commonwealth. These are Morality, Law, Education and Freedom. The sides of the seats upon which they sit are decorated with niches, in which are statues appropriate to the figures above. Upon the larger faces of the main pedestal are panels which are intended to contain records of the names of the Pilgrims of the "Mayflower," the events of the voyage, the prominent events in the early history of the colony, and the events which occurred previous to their departure from Delft Haven. Upon smaller panels placed below these are to be inscribed events connected with the Pilgrim Society, and the erection of the monument, with an appropriate dedication. All of these panels are to be of porphyry, serpentine, or other hard stone; and the inscriptions are to be inlaid with white marble. Upon the faces of the wing-pedestals are panels designed to contain alto-reliefs of the "Departure from Delft Haven," the "Signing of the Social Compact in the Cabin of the Mayflower," the "Landing at Plymouth," and the "First Treaty with the Indians." These sculptures are to be of white marble—that stone being susceptible of greater delicacy in delineating the subjects. In the main pedestal is a chamber twenty-four feet in diameter; and from the floor of this a stone staircase leads to the platform upon which stands the principal figure. The pedestal is eighty feet in breadth at the base; and the sitting figures upon the wings are forty feet high in their position. The figures in the panels are eighteen feet in height. In magnitude, the monument will far exceed any monumental structure of modern times. The figure of Faith will be larger than any known statue, excepting that of the great Ramses, now overthrown, and the Colossus of Rhodes. To ensure the utmost accuracy in the realization of the design, models of the statues are to be made of the full size. The construction of these models alone will occupy about four years from August, 1855. The estimated cost is somewhat over half a million of dollars. The work is under the direction of a committee of the Board of Trustees of the Pilgrim Society, consisting of the following gentlemen:—Hon. John H. Clifford, William Thomas, Samuel Nicolson, Nathaniel B. Shurtleff, Chas. G. Davis and Eleazer C. Sherman, Esq.

Entered, according to Act of Congress, Sept. 14, 1855, by HAMMATT BILLINGS, in the Clerk's Office of the Dist. Court of Mass.

AN AUTUMN SABBATH.

There is no climate in the world more delightful than that of New England in mid-autumn. The pure, mild yet bracing air, the sunshine, the rich tints of the foliage, the golden haze of the distance, all combine to exert the happiest influence upon the human frame and the human heart. The awakening of devotional feelings is an ordinary consequence of such genial influences. One of those days we have glanced at, coinciding with the Sabbath, is enjoyed in completest and fullest manner. We have always thought, that even if we had lost our reckoning of days, we could distinguish a Sabbath in the country, long before the music of the steeples in the valleys announced its advent—long before the absence of laborers from the fields denoted the welcome day of rest. A peculiar tranquillity seems to reign throughout nature's wide domain; the very winds seem to whisper reverentially as they sweep through the bronzed arches of the old oak wood; the birds spring nift in the blue air more fearlessly, and the gray squirrel crosses your path with a bolder tread. If this be purely fancy—it is still a fancy that we love to cherish. One of these peerless Sabbath days it was our lot to enjoy lately in the environs of the city, far enough removed from its clatter and bustle.

As we passed from the sunshine and the gay garniture of the woods into the cool quiet of the village church, the words of the first hymn harmonized sweetly with the thoughts and feelings awakened by the genial autumn morning—"frosty but kindly."

"O'er of sunshine and of rain!
Ripened of fruits on hill and plain!
Fountain of light that, rayed afar,
Fills the vast urns of sun and star.

Who send'st thy storms and frosts to bind
The plagues that rise to waste mankind;
Thou breathest, o'er the naked scene,
Spring gales, and life, and tender green."

THE ALLIES OF DESPOTISM.

A few weeks since the anniversary of the first French revolution was celebrated in the city of New York by an assembly of so-called republicans, natives of France and Germany principally, but by no means representatives of those great countries. One of the orators, the one who received the most enthusiastic applause, delivered a most ferocious harangue, which would not have disgraced the Jacobin Club in its palmy days. He eulogized all that was atrocious in the French revolution, slurring all that was good and great in its idea. His heroes were Robespierre, St. Just, Danton, Marat, the men of blood whose excesses excite horror and execration to the present day. He went in for a new revolution more oppressive and sanguinary than the first. Expatiating on Proudhon's idea, that "property is theft," this mild gentleman proposed cutting off the head of every man worth a dollar. As this would involve a most prodigious carnage, he proposed setting up a new "Marianne" (guillotine), to work by steam. The assembly that applauded these sentiments, coupled the name of Louis Napoleon with such epithets as "villain," "rogue," "rascal," "thief," "assassin," and other expressions and euphonious terms, never for once suspecting, in their ferocious stupidity, that it was to such crazy and degraded fanatics as themselves that Louis Napoleon owes his present position and power.

The vile excesses of the terrorists of '93 ruined the first French revolution and the hopes of liberty, and prepared France to bow submissively at the feet of one great man because he had the power and the will to crush the fatal minority of butchers that had ruled their country by the knife of the guillotine. Again, it was the dread of these dangerous enemies of society that gave a king instead of a republic to France in 1830. Eighteen years afterwards, when the whole world hailed with delight and sympathy the dethronement of a government which had lapsed into the old tyranny of the elder branch of the Bourbons, these ferocious terrorists demanded the red flag of revolution and carnage in the place of the Hotel de Ville, and at the point of the bayonet, when Lamartine, with ten thousand muskets levelled at his heart, refused to accord them a banner which had been "only trailed in the blood of Frenchmen through the Champ de Mars," and insisted on their accepting the tri-color which had made the tour of the globe in a halo of glory. But they rebelled against the republic a few weeks afterwards, and were only put down by a terrible effusion of blood. The terror inspired by the movements of such men, undermining the whole social fabric, has caused France to accept the despotism of the present emperor, with its restrictions on the press, its interdictions of liberty of speech and assemblage, and all its concomitant evils, as infinitely preferable to the sway of the axe, and the wholesale prostration of religion, industry, commerce, agriculture and art. Yes—the terrorists of '93 and of '56 are the best allies that despotism has, and though small in numbers, work incalculable mischief to the cause of freedom.

SECRET THOUGHTS.

Sir Walter Scott said, that "if men could read each other's feelings, some who now sit so friendly at the dinner-table, would rise up in horror and fly from each other." Yes, and if every man should know what his dearest friend, one who would lay down his life for him, thought and said of him, at times, in his absence, even without the intention of wronging him, or without a diminution of respect or love for him, there would be no such thing as friendship in the world. We are so constituted that we cannot bear to hear the whole truth of ourselves, even from friendly lips; and friendship, like love, requires a blind devotion, like that which the Hindoo pays to his idol. Whatever a man may know of himself, he must believe that to his chosen friends he is something very near approaching to perfection.

WORKS BY WALTER MARCH.—That charming work, "Shoepae Recollections," by Walter March, has reached a third edition, and which meets with a ready sale. The author has reason to be gratified with its success and with the warm encomiums it has elicited. French & Co., of this city have in press, from the same author, a novel with the intriguing title of "Faca, an Army Memoir." It presents some phases of American life never before made the theme of the romance writer, and a glance at the proof sheets has excited in us a strong curiosity with regard to the volume.

A BULL.—A distinguished gentleman, on being written to for his autograph, replied by letter as follows: "Sir, I regret to say that I cannot comply with your request. To avoid opportunities, I have made it a rule when asked for my autograph never to give it. Your obedient servant," &c.—here following the distinguished personage's name in full. Now the perpetrator of this bull was not a native of the Emerald Isle, but an honored American general.

THE COMING VOLUME.—We have some of the finest illustrations now in course of preparation for Ballou's Pictorial, that have ever been executed in this country. Vol. XII, which will commence on the first of January, it is resolved shall be unequalled on either side of the Atlantic.

MISQUOTING.—Deliberate misquotation is one of the commonest things in the world. There is not a dentist in the world but who is ready to asseverate upon his honor that Shakspeare wrote:

"How sharper than a serpent's fangs it is To have a toothless child."

VERY TRUE.—Franklin said "a newspaper and Bible in every house, and a good school in every district, are the principal supporters of virtue, morality and civil liberty."

AMUSEMENTS.

The gentleman who fed his pony on shavings, and whose economical experiment was defeated by the death of the animal in the moment of triumphant success, was no more fortunate in his plans than those would-be regulators of society, who would have men and women work from morning till midnight, day after day, week after week, and year after year, without relaxation or amusement. Just as the man is merged in the machine, and learns to go his rounds like a horse in a bark-mill, in a sudden fit of perversity he dies. Just as you get him to think that riding and fishing, walking and fencing, dancing, attending the theatre or concert-room, in moderation even, is a waste of time, you have to send for the doctor, or the undertaker, or the guardian of a lunatic asylum. Your model-worker becomes an "unpleasant body," as Mr. Mantili says, on your hands. The fact is, that human nature craves relaxation and excitement—that they are the breath of his nostrils, the blood of his organization. He must have them. If you never turn out your horse to have a frolic in the green pasture, he will be off his foot and feed. The quadruped of the bark-mill, to which we have referred above, is good for nothing on the road, and bark-mills are not favorable to equine longevity. As a people we are just beginning to discover these simple facts. As a people we have been overworking ourselves for eight or nine generations, and the system is beginning to tell on the physique of the men and women of to-day. The careworn look of our people tells the sad story at a glance. We do not give ourselves time for amusement—we have too few holidays—our recreations are too irregular, too few and far between. We stand in need of invigorating sports and plenty of healthy amusements. We should be more intellectual, even if we devoted less time and thought to the culture of the intellect. We should be more many-sided—less fanatical. We should enjoy a healthier old age. Fortunately there are a number of social reformers among us who are busy in the genial mission of teaching our people the duty and economy of more frequent relaxation, men satisfied that "all work and no play" is a short-sighted maxim, even in an economical point of view. We confidently expect that the next generation of Yankees will have shorter and ruddier faces than the present, and approach more nearly the Anglo-Saxon type than those we see about us. We have hopes that in time, our young men will be ashamed of carrying old heads upon their shoulders, and exhibiting narrow chests, spindle shanks, and feeble and precocious intellects.

THE REASON.—"Where did I get such a nose as this, doctor?" asked a lady of Abernethy. "Out of the decanter, ma'am," was the cool reply.

A MOTHER'S PLAIN.

BY MILDRED MONTROSE.

The sweet spring speeds o'er the lovely earth,
With the birds and the early flowers,
And the warm, soft wind comes freighted with
The perfume of southern bowers.
And the hearts of all seem light and gay,
Mid the air so calm and mild;
But my weary thoughts roam far away,
For thou art not here, my child.

I wander oft in the dim old woods,
And I find in its sheltered nook
The meek, blue violet peering forth,
With its quiet, lovely look;
And I think how oft I have twined for thee
A wreath of those blossoms wild;
And I thou to gaze on thy sunny brow,
But thou art not here, my child.

O, where art thou, while I'm roaming here,
Lost idol of my heart?
O, why is it thus that the bitter tear
Amid nature's bloom must start?
In a cold, dark grave they have laid thee down,
And the snow on thy breast was piled,
And I wept, as I kissed thy cold, cold lips—
Thou art dead, thou art dead, my child.

I know that my heart must lonely throb,
As the spring-time glideth by,
And the summer flowers will be seen by me
Through the veil of a tear-dimmed eye.
But O, when the autumn days shall come,
With their sunshine calm and mild,
Mid thy withered flowers they'll lay me down—
I will be with thee then, my child.

THE MERCHANT'S ENTRY.

A TALE OF NEW ORLEANS.

BY BELL BRAMBLE.

ROBERT CARSON was descended from one of the old but impoverished families of Virginia, who had formerly ranked among its opulent tobacco planters. Early in life he had emigrated to New Orleans, the then Fern of the South, in the hope of making or bettering his fortune, and whether accidentally or by intention, took a decided step toward achieving his object by marrying the youthful heiress of a respectably circumstanced creole family. Great was the surprise of every one when told that Constance de La Croix was about to marry the gallant young Virginian, as she had been looked upon as the affianced bride of her father's friend and partner, Mr. Barret. The handsome Virginian carried the day, winning the fair creole, who, shortly after their marriage, accompanied him to his family home in Richmond, where the only blossom that ever gladdened their hearth was born, and to whom he gave the name of his native State.

The little Virginia, unlike her dark-eyed, raven-tressed mother, had the golden hair, violet blue eyes and fair complexion of her father, and like his, the fine cut, beautiful mouth, on whose firm curve decision of purpose was more legibly stamped than on the more delicately harmonious features of her beautiful mother, whose large dreamy eyes, of oriental languor, indicated refinement of temperament more than energy.

And well it was for the fair tropical blossom that hers was a strength of character equal to reverses, for they soon loomed up thick and dark in her young life's horizon.

Robert Carson had embarked successfully in mercantile speculations, entering into partnership with an extensive cotton broker, Henry Vincent. But the fall of prices in the cotton market, during a few successive years, added to the dishonesty of his partner, brought him to bankruptcy. His fair and fragile wife, unfitted to bear up under reverses, was soon prostrated by the rude blast, beneath which she bent her fair head unresisting, like a storm-stricken flower, leaving Virginia to cope with life and its ills alone.

Alone, indeed! for mortified pride, added to a hope to retrieve his losses, determined Mr. Carson on removing to Rio Janeiro, remaining no longer in New Orleans, after the death of his wife, than served to place Virginia with a distant relative of her mother, when he betook him to the promised El Dorado of South America. During all the anxious forebodings that fell heavily on her young heart, Virginia had ever one constant, unchanging friend, in the young Harry Vincent, the son of her father's former partner.

Like most of the native sons of Louisiana, slight and graceful, tall and symmetrically formed, his fine massive brow was shaded with wavy raven hair, his olive-tinted, handsome, intelligent face was lit with dark flashing eyes, beneath which was lined a dusky semi-circle, which to the experienced would denote a slight tinge of his Indian ancestry, through whom, three generations back, his family had acquired the wealth, since squandered in the speculations and expensive habits of his father, Mr. Carson's fraudulent, absconding partner. Though Harry Vincent's features were well cut and regular, still the dusky olive of his complexion much more closely resembled his dark yet handsome Indian ancestress, than did his father; for strange as it may appear to those not experienced in this physiological fact, it is nevertheless a well attested one, that where all resemblance has been merged and lost sight of in intermarriage with European nations, some distinctive trait, either in color or feature, will again, after two or three generations have passed, unmarked by either characteristic, reappear, denot-ing, it may be, almost imperceptibly yet surely to the experienced observer, the amalgamation between the distinctive races.

Harry's father, Mr. Carson's former partner, was the son of a well-connected Northerner, who, emigrating to New Orleans, had married a very beautiful and accomplished young Indian girl, said to be a natural daughter of Lord Cornwallis—at all events, she had been educated as his adopted daughter, in Camden, South Carolina, and had come to New Orleans, with her wealthy mother, on a visit to her uncle, a chief of the Cherokees, then stopping at one of the first class hotels there. The beautiful Undine created quite a sensation; very fair, with coal-black eyes that looked, according to Lady Morgan, "as if set in with dirty fingers." The accomplished wild flower certainly bore a resemblance to the lordly protector who had cultivated the sweet wood blossom.

Her son, Henry Vincent, certainly bore no manner of resemblance to his dark-eyed, graceful mother, having the chestnut curls, Roman nose and clear azure eyes of his Northern father. While in her grandson, the young Harry, to the raven hair and lambent eyes of the tropics, was added a dusky tinge, slight, yet unmistakable, of his descent from the red chieftains of the forest. This excited no remark, being of too frequent occurrence, even among the highest classes, to cause the least speculation.

From her father, who had ever shown a marked preference for the young Vincent, Virginia had never heard a word of caution with regard to her intercourse with Harry, who, from his earliest boyhood, had been a constant playmate of hers; ever received with the pleased caress of her gentle mother, and the as pleasant welcome of her approving father.

In Harry, himself, she had never seen a single fault to condemn, while she saw everything to admire. His chivalric courtesy to her mother, his deferential manner to her father, his unconstrained, poetical language, the dark, spirited beauty of his intelligent face, his graceful bearing and proud independence of character, that from the time of his return from Oakland College, where he had graduated with all the honors, nobly prompted him to carve his own way to fortune, being himself its architect.

One there was who, in that noble struggle for independence, felt a sister's holy pride and anxiety on noting the lines of care already traced on the noble brow of him who, through all change, had continued unchangeably the same to her. A greater calamity, however, than all the past awaited her now in the black sealed letter that bore from Rio Janeiro the melancholy account of her father's death. He had left New Orleans a bankrupt, and failing in his anticipations of retrieving his losses, now filled a suicide's grave.

Silently, yet fast as autumn rain, fell the orphan's tears upon the sheet that told of her father's suicide and her own destitution. While sorrowing in her young heart's desolation over her bereavement, she was aroused by a visit from her mother's early admirer and guardian, Mr. Barret.

Kindly taking a hand of the fair orphan girl, he silently drew a chair near hers, and sat down to offer words of comfort, but anticipating him, she was the first to speak:

"This is very good—very considerate, to come to see me in this lone hour, Mr. Barret. It does me good; for my mother told me you would be my friend, as she said you had been hers."

"And did Constance—your mother, I mean—really tell you to come to me? Poor Constance! You are her very image, at this moment, Virginia. She never knew how I loved—worshipped her. I had been her father's partner. She never gave me a thought, save as being her guardian; while I, with a crushed heart, noted her preference for your father, Robert Carson. On marrying him, she went on a visit to his Virginian home, where you were born. It was long after her death before I could muster up resolution to see her. When I did, she brought you into the room, and from that hour, Virginia, I loved you for her sake. As you grew up, need I add that it increased for your own? She or you never knew it, but never watched miser his treasure as I did your sweet spring-time, from budding, girlish beauty to graceful, accomplished womanhood. You are now alone, unprotected, with matchless beauty, and impoverished. Be mine! I offer you riches, not simply to make you independent, but as the illimitable means of doing good. Toil, for such as you, Virginia, with scanty and poor fare, will soon do its work; your beauty will fade, your health wear away. Do not despise or reject my love. On one hand, view yourself as you are, then as you may be. See the present—beautiful, poor, surrounded with memories of a brighter past, surrounded, too, with snares; while on the other, I offer you wealth without limit, that is your sweet stewardship might be the means of as illimitable good. Not, Virginia, that gold, or equipage, or diamonds, beyond your wildest dreams, could bribe you, if failed the worship of an honest heart, and the independence of all obligation. Reflect, ere you refuse. I offer you station, wealth, the power of doing good. Will you be mine?"

Slowly and sadly were the young girl's tearful eyes raised to his, as she answered mournfully. Chords there are in the human heart, strangely, sweetly musical, but which are only reached by accident,—chords that would have remained mute to passionate and earnest appeals, yet respond, giving forth their melody to some slight and random touch, reverberating long, and strong, and deep. The pure, sisterly regard of Virginia's heart for Harry Vincent now first assumed a different form, revealing itself, as all great truths have done, by chance. She thought on him—young, gifted, toiling; his form rose up before her there, in his graceful beauty. Her mind was made up, and decided forever:

"I feel grateful, Mr. Barret,—very grateful, but you must not deny me the privilege of toiling for independence. The references I can bring from former teachers will procure me a place as one in a school. My independence is now my all; do not ask me to resign it."

Long and earnestly the merchant pleaded; but though Harry had never by word told her that he regarded her as other than a sister, still did his slight, graceful form rise between her and the man who would have made her the wealthy possessor of means whereby she might have placed affluence within his reach. Mr. Barret rose to go. There was a painful pause, broken by his faltering voice:

"Virginia, are you too proud to accept of assistance from me? Do not refuse me this slight gratification—at least, do not make any objection. Whenever I can serve you, come and let me know. You know where to find me. After this, I may not come here again."

"I will come to you, Mr. Barret, as to a dear, valued friend; nor fail to avail myself of your kind offer, if I need it."

"Till then, farewell!"

He pressed her hand and went to the door, then turned as though hoping yet by a word or look to be recalled. But her arms still rested on the table, on which her head was bowed down, and he felt that it had caused her a pang to give him pain. Again passing his kerchief across his eyes, the wealthy merchant left the door, and went away sad, and lone, forever.

A year from that time, the merchant sat at the desk in his private office, when a clerk asked at the door if he might show a lady in, who asked to see him. With a quick bound of the heart, he divined at once that it must be Virginia, and replied in the affirmative. As she entered the room, Mr. Barret started from his seat.

"Virginia, where have you been? How I have thought on you in all this time! Why did you not write, to relieve my anxiety?"

"I thought it best not, fearing you would object to my going as a teacher in a school. I have been for a year past employed as a teacher in the McShee Seminary, and when unoccupied in the school, give music lessons, in Lafayette, where I have a number of pupils. Nor would I be here now, but that I come on another's account. You can serve him. Serve us both, Mr. Barret."

"Serve him? Of whom do you speak, Virginia?"

"Of Harry Vincent. I met him this morning, when I came to town to purchase music. He told me he had heard that your book-keeper, Mr. Post, is about to leave you, returning to Scotland. Harry would be made happy by the place. I did not tell him that I would come to you, I was afraid he would disapprove of it, but remembering your promise, I have come to ask you to give the place to him. I know you will think us both very foolish, since our love is our all. Still, we will make it sufficient for us."

Wiping the cold dew from his forehead, the opulent merchant paced the floor; then stopping, his lip quivered and his eye was dim, as he looked on the beautiful girl, who stood so calm and happy, in her poverty, before him. She had come to ask a favor, yet he felt, to have trusted himself with another look at her, would have made him the suppliant. He turned abruptly and went to the desk.

"Would Mr. Vincent accept a loan from me? Perhaps if he had other plans, I could aid him, Virginia."

"I know Harry's proud spirit too well to dream of his accepting a loan as a favor obtained through my intercession. No; only give him Mr. Post's place, when he calls to ask for it, and we will both be so happy while struggling for the light of a better day."

"And in case I appoint him my book-keeper, what are your plans for yourself, Virginia?"

"To remain at the school, until such time as the savings from our united exertions will permit us to think of being married. We are young and hopeful, and if you give Harry the situation, we will succeed, since we both economize from our small earnings, though poor Harry's salary, at present, is very small."

The merchant's voice was husky, but the brave, honest heart in his manly breast was nerved to the trial. He was about to tear the idol worshipped for years thence, going to the grave lone and unloved.

"Virginia, you are too high-minded to accept a favor other than Mr. Vincent would approve. I give Mr. Post fifteen hundred dollars a year; I will add five hundred to this from the time Mr. Vincent takes his place in the office." He then, unlocking the desk, took out a roll of notes, counted them, and placing the parcel in the young girl's hand, said in a faltering voice that went to her heart: "Take this, my child; it is one thousand dollars—half a year's salary in advance. Now quit your school. The place is his; only he married to him before he comes to enter on his duties as my book-keeper."

Virginia could not speak, but the tears that fell on the hand she raised to her lips told her gratitude. He drew her hand within his arm, and led her to the door, where, drawing her veil over her tear-wet face, she entered a stage, to speed to Harry on her joyful mission, while the merchant returned to his private office, and locking the door, sat down on the chair she had occupied, and covering his face with his hands, said: "I should have more command of my feelings than this. I have loved her from her very infancy. I never dreamed of her loving another. I am alone, now, and forever. Of what use are riches, now that she is lost to me? Still, I can help to make her happiness. And Vincent—I know him well; a noble young fellow. God's will be done!" Then going to his desk, and taking out his private account-book and pencil, he added: "Since I only could have prevailed on her pride to take the half year's salary in advance—which I mean shall be paid him in full,—to what account place this thousand dollars? Let me see—an act of benevolence."

And so he wrote it, and to this day it remains a bright memento of a noble deed—that merchant's entry.

A GOLDEN ROMANCE.

A Mr. Thompson, of Smyth county, Virginia, went to California when the gold fever first broke out, and worked at mining two years with very poor luck. Finally, worn out with fruitless toil, he threw aside the pick and spade, and came back thoroughly disheartened. To be sure, he had previously bought a piece of land in California, but he never gave it a thought, for he had made up his mind that he was one of the unlucky ones, and was destined to die a poor man. But not long since he received a letter which instantly changed his prospects. It was discovered that the land he had purchased abounded in the precious metal—"gold, yellow, glittering gold"—and was worth to him at the very least three hundred thousand dollars. Such is life! Once in a while a prize turns up in a lottery. Alas! there are many blanks to every prize.

The half yearly returns of the poor-law board communicate the information that, in England and Wales, during six months, the sum of £2,097,653 had to be paid for the relief of the poor, or, at this rate, considerably more than four millions per annum. ## THE SPANISH GIPSY.

This beautiful engraving represents a Spanish gipsy girl, poisoning a water-jar in her hands. In the distance another girl, with a similar jar balanced on her head, is conversing with a lad of the tribe mounted on a donkey. The Moorish ruins, with the horse-shoe arch and trailing vines, forms an appropriate background to the figure in front. The artist has felicitously hit the true Bohemian type in the dark complexion, raven hair, lustrous eyes, artful smile, pearly teeth and graceful figure of the Gitana. All writers agree in commendation of the surpassing beauty of the young female gipsies, a beauty, however, which is exceedingly fragile, and evanescent as the bloom of the flower. The exposure of their homeless and wandering lives soon ruins the charms of the young girls, and they become hideous hags at thirty, or even younger. The gipsies are the most singular people on the face of the earth, and the tenacity with which they cling to their peculiar habits, manners and modes of existence, presents an interesting phenomenon. These vagabonds stand peculiar and aloof from all the rest of the world; they alone are free and independent in the midst of absolutism and serfdom. There is a very interesting article on "Gipsies and their Ways" in the October number of Putnam's Magazine, worth reading, if only from the brilliancy of its style, and embodying a number of facts relating to this singular race. The writer gives the various names under which gipsies are known in different parts of the world, as follows: In England, Gipsies; Scotland, Tinkers or Caird; France, Bohemian, Egyptian; Portugal, Cygana; Spain, Gitanos; Germany, Zingener; Sweden, Sparkling; Holland, Heiden; Denmark, Tartars; Italy, Zingari; Hungary, Tzzygani and Pharo Nepols (Pharaoh's people); Russia, Tsingans; and Turkey and Syria, Chingana. In Persia they are termed Kauli, that is, inhabitants of Kabul, Sari, or Smiths and Karachi; while in Hindostan they are known as Nath and Kanjar. They term themselves Roma, and their language Romany. The following is the number of gipsies in the different parts of the Eastern Hemisphere, as nearly as they can be ascertained: Europe, 900,000; Africa, 400,000; India, 1,500,000; and other parts of Asia, 2,000,000, making a total of 4,800,000. "The gipsy physiognomy," says Putnam, "when once seen, can never be forgotten. The males are slightly above the medium size, well developed and nervous. Their bronze complexion, teeth as white as ivory, and long, crisped locks of jetty blackness, impart a singularly wild and ferocious aspect to forms resembling, in many respects, those of Hottentots and Caffres. They have an aspect of melancholy mingled with pride and cunning, and the expressive gestures which characterize their conversation, impart a lively interest to these picturesque vagabonds. The females are not wanting in the browned, ruddy cheeks and swelling bosoms, so associated with gipsy charms. A rich, olive complexion, with red lips, and a just proportion of the limbs, imparts to them even something more exquisite than the splendid outlines and delicious tints of Circassian beauty. The eye is, however, the marked feature of the race, and would distinguish the gipsy in whatever clime, costume or character she might appear. It is not the small, luxurious eye of the Jewess, the oblong eye indispensable to the Chinese beauty, nor the soft, almond eye of the Egyptian, but something unique and peculiar. It is vivid, lustrous or liquid, according to the thought which seeks for utterance. Now, it has a wild and staring expression, and then, in moments of repose, a filmy, phosphorescent haze will gather over it, through which one looks into the depths below, as he does upon the stars of heaven, half obscured by the last ethereal rays of a flashing sunset. He has a conception of gipsy beauty, without beholding it, who has seen the fair damsels of Cyprus, where once stood the hundred Paphian altars, burning incense to Venus; or watched, on the islands of the Ægean, or in the shady villages of Asia Minor, the timid daughters of Grecian blood, collected around some gushing fountain, or bearing away its crystal wreath in graceful vases, as in the days of old:

"A gipsy maiden's sparkling eye
Has pierced my bosom's core—
A feat no eye beneath the sky
Could e'er effect before."

I have oft seen boys among the gipsies as beautiful as Astyanax, and young females whose forms Phidias would have chosen for models. Now and then, in the forests of Hungary or in the wilds of Bugaria, I used suddenly to come upon groups of these mysterious wanderers, which stood before me like living tableaux from the pastoral age and country of Agamemnon. Their manner of life, sans feu et lieu, is, however, highly unfavorable for the retention of beauty; manhood is apt to assume a sinister and ferocious aspect, and females, made wives a twelve, generally become ugly and forbidding at twenty. With the latter, the change is as great as if the Graces had been metamorphosed into Harpies, or the daughters of Acheron and Nox. It takes an angel to make a demon. The dress of the gipsies is in keeping with their nomadic tendencies. They occasionally dress somewhat like those with whom they live; but they are generally too proud, as well as too indolent, to deck themselves with a foreign garb, and adhere to the national costume descended from their forefathers. This consists of ragged breeches and torn shirt, which, although their antiquity is obvious when put on, are never removed, for want of a change, until they fall from their body of their own accord, in a state of complete dilapidation. The children are brought up in the true Calmuc style, being allowed to run naked until the age of six or eight years, when they assume the garb of their elders. The wind cannot blow off his hat who has none, and shoes are troublesome appliances among people whose manner of life and general economy are those of vagrants and beggars. In warm weather, they uniformly go barefoot, except when parading a pair of yellow boots and spurs which have fallen into their possession by theft or some accident of fortune, and contrast ludicrously with a pair of breeches wanting in the ampler parts. In winter, they envelope their feet in bundles of rags, or, as in Wallachia, wear coarse woolen stockings, knit by females upon huge wooden needles. The women neither spin nor weave, neither sew nor wash, and yet it cannot be said of them that they are clothed like unto the lilies of the field. They are even more picturesque in the matter of dress than the males. In Wallachia, I have seen numberless instances where the entire female attire consisted of a large piece of linen

GREEN VELVET AND BLUE SATIN.

Sometimes things did not go on quite so smoothly, however, at Malmaison, when any of the Bonaparte family visited Josephine, for a most cordial hatred seems to have existed between her and the ladies of the imperial family, partaking somewhat of female rivalry and jealousy.

One evening in particular—when the beautiful Pauline was to be formally presented to Josephine, on her marriage with the Prince Borghese—must be noted in the annals of Malmaison. Pauline, clever, witty, and most lovely, had accepted the hand of the Borghese, almost a fool in intellect, solely on account of his money and his title. Sacrificing her heart to her ambition, she determined to make the first use of her new honors by endeavoring to humiliate poor Josephine; and in order to carry out this admirable resolution, announced her intention of visiting her on a certain evening shortly after her marriage. Days were passed in preparing the splendid toilette which was to crush her sister-in-law. At length the memorable evening arrived. Josephine, fully aware of the intention of Pauline, took her own measures accordingly. She arranged herself for this trying ordeal, of a graceful against a beautiful woman, with consummate tact and a perfect knowledge of that peculiar style of dress well calculated to display her faultless shape, which she has almost immortalized. She wore a white muslin dress, edged and trimmed with a narrow border of gold; the short sleeves, which displayed a finely-turned arm, were looped up at the shoulder by large cameos, an enamelled serpent encircled her throat, on her head was a kind of diadem formed of cameos and enamel, confining her hair somewhat in the style of the antique busts of the Roman empresses. She looked so extremely graceful and classical in this attire, that when Napoleon entered the saloon he was delighted, and saluted her with a kiss on the shoulder—a somewhat bourgeois caress, by the way. On his expressing his surprise at the care with which she was dressed, she reminded him of the expected visit of Pauline. The evening wore on, and yet the princess did not arrive. Napoleon, having remained beyond his usual time, retired at last to his cabinet. Shortly afterwards the princess made her appearance, looking transcendently lovely. But on this occasion she had not trusted to the charms of unadorned beauty, as she literally was resplendent with jewels. Her dress, composed of green velvet, was embroidered in the front with masses of diamonds, her arms, her neck, her head were also encircled with splendid jewels. As she advanced across the room towards Josephine, who, as the wife of the First Consul, did not rise until she approached, Pauline gazed around full of pride and gratified vanity, conscious of the effect created by her beauty, her youth, and dazzling splendor.

The salutations were cold between the rival ladies. Pauline seated herself, and to break the stiffness of the reception, began conversing in a low voice with Madame Junot, who was placed near her.

"Well, Louise, how do I look to-night? What do you think of the Borghese jewels?"

"Think! why they are wonderful—actually éblouissants," returned Madame Junot.

"But do you really, now—flattery apart—think this dress becomes me?"

"Vain Pauline! why, you knew perfectly before asking me that question you never looked better in your whole life."

"Well, it is not exactly vanity that makes me ask you so particularly," replied Pauline; "but it is because I want to astonish Madame Bonaparte, and you know I have spared no pains to mortify her by this display of my new jewels. Yet how elegantly she looks in that simple India muslin dress, with those cameos, too, like a Grecian statue; she certainly does understand to perfection the style that suits her. That white dress contrasts so well, too, with the blue satin of the furniture—it is perfect. Good heavens! what shall I do?" she suddenly exclaimed, in an agonized whisper, and turned quite pale.

"What is it?—what can be the matter?" asked Madame Junot, quite alarmed.

"O, Louise, why did you not tell me? How cruel not to remind me! To let me come here in this room dressed in green velvet, when the furniture is blue satin! O, this is too much! I shall never forgive you! How dreadful I must look by the side of Josephine! This is more than I can bear. I must go away at once."

Pauline was conquered. Elegance had won the day even against beauty. She took a hasty farewell of Josephine, and hurried out of the room, consoling herself a little in her retreat by displaying her jewels before the whole establishment assembled to do her honor. She passed down the alley formed by the household, preceded by lighted torches, and followed by her husband, whom she early taught to aspire no higher than to the honor of being her chamberlain; and thus ended in absolute failure this notable wedding visit of the Princess Pauline Borghese.—Pilgrimages to the French Palaces.

THE SPANISH GIPSY.

thrown over the head and round the body, the solution of whose continuity revealed here and there large portions of the cutaneous integument supplied by nature, and well darkened by exposure. These Wallachian gipsies have also a dash of Bloomerism; for, in case their own wretched garments give out, they do not hesitate to draw on those of their male companions, should the latter be so fortunate as to have any unmentionable articles of dress to spare. They are excessively fond of ornaments, and often wear strings of jingling pinsters, or other small coins, around the head and neck. I have frequently noticed gold ducats dangling upon the naked breasts of these half-dressed barbarians. The gipsies are not, however, totally indifferent as to dress. In Spain, they occasionally assume a gay attire. The red cap is there indispensable, but otherwise green is the favorite color, as among the Turks. In Hungary, they have the greatest penchant for acquiring, by theft or otherwise, the cast-off clothes of distinguished personages, and nothing can be more ridiculous than to behold one of those idle vagabonds pompously parading a laced coat with silver buttons, while his head and feet are naked. We refer our readers to the article from which we have made the above extract, for a very readable sketch of gipsy life and manners, while the romance of gipsy life is admirably depicted in Borrow's entertaining and instructive books, the "Bible in Spain," the "L'Avenegro," etc.

THE STATE OF INDIANA.

The design on this page is one of the most beautiful of the series of State scenes drawn for us by Billings. The base of the picture is formed by wheat sheaves, the plough and sickle; above which, beautifully framed and draped, is a correct representation of the State capitol. In the upper part of the design we have the State arms, with a herd of buffaloes, plunging through the prairie grass, a woodman felling a tree, and the sun rising on the far horizon. The arms are flanked by laurel and Indian corn leaves, and beneath are the scroll of the constitution and the sword of justice. On the right are a party of pioneers with their wagons and horses, illustrating the initiatory steps of civilization, and on the left a harvest field, with farmers loading their wagons, laborers cutting and binding the sheaves, and a domestic group in the foreground, a picture of peace and plenty. The State of Indiana is bounded north by Lake Michigan and Michigan, east by Ohio, south by Kentucky, from which it is separated by the Ohio River, and west by Illinois, from which it is partly separated by the Wabash River. It is about 275 miles long, by 135 miles broad, with an area of 38,809 square miles. Three-fourths of the State are yet uncultivated, but it will in time be one of the most densely populated portions of the great Mississippi Valley. This State has no great mountains, and a large portion of it is either level or slightly undulating. The streams mostly empty into the Ohio. A portion of the State is heavily timbered. It has an immense quantity of coal, and there are also iron, copper, lime, freestone, gypsum and grindstones in varying abundance. Of the rivers, the Wabash is the largest that has its course mainly in the State. Its total length, including its windings, is about 500 miles. The climate is milder than in the same latitude on the Atlantic seaboard, but it is subject to sudden changes. The winters, though severe, are short. The soil is generally good, some portions, particularly the river bottoms, being of extraordinary fertility. It ranks fourth among the States of the Union in the quantity of Indian corn grown, and raises the usual agricultural productions, together with some wine, hemp and silk. In 1850 there were 98,396 farms, occupying 5,046,243 acres. In the same year there were 4326 manufacturing establishments in the State. In August, 1854, there were 1278 miles of railroad completed, 1592 in the course of construction, and 732 miles projected. In the same year Indiana had 367 miles of canal, including the famous Wabash and Erie Canal. The State has an active lake and river trade with New Orleans and the various points of the Mississippi and Ohio valleys, and with New York by the lakes. The school fund of the State, in 1853, was $4,988,988. In 1850 there were 11 colleges, 4622 public schools, and 131 academies and other schools. In the same year there were 2032 churches, the Baptist being the most numerous. At Indianapolis there are asylums for the deaf and dumb, the blind and the insane. There were, in 1850, 58 public libraries, 88 school and Sunday school libraries, four college and a church library. Population, in 1800, 4875; in 1850, 988,393.

CHAPTER I.

THE CAMPAIGN OPEN.

"Hark! 'twas the trumpet of Freedom that sounded,
Millions of voices respond to the strain,
Hailing the day when an empire was founded,
Firm as our mountains, and free as the main!"

AMERICAN Independence! It was a glorious epoch in the history of nations when our heroic sires resolved to be free, and nerved their iron hearts for a desperate revolutionary struggle. Year after year had they submitted to the ever-increasing burdeens imposed by order of a despotic sovereign, remonstrating without avail, pleading without obtaining redress, until the spirit of armed resistance, brought to a focus by the oppressive taxations of Lord North's ministry, was kindled into a blaze at Lexington fight. Brightly did the pure beacon-light burst forth, illuminating the entire seacoast like an electric flash, and penetrating into the deep recesses of the interior forests like a "pillar of fire," guiding those who were willing to fight for Independence to the armies recruiting around the newly-raised flag of the free. Dense war-clouds dimmed the horizon, the fountains of public opinion were opened, and a broad tide of liberty swelled forth like the waters that had once rolled over the whole surface of the continent. Every county had its regiment—every hamlet its company of minute-men, pastors led their faithful flocks to head-quarters, and mothers, with Spartan firmness, sent even their youngest sons to the tested field, while they cultivated the homestead crops. The plough was deserted in the furrow, tools were left around unfinished works, and the merchant forsook his counter to join the brave yeomen and patriotic mechanics who hastened to enforce the glorious truth, that "disobedience to tyrants is obedience to God." There was a deficiency of weapons and a lack of uniforms, but each patriotic recruit was impressed with a firm belief that governments must derive their just powers from the governed—a principle which was to be sustained until death, whether on the victorious battle-field or on the menacing scaffold. "Blandishments," said one of their leaders, "will not fascinate us, nor will threats of a halter intimidate us—for, nader God, we are determined that, whensoever or howsoever we shall be called to make our exit, we will die free-men!"

Bunker Hill proved that these improvised phalanxes—that had sprung into existence like the fabulous dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus, warriors ready for the fray,—were animated by that resistless intrepidity which ensures success. Neither were they avoices in the art of warfare. Accustomed from early youth to the wild sports of the forest, where game was then abundant, they had grown up hardy and fearless, well fitted for the endurance and the danger of a soldier's life. Some of them, from the frontier, had combated the Indian war-chief, so noted for the skill of his ambushes and the ferocity of his revenge. Others had served at the conquest of Louisbourg from the veteran troops of France; or had fought shoulder to shoulder with the British when Wolfe fell, in the arms of victory; or had shared in the disasters of Braddock's defeat. The lessons they had learned while fighting for the king were not forgotten; and those who had gallantly served under Pepperel, or Rogers, or Amherst, were among the first to throw themselves into the revolutionary struggle, and to confirm with joy the selection of a well-known "Provincial colonel" as their commander-in-chief. Washington, noblest of mortals, armed with the wisdom of Micerva and the prowess of Jove, was a fit leader for freedom's host. The strength, the glory, the wisdom of the protracted struggle was concentrated in the Father of his country, who not only led his armies to victory, but sheltered them from annihilation. Ever will his memory be dear to every true heart, and his humble sepulchre a hallowed shrine where the pilgrim of liberty will delight to resort, thanking the Ruler of the universe for the example of such a life as that of Washington.

It was in the month of September, 1775, that a young man might have been seen riding along the main street of the old town of Ipswich, in what was then called the Province of Massachusetts Bay, on his way to Newburyport. It was a lovely afternoon, and as he faced the declining sun, the atmosphere seemed filled with floating powdered gold, which cast a dazzling radiance upon the wooded hills before him. Fields of rich green corn revelled in the yellow sunlight, and the well-cultivated farms on either side of the highway recalled to the traveller's mind the pastoral beauty of Greece, in those storied days when nature smiled upon her classic soil. The very earth seemed joyous in its prolific beauty, as if proudly conscious that no unjaundiced mind could gaze on it without delight, and the birds, coming forth from their noontide shelters, carolled forth subdued vesper-songs of happiness.

These beauties of nature were not lost upon the young man who then gazed on them for the first time, and ample leisure had he to enjoy them, for his gray charger was in no hurry to proceed very rapidly, having left Washington's head-quarters at Cambridge since breakfast. The rider was young—very young, and yet there was a stern resolution in his earnest look that denoted a full maturity of mind. His expressive black eyes were large and sunny, his nose was classically straight, full arched lips disclosed perfect teeth, and thick, black curls, clustering on either side of his high, broad forehead, nearly concealed his small, transparent ears. He sat on his horse with that negligent grace peculiar to those reared on a

Virginia plantation, and his whole bearing was that of a young man of fortune, whose mind was intensely occupied for the time, though there was a certain frankness in his open features that would have led a stranger to cultivate his acquaintance.

He wore the becoming uniform of Morgan's Rifle Rangers, a loose frock of dark green cloth, with a small cape bordered with gold fringe. Buckskin leggings, ornamented with gay Indian bead-work, came down over his thick moccasins, which were soled like ordinary shoes. A short sword hung from his wampom belt, in which he carried a stout hunting-knife, and a white buck-tail was jauntily set in a visorless cap made of racoon skin. This picturesque garb was highly becoming to the young man's lithe, well-formed figure, while further evidence of his aristocratic habits were discernible in the delicate texture of his neckcloth and ruffles, which were also edged with narrow lace. A small valise was on the crupper behind his saddle, while before it was a pair of holsters from which protruded the silver-mounted hatts of a formidable pair of pistols. Never, in the palmy days of chivalry, was there a more gallant-looking cavalier than was this same Esquire Herbert Yancey, now on his way to Newburyport with special despatches from General Washington.

A rustling sound in some bushes at the roadside started him from his reverie, and he had drawn a pistol ere he recognized in a man who rode out into the highway an old and certainly pacific acquaintance. A bright flush colored his cheek, as if ashamed of having been startled, and pushing back the pistol, he raised his hand to his cap, in true military style, exclaiming: "Why, professor, is that you? Good-day to you, sir."

The new-comer was evidently a Frenchman by birth, with the slender figure, thin, yellow features and aquiline nose so peculiar to the land of Charlemagne and champagne. It was a dozen years or more since he landed in Boston, where he gave French lessons with such success that he was soon afterwards engaged at Harvard College, first as tutor, then as professor. Amiable in his disposition, retiring in his habits, and almost childlike in his manners, he was a universal favorite; nor did any one but himself know that his life had been anything but that of a quiet scholar. Yet often, in the dead of night, would he lift the veil of hypocrisy from his troubled conscience, reviving long smouldering fires of love and jealousy, and recalling many prominent parts which he had acted in the great drama of life, with shuddering fears of the final act. The morning sun would light up his serene face as he greeted his scholars with a gentle smile, though a close observer would have noticed that his eye had a restless glance.

At first, the professor did not recognize one of his pupils in the dashing-looking officer who had addressed him; but there was no forgetting Herbert Yancey.

"I do declare," said he, "it is you. And what frolic has made you put on that disguise? It is very becoming, though."

"Thank you, professor," laughingly replied the young officer, bowing to his horse's mane. "But let me tell you that I am now serving my country. When the college exercises were discontinued, I remained at Cambridge, intending to continue my studies. But that was no time for metaphysical investigations, or for the mysteries of classic lore, and I soon became inoculated with a desire to aid in rescuing my country from the tyrant's yoke. A sense of filial duty to my dear widowed mother alone restrained me; but when our own Virginia riflemen came to Cambridge, life had no other object of ambition for me than military renown in their ranks. I knew most of the officers, some of them having been my schoolmates; and at last my mother, yielding to my earnest prayers, gave me a reluctant permission to accept a commission. This Colonel Morgan easily obtained, as my father had been an acquaintance of General Washington's; and now, my dear professor, a new career opens its bright vista before me. No more syllogistic arguments in Latin, no more Greek exercises, or incomprehensible problems—but the march, the bivouac, and, I hope, the glory of victory. Don't mention it, professor, but I shall be off for Canada in a fortnight."

"For Canada!" repeated the old gentleman; "and what, Herbert, do you intend doing in Canada?"

"Doing!" replied Yancey; "why, take it, to be sure. Colonel Arnold is to lead a large force, including our Virginia Rifle Rangers, which is to cross some uninhabited country, and join Montgomery before Quebec. But, professor, what are you doing here? Botanizing, of course?"

"Yes, Herbert. When the army occupied Cambridge, I came to pay a long-promised visit to an old friend in Ipswich, and have made many valuable additions to my herbarium."

"I am right glad to learn your success, professor. Indeed I would like to have a chat with you, but the sun is getting low, and I have a dozen miles to ride. So good-by."

Touching his horse with the spur, the young officer was off the moment he finished his sentence, leaving his companion gazing after him in a deep study. "He goes to Canada—to Quebec," he soliloquized. "Ah, how I would like to see that pleasant city, yet how terrible are my souvenirs of it!" Then, with a quivering lip, and a shudder, as though he felt the brand of Cain scaring his conscience, the unquiet man turned the head of his horse toward Ipswich.

Our readers may have partially gathered from the interview above mentioned that Herbert Yancey was the son of a wealthy Virginia planter, who had died some years previously, leaving his only child in the guardianship of his bereaved wife. Residing on one of the family estates, Mrs. Yancey devoted herself to the education of her son, into whose mind she successfully endeavored to instil honor and truth, with the gentler feelings of her own heart. She succeeded admirably, and until he had nearly arrived at the age of manhood, "Massa Herbert" had the uncontrolled range of the plantation, with its host of devoted sable retainers. But when his tutor informed him that he could instruct him no further—when he had hunted, and fished, and rode, over the whole county,—the young man's active mind became weaned, and he entreated his fond mother to let him pursue his studies at old Harvard, where his father had graduated.

On arriving at Cambridge, Herbert's family position, fine personal appearance, and cheerful disposition, won him a host of friends, and for a wonder, he soon became as popular with the faculty as with the students. Not that he was free from faults, especially what were called college misdemeanors in those days of pedagogical severity; but the faculty saw that his faults were those of impulse, not of calculation, and so they overlooked in him what they would have expelled others for doing. Indeed there was no resisting the frank earnestness of his manner, neither was there any reason to complain when the waste-gate of freedom from home restraint had once performed its office. No sooner was he satiated with the frivolities of college life than irresolution of purpose was exchanged for decision, new aspirations were awakened, and although some of his classmates were young men of marked ability, Herbert was in the foremost rank. Yet although he was a close student, he by no means neglected the manly exercises of his early youth. A row upon Charles River, a gallop into Brookline, or practice with his rifle upon the hills of Brighton, were indulged in nearly every day. These manly accomplishments, while they invigorated his body, gave him that mental energy and firmness of purpose which are so necessary to ensure success in martial pursuits.

When he first requested permission to join the revolutionary forces, at the commencement of hostilities, his mother sent a positive refusal in reply to his earnest epistle. Yet when the gallant Virginians around her enlisted under the stalwart Morgan, and left for the North, her patriotic spirit overbalanced her maternal fears. No sooner was her consent obtained, than he was elected an ensign in the company raised in his own county, and Herbert's first intimation of his mother's consent to his earnest desire, was the receipt of his commission, with a letter from Colonel Morgan, appointing him quartermaster to the regiment.

Elated with this realization of his dreams, Herbert immediately commenced a diligent study of his duties, so that when the brave Virginians reached the camp at Cambridge, he was able to report himself for immediate service. Washington, who had noticed his attention to the important duties of the commissariat, spoke of him in the highest terms, and in arranging the expedition to Canada, young Yancey was charged with the supplies of the advance guard, which was to be chiefly composed of riflemen. It was to procure certain stores, and attend to their shipment, that he was now on his way to Newburyport, in advance of the invading force.

Passing through the straggling village of Rowley, Herbert saw the sun declining over the distant hills of West Newbury, fringing the pine thickets with golden hues, while the sky was filled with gorgeous cloud-castles, shaped by the great Architect of heaven. The birds twittered in the trees, or skimmed over the brooks and pools, while a troop of thieving crows, scenting their repast from afar, were seen trooping through the air, like mourners hastening to a funeral banquet. Nature was melodious and joyful, while from the distance, like the full tones of a cathedral organ, came the roar of the ocean surf upon the sandy beaches of Plum Island. But when he reached the river Parker, an incident occurred of startling moment, dissipating all his day-dreams, and completely changing the tidal current of his existence.

CHAPTER II.

THE PARSONAGE OF ST. PAUL'S.

"At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorned the venerable place;
Truth from his lips prevailed with double sway,
And fools, who came to scoff, remained to pray."

NEWBURYPORT—now a mere nursery from whence recruits are sent forth into the great "Battle of Life," and the asylum which welcomes them back with their spoils to die,—was a prosperous seaport in the revolutionary epoch. Her sails whitened every sea, her merchants lived in princely state, every one of her towns-people was directly or indirectly interested in navigation, and she had much to lose by engaging in the struggle. But the current of the Merrimac was not fuller and stronger, as it swept past her shores, than was the patriotism of her sons. Regardless of the individual cost, they spurned all thoughts of conciliation with King George, and zealously pledged "their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor" for the establishment of the sublime principles of constitutional freedom.

Yet there were exceptions to this, as to every other phase of the public will. A few families clung loyally to their church and to their king, in obedience to the solemn warnings of their pastor, the Rev. Mr. Gwynne, rector of the Episcopal church of St. Paul. Although a native of Massachusetts, the Rector was proud of his old English lineage, and dearly did he love to trace it back through the vexed period of the Commonwealth, the eventful era of Queen Elizabeth, and the Reformation of bluff King Harry, to the time when his first notable ancestor was knighted by Edward the Third at the battle of Crecy. The passion of one ancestor for gaming, of another for horses, and of a third for foreign travel, had gradually wasted away the broad acres regally donated to the valiant De Gwynne with his golden spurs. But it was the rector's boast that, amid all changes, the gradually impoverished family had proudly supported the throne, even when they had been exiled to the western wilds by the loss of the last acre of their old estate.

In addition to this ancestral pride, Parson Gwynne (as he was called) had been educated and ordained in England, under the auspices of the "Society for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts." The munificence of this body had settled him at Newburyport, and in return he had never failed to respect its patrons, reading prayers for the king and the royal family, as became a loyal missionary. Nay, he denounced the first workings of the rebellion as "a most sinful rebellion," and sternly refused to read the committee of safety's recommendations for fasts or thanksgivings, announcing as a reason that the proclamations emanated from men who were alike traitors to their country and to their God.

This, of course, made the Episcopal rector obnoxious to the revolutionists; but the man, apart from his holy office, was beloved by all the good people of Newburyport. High and low, rich and poor, and of every religious denomination, regarded him with genuine reverence, for he was emphatically a man of peace and of good works. A constant visitor at the bedside of the sick and of the suffering, ever ready to aid those in distress or to raise the fallen in heart, Parson Gwynne won the most stubborn opponents of Christian life by his kindness, and inculcated virtue by his spotless example. His cordial and courteous manners were stamped with a winning joviality of character when conversing on secular matters, yet no one ever dared take liberties with him, or infringe the bounds of decorum.

The parsonage house of St. Paul's church was in every way worthy of its tenants, and looked the abode of peace and happiness. It was a large, low-studded wooden edifice, with a huge stack of brick chimneys clustering out from its centre. Above the windows, which were filled with small diamond panes of glass, hung the luxuriant woodbine, and the deep porch, with its cedar columns, was embosomed in roses. Large elms waved their sentinel branches in front, along the road, while on either side, stretching rearward to the very edge of the Merrimac, was a noble garden. This it was the rector's delight to cultivate in the old English style. There were long terraces, fringed with vines, large squares of grass with borders of flowers, a small fish pond and a summer-house, covered with the graceful tendrils of the clematis, on the very banks of the river. Neither was there any lack of excellent fruit trees, of currant or of gooseberry bushes, or of vegetable patches, filled with culinary treasures. It was, in short, a very gem of a garden, presenting unequivocal signs of the rector's peaceful enjoyment, his successful industry, and his love of the beautiful.

Attractive as was the garden, it was but a fitting preface through which to pass ere entering the parsonage, which it so exquisitely enshrined. On the left hand of the small entry, which was nearly filled by a winding, heavy-banistered staircase, was the rector's study. It was a large, low room, with oaken beams crossing it below the whitewashed ceiling, and a clean pine floor, upon which lay scattered a score of small oval carpets, made of bits of cloth braided and then sewed together. An immense fireplace was filled with green asparagus boughs, and a long, sombre-looking clock ticked in a corner. But not an inch of the walls could be seen. They were hid by tall book-shelves, evidently made from time to time as the library had gradually increased, until there was now no available room. Many of the books, of course, were on theological topics, embracing the musty folios of Leyden and of Geneva, in which the doctrines of Calvin and Luther were so prolixly interpreted by their disciples. Yet the fine old English poets were all there—ay, and their pages bore marks of frequent consultation, while a few choice dramas, the works of the Jesuit missionaries who first elevated the cross in America, and a shelf devoted to science, completed the collection.

In one corner stood a good reflecting telescope, with a celestial globe, and a quadrant. Near by, and in a good light, was a large table, literally heaped with books, manuscripts, mineralogical specimens, and other "liter of literature." Here, in a large arm-chair, sat the rector, on the afternoon of which we have spoken.

Parson Gwynne was in his seventieth year, but, from his thick, auburn hair, and the vivacity of his movements, he might have passed for a hale man of fifty. His attenuated but pleasing features, his beautifully formed mouth, and his large brilliant eyes, composed an intellectual, and, at the same time, amiable expression which was extremely fascinating. Though his frame was rather slender than strongly built, it was muscular and active, well adapted to those athletic exertions in which he delighted to be accounted a master. For to confess the truth, the rector was no less anxious to be esteemed a man eminent for ecclesiastical learning, than to be held a skillful angler, a good shot, and a distinguished adept at base-ball, running, leaping, and all exercises which depend upon animal spirits and muscular exertion. These, he held, were eminently English, and he therefore practised them assiduously—rather too much so, perhaps, to suit the gossips of his parish. They—good souls—would have rather seen their rector a pale, thin man, with a weary-looking countenance, and a shuffling, unsteady gait. Luckily he cared not one straw for their opinion.

The rector, at the time of this introduction, was in earnest discourse with Madame Ordway, who had presided over his household affairs for nearly a score of years, and had contributed much to his comfort. A few years previous to her installation at the parsonage, she had been one of the happiest of wives, when her husband "followed the seas," and she was the occupant of a pleasant house at the "north end" of Boston. At last, after a long, dreary silence, almost worse than the worst news could have been, she received intelligence that he had arrived at Newburyport, after having been shipwrecked. Hastening thither, she found him a mere skeleton, but by careful nursing he soon recovered his health, and having an opportunity to command the vessel which had rescued him, he went to sea again.

His wife never saw him more. Month after month she awaited his return, and her fond heart beat high with the thought that at his coming she could gladden him by presenting their first-born son, born after his departure. But the child never knew a father's smile, and at length the mother, who had neither relatives nor property, accepted joyfully the position of housekeeper tendered her by Parson Gwynne, who, as her spiritual adviser, had a fine opportunity to observe her even, gentle disposition. As the lad grew up, it was her heart's prayer that he might, on arriving at manhood, become an expounder of heavenly truths, and minister at his Redeemer's altar. As the lad grew up, however, it became evident that the ministry was not his vocation, and Madame Ordway was at length compelled to admit that such a frolicsome scamp would never make a staid clergyman. Frank was accordingly released from study, and apprenticed to a ship-carpenter, where he soon manifested a great aptitude for ornamental carving. The figure-heads of Frank Ordway's handiwork were celebrated in the colony, and now that he had just attained his majority, he devoted himself to this branch of his trade.

Up to the breaking out of the Revolution, Frank had been a great favorite with Parson Gwynne—nay, the gossips said that he would leave the young man one half of his accumulated savings. But of late, the good rector had become quite dissatisfied, and was now unburling his grievances to young Ordway's mother.

"I tell you what," said he, "Frank is on the broad road to destruction. I have heard of him at several of the meetings at the Liberty Tree, and he even had the audacity to say to me this very morning that he hoped before the next 17th of June there would not be a Tory in Massachusetts."

"But, sir," replied Madame Ordway, in an imploring tone. "Never mind your buts, madame," interrupted the rector. "This rebellious spirit may attain its end, and unless promptly checked—"

He in his turn was interrupted by the entrance of the only undescribed inmate of the rectory, yet the one who would have first attracted a stranger's attention. Some fifteen years previous, a large French vessel had been driven ashore on Plum Island, in a furious gale of wind, and went to pieces within sight of a crowd of spectators, who could do nothing to rescue those on board from a watery grave. Singularly enough, only one soul, and that a delicate young child, was preserved. Washed on shore, she was with difficulty rescued from the waves, and was carried home by the rector, who found his housekeeper delighted with an opportunity to do good by cherishing the little stranger. A fever set in, and when the girl recovered her consciousness, she was unable to give any idea of her family or home, although the rector conjectured that she was a Canadian, and a Roman Catholic. So she grew up, the companion of Frank Ordway, but even a greater favorite of their kind protector. Now that she had grown up, and was entering into womanhood, she was the rector's especial companion, and their love for each other was devoted. Nor was she his favorite alone. So gentle were her ways, so sweet was her smile, so melodious was her voice, and so guileless was her heart, that every one in Newburyport spoke well of the rector's ward. Such was the term by which he addressed her, and she, at his request, called him "guardian." She had been christened Mabel Gwynne.

As she entered the study, a painter would have rejoiced to have transferred her charms to canvas, so cherub-like was the expression of her angelic features. If there was passion in her heart, it was not displayed upon the noble outline of her countenance, while a sweet smile ever lingered around the corners of her tiny mouth. Her bright auburn hair was tightly drawn back over her high marble forehead, and escaped in flowing curls from behind a small straw hat, jauntily perched upon her head. Her clear blue eyes shone with a pensive light through their long, drooping fringes, and her coral lips poutingly kept watch over the pearly treasures disclosed through their slightly opened, rosy gapes. A bodice of dark blue cloth was fitted so tightly as to develop the elegant, untortured contour of her figure, with a cambric kerchief intervening between the dark material and her snowy neck. A long, sweeping skirt of striped homespun kersey was held gracefully up in her left hand, while in the right she carried a riding-whip.

"What, Mabel,—is Selim saddled?" asked the rector, suddenly ceasing his remarks upon the politics of his housekeeper's son.

"Yes, guardy. Old Margy Westcott, who lives near Parker River bridge, has sent me word that she needs flannel badly, having severe rheumatic pains. So I thought that I would canter over with some."

"I wish that I could go over with you, but am preparing a sermon with great care. The rights of the church and of our king must be asserted, or every one will become as rank Whigs as you and Frank Ordway are."

"Would that they—!" Here Mabel checked herself, and running up to the rector, kissed his forehead, saying: "But I won't vex my loyal old guardy. Good-by—good by!" She then left the study with a light step, followed by Madame Ordway.

"Really," said the matron, as they came out from the door, "I don't see what Frank can do."

"Do!" replied Mabel. "There is but one thing for Frank Ordway or any other true-hearted American to do."

"And what is that?" asked Frank himself, coming from behind a cluster of lilacs, and going towards Selim, whose rein Mabel was already unfastening. Holding out his hand, she touched her tiny foot in it and sprang into the saddle. Then turning towards her expectant attendant, she exclaimed:

"Fight for your country's freedom!"

Ere he could recover from his surprise, she was gone, but her words rang unceasingly in his ears. Walking slowly away, he repeated the phrase again and again—"Fight for my country's freedom!" An important secret weighed upon his heart, but it was overpowered there by that warning advice. Yes—yes! He was ready to "fight for his country's freedom," to wear the black cockade, and to follow the rolling drum beneath the "flag of the free."

CHAPTER III.

FEBLE BY LAND AND WATER.

"On such a steed sprung Lachlan,
To bear so gallantly afar
The maid he bravely wooed;
On such a steed the martyr-queen,
Besieged, fearful, yet serene,
Passed on to Holy-rod!"

MABEL, on leaving the parsonage, made her horse pace gently along the high street, then but imperfectly shaded by the giant elms, whose interlacing branches now enshrine it, like the nave of a Gothic cathedral. She did not wish to offend the good dames who sat at their windows, like spiders in their webs, all ready to pounce upon any exhibition of hoydenishness on the part of the rector's ward; but no sooner had she passed the "green," than she tightened her rein. "Forward, Selim,—forward!"

The noble animal, arching his neck, and throwing forward his tiny ears, at once started off in a sweeping canter. In those days, every lady was a good rider, but Mabel Gwynne excelled in horsemanship, that promoter of invigorated health, braced nerves and elevated spirits. Rapidly passing over a mile or so of the smooth, pleasant highway, she slackened her rein as she entered a beautiful wood, which stood in its primeval grandeur. Some of the trees cast deep shadows, but through the intervals darted the concentrated rays of the sun in brilliant lines of light, producing a magical effect. The birds were singing their evening songs, and nature's happiest harmonies seemed consecrated by the sweetest melodies.

Letting Selim walk, Mabel was enjoying this landscape, when a horseman suddenly emerged from a cross bridle-path, and rode directly toward her. He was in the prime of life, and guilely though rather shabbily attired. His crimson cloth coat was badly stained, the embroidery on his satin waistcoat was tarnished, the laundress had evidently not had recent possession of his cambric ruffles, and the long riding-boots, which reached above the knees of his leather small-clothes, bore samples of dried mud from many a rut.

"Don't be in a hurry," he said, in a half joanlar, half brutal tone, stretching out his arms as if to clasp her around the waist.

Mabel shuddered at the sound, nor, as she gazed at the speaker with mingled amazement and fear, was there anything about his appearance to reassure her. His was one of those faces which make one shudder without knowing why. It was of a dark olive shade, deeply furrowed with the traces of small-pox, and tinged with the scarlet brand of intemperate indulgence. Gray-grizzled, black hair hung in tangled masses from beneath his three-cornered felt hat, and thick, bushy eyebrows of the same hue gave to his deeply-sunken gray eyes a yet darker shade. His features were elongated, while diagonally across his face was the livid scar of a disfiguring sword cut, which had so marred his upper lip that when he spoke, or was moved by excitement, his large teeth were so uncovered as to give a repulsive, if not ferocious air to his whole countenance. Strange to say, however, one would have been disposed to regard this sinister expression as perfectly natural. The wound which spoiled the man's good looks, seemed to have given him the finishing touch to the likeness which his aspect bore to his soul, and to have harmonized the physiognomy and the disposition. It was the stamp of passion beyond self-control, and of a defiant, hardened career of dissipation, branded indelibly, as if to warn all well-meaning people against the possessor.

Mabel's color went and came with indignation, although she did not dream that the annoyance was anything but the freak of a drunken man, emboldened by the disturbed state of the province. Gathering her energies, she replied:

"I am in haste, sir, and do not desire company."

"But suppose you cannot help having it!" exclaimed the man, with a satyr-like leer, for her beauty but inflamed his excitement.

"Nay, sir. Let me pass. I must go on!" hurriedly ejaculated Mabel, who, for the first time in her life, felt thoroughly alarmed.

"Never, my beauty!" And the fellow seized Selim's bridle.

"Sir, do you know who I am? I am the Rev. Mr. Gwynne's ward, and am on a visit to a sick woman."

"So, so!" roared the persecutor. "You are the parson's ward—the stray eaglet in the old Tory's nest. I knew all that, my beauty, when I sent for you; for old Dame Westcott's rheumatism was caused by a guinea from me, with the promise of another one if she could tote you out here."

"God help me!" exclaimed Mabel, turning white with fear.

"O, sir, let me return!"

"Never, without me as your husband, my darling!" And as the man uttered these words, he seized the bridle nearer the bit with his left hand, while he sought to encircle Mabel's waist with his right arm.

No sooner did she feel his rude grasp, than a thousand agonized thoughts whirled in frightful chaos through her excited brain. A ray of hope flashed through the gloom. Raising her riding whip, and summoning her every energy, she dealt the would-be-abductor such a blow across the face that he dropped the bridle and his prey, instinctively raising both hands to the smarting livid line which crossed both cheeks.

"Forward, Selim,—forward!" shouted Mabel, gathering up the reins as she freed herself from a loathsome grasp, and away sped the noble steed as fully comprehending the peril of his rider.

"Stop! stop!" exclaimed the bad-tempered ruffian, his eyes flashing fire, as he spurred his horse in pursuit. "Stop, or by the saints, I will fire!" But he found it impossible to overtake Selim, who was urged on by his mistress, as if every impulse of his life was concentrated in his speed.

Onward—onward they flew. Mabel dared not turn around, but she could hear the hoofs of her pursuer's horse close behind her, and his loud cries were swept past her on every breeze. Half a mile further and she would be safe, for she would then reach the river, and there were houses on the other side of the bridge.

"Forward, Selim,—forward!"

The gallant animal, with distended eyes flashing fire, quivering nostrils, and veins which swelled like the fibres on a vine leaf, almost flew over the ground, while the distance between him and the pursuer rapidly increased. Meanwhile the rage of the horseman appeared also to increase into madness, and he was on the point of carrying his threat of firing into execution, when he descried the bridge just before Mabel, and on it a party of men, who were engaged in repairs.

"Foiled and defeated!" he muttered, returning his pistol to its holster and abruptly wheeling about, while his countenance wore a look of diabolical ferocity. "Who would have thought that Dan Holbrook would have let his game slip through his fingers this way, and lose five hundred guineas? Horse-whipped, too! If I catch her again—never mind!" Plain was it to discover, in the distortions of that hideous face, convulsed with passion, that the poor girl's fate, if she ever fell into his clutches, would be a sad one.

How different the feelings of Mabel! "Thank God!" she exclaimed, when she saw the men on the bridge, but such was her nervous agitation that she did not observe that all the planks had been removed. In vain did the workmen, who were at the opposite extremity of the bridge, shout to her to stop. In vain did the noble Selim endeavor to retreat from the yawning gulf. One idea alone had full possession of her fevered brain, and that idea was comprehended in the single word "escape!"

The horse, on reaching the opening in the bridge, and seeing the tide rolling between the open timbers, convulsively drew himself back upon his hanches. Then, for the first time, Mabel was aware of her perilous position, but it was too late. With a mad-dened bound, the noble animal leaped into the river.

"God help me!" was Mabel's hurried exclamation, as this new danger so unexpectedly presented itself, and that at the moment when deliverance from another peril seemed at hand. A sharp pang, as if of death, passed through her brain, there was a splash, a gurgle, and she felt that her senses were abandoning her. Luckily, she mechanically disengaged her foot from the stirrup ere the horse touched the water, and while he swam away from the shore, she floated down the stream, insensible of her position, and booyed up by her clothing.

Fortunately for her, Herbert Yancey had just reached the river bank, where he was conversing with the workmen, while one of their number went to procure a batteau for the purpose of ferrying him across. He had witnessed Mabel's perilous approach, and no sooner did he see her precipitated into the water than—throwing off a portion of his apparel and his sword—he plunged in to the rescue. An excellent swimmer, he soon managed to seize Mabel, and, in less time than is here occupied in narrating the mishap, he reached the bank of the river, an inanimate burthen in his arms.

Laying Mabel gently down upon the grass, Herbert knelt at her side, and gazed in mute admiration, for he saw before him the very face that had ever haunted the love-dream of his heart. O how beautiful, drenched and terror-stricken as she was, did she appear to her preserver, who gazed on her as if she was an angelic visitor! Slowly and dimly did returning consciousness steal into the young girl's mind, as the first light of dawning day struggles against the mists of night in the eastern horizon. How long she had been unconscious, she knew not, but at the re-awakening of her intellect, she felt a hand upon her brow, and saw a man kneeling at her side. Was it her beloved guardian? Or had she fallen into the power of her late pursuer?

By this time several of the workmen had arrived at the spot, and as Mabel recognized some of them who were Mr. Gwynne's parishioners, she recovered full possession of her thoughts. Again the current of rich, warm heart-blood shot through her cheeks and lips, and she resembled the fabulous statue of the Greek sculptor, warmed into life by the prayer of love.

"Never fear, Miss Gwynne," said one of the workmen; "you are among friends. But what did make you ride so?"

Again the angel of terror cast the shadow of his wing over Mabel's face, as she hurriedly gazed around, but she saw no one around who did not regard her with unmistakable interest. A sweet smile chased away the doubt cloud, and she said:

"Thanks—thanks! But do not ask me any questions. I wish to go to Mr. Gwynne's at once."

"But will you not come to our house, miss?" asked the workman. "Your clothes are wet, and—"

"Thanks, but no," interrupted Mabel. "I wish to see my guardian as soon as possible. Where is Selim?"

"He swam ashore, and started for home," replied the workman. "If you insist upon going, I will go to the pasture for my horse, and take you up behind me."

"Take mine," said Herbert. "I will follow on yours, and we can re-exchange at the tavern."

"Davenport's?"

"Yes. First let me take my saddle-bags, that I may get dry clothing."

A few moments afterward, the kind workman had crossed the river in the batteau with Herbert's horse, with Mabel mounted behind him. She had taken no notice of Herbert beyond a pleasant smile of adieu, but that smile lingered in his heart.

"Who is she?" he inquired, when the last flutter of her drenched hat-plume had arrested his earnest gaze.

"Parson Gwynne's ward, sir. The old rector is a rank old Tory, but we all like Miss Mabel."

"Yes," added another of the by-standers; "and we should all be grateful to you for saving her life as you did. It's a wonder that she did not thank you, but, poor thing! she seemed half frightened out of her wits. The old rector's good to make it right, though. And now, sir, step up to my house yonder; put on your dry clothes, and we'll have old Norton's horse ready for you to ride into port with."

CHAPTER IV.

THE SONS OF LIBERTY.

"Sainted shades! who dared to brave,
In Freedom's ark, the pathless wave!
Manes of Carver, Standish, hear!
To love the soil you gave, we swear,
And midst the storms of state be true
To God, our country and to you."

On this small Thursday evening, a close observer might have noticed small triangular pieces of red paper pasted upon corners of houses, gate-posts and other prominent places in Newburyport. Many of the towns-people passed them without having their attention in any way excited, while others wondered what foolish boy had been so precise in disfiguring the painted wood-work; but there were citizens, stout and true-hearted men, to whom these trifling bits of paper conveyed a deep meaning. They signified danger to the cause of freedom, and, like an electric flash, they sped the intelligence throughout the whole town that the council-fire was that night to be lighted, and summoned around it each true "Son of Liberty."

This mystic yet all-powerful fraternity had its head-quarters in Newburyport, in a large sail-loft at the water-side, near the ship-yards. There, when the sun had dipped his glowing disc behind the swelling hills of West Newbury, a determined band began to assemble. Giving the sacred pass-word of "liberty" at the lower door, they were admitted by a vigilant sentinel, and by eight o'clock, the large loft was filled. A few wore the rich broadcloth or velvet suits of the epoch, but the large majority were evidently workmen, ready to fight for the independence of their native land: These were the true patriots of '76—that glorious crew who so promptly manned the ship of state when first launched upon the troubled waters of political strife. Some professional and wealthy "gentlemen" joined them when office or honor was to be attained; but it was emphatically the mechanics and the yeomen of the thirteen colonies who demanded and obtained the glorious boon of national independence. In the camp or in the council, the hard-headed men were in a large majority.

The proceedings were opened with prayer. Every man in the assembly devoutly bowed his head as a reverend patriot implored the divine blessing upon the meeting, praying that, while delivering their country, they might not forget to render all honor, and praise, and power to their heavenly sovereign, the "King of kings." When he had ceased, a commanding voice called the meeting to order, and inquired: "What seek we here?"

And the entire assemblage responded in a deep-toned whisper, which sounded like the ground swell of the ocean as it rolls against a rocky shore: "We seek liberty!"

"How do her sons obtain her presence?" asked the chairman.

"By clear heads, true hearts and strong arms."

"And do you, again and ever, pledge your heads, your hearts and your right arms in behalf of the glorious cause?"

"We do!" And as the unanimous response came forth, each man laid his left hand upon his heart, and raised his right hand, as if appealing to Heaven for an endorsement of his devotedness.

"Sons of Liberty," said the chairman, "your council-fire is lighted, and we will proceed to business. I have convened you for deliberation on a subject which will doubtless prove as unpleasant to many of you as it is to me, but it must be attended to without delay. You will be seated, and hear the report of your vigilance committee."

The chairman of this committee, who now ascended the platform, was Harry Folsombee, a sturdy ship-carpenter, whose character was unsullied by suspicion, and whose heart was divided between his country and his friends. His readiness to oblige all with whom he came in contact, the delicacy with which he aided those in distress, and his propensity to contrive and to execute schemes for public amusement, made him a universal favorite.

"Brethren," said he, with an evidently troubled mind, "I feel for the first time a reluctance in performing my duty. Yet it is the duty of your committee of vigilance to inform you that the good of the cause requires the immediate suspension of prayers for the Hanoverian tyrant, George the Third, in St. Paul's church. We honor Parson Gwynne as a man, but his devotion to the tyrant on the English throne makes his church a gathering-point for the Tories, and your committee are of opinion that the Sons of Liberty should have these prayers stopped."

The personal popularity of the rector was fully acknowledged in the debate which followed the report of the committee, and several speakers, stating that they had already urged Parson Gwynne to omit the obnoxious portions of the liturgy, expressed a hope that he would yet be brought to take a proper view of his position. They believed him to be at heart a friend of his country, and only restrained from becoming a true republican by his sense of duty. Let him be simply cautioned.

Others, while equally willing to admit the rector's individual excellence, were also convinced of the unyielding pertinacity of his nature. They urged that he be formally notified to change his course, and warned that if he insisted in asserting his allegiance to the Hanoverian tyrant, the doors of St. Paul's would be closed, and kept closed.

The only one who advocated more ultra measures, was a man commonly known as Butcher Holbrook, from his occupation. He was a burly, muscular individual, with fiery gray eyes that glowered from beneath shaggy red eyebrows, a sensual mouth, a chuckle like the laugh of a hyena, and that insolence of speech peculiar to those who know that they are inferior to others.

"Brothers," said he, "I go for giving the old fellow a coat of tar and feathers, and riding him out of town on a rail."

"Shame! shame!" cried many voices, but the mallet of the chairman restored order.

"You may cry shame," doggedly muttered Holbrook; "but it won't be very encouraging to the boys who are at Dorchester, to hear that we have a full-blown Tory parson here, praying for King George, and confusion to us, his enemies."

"Mr. Chairman," said an old and respected member of the council, "I hope that such treatment towards a venerated clergyman be at once discouraged, even though the old gentleman is led astray by the false lights of his faith. Such an infamous proceeding would do our cause more harm than good. And, perhaps, if the rector's ward had looked upon a member of this council with more favor, that individual would have been more merciful."

"Mind your own business, old meddler!" angrily replied Holbrook, as if certain that the remark applied to him. The hammer of the chairman arrested further remark, and the butcher sulkily took his seat.

"Question! question!" was called for on all sides.

"Is it your pleasure to have the question put?" asked the chairman.

"It is," was the almost unanimous response.

"Is it your pleasure that the rector of St. Paul's church in this town, the Rev. Mr. Gwynne, be notified that no public prayers must be offered up by him, or in that pulpit, for British tyrants, or for the success of their undertakings? And, further, that he be notified that he must read the various proclamations of the Provincial Congress and of the Committee of Public Safety? With the distinct understanding that if he opposes the thus expressed wishes of the Sons of Liberty, the church will be seized, shut up, and all occupation of it prohibited. Those in favor of this motion, made on the recommendation of the committee of vigilance, will be pleased to manifest it."

A large majority of those present raised their right hand.

"It is a vote," continued the chairman. "I so declare it, and the secretary will record the will of the Sons of Liberty, thus expressed, on their chronicles. How shall it be announced to Parson Gwynne?"

"I'll tell him," said Holbrook.

"No! no!" was shouted, and a clear voice said: "I nominate Frank Ordway." The chairman at once proposed the name, and Frank was chosen.

"Before the council adjourns," said the secretary, "I would inform the Sons that the army destined for the invasion of Canada will positively sail from here next week. Letters to that effect were received by the selectmen yesterday, and they announced that an officer of the quartermaster's department would reach town to-night, to make necessary arrangements, and to enlist a company of artificers. The services of this corps will be required in building hatteraux, bridges, etc. Will not the brothers see that the ranks are promptly filled, and otherwise aid the officer, whose name, I believe, is Captain Yancey? He will, of course, stop at Davenport's tavern."

The Sons of Liberty now adjourned. Nearly every one, as the members clatted in groups after the adjournment, lamented the necessity of interfering with the rector of St. Paul's, but not one felt sadder on the subject than the messenger who had been appointed to hear the tidings officially. The rector had been truly a father, a preceptor and a friend to him; now he feared that the good yet impetuous old gentleman would receive as an insult what was a simple discharge of duty. No Son of Liberty could decline any service upon which he was sent by his council, and the young man started on his mission with a heavy heart.

We have said that Frank Ordway was young, yet he had an athletic, well-formed frame, strong arms, nerves of steel and sinews of iron. His features were frank, although they appeared somewhat stern when not irradiated by a smile of great sweetness. He had a somewhat prominent nose, his deep-set, electric, hazel eyes were fringed with long lashes, and a profusion of glossy brown hair curled over the broad expanse of a well defined forehead. Though one of the youngest members of the Sons of Liberty, there was no one in the council who better understood the sublime principles of constitutional freedom. Love for his mother had alone withheld him from joining the revolutionary forces when the war-clarion first sounded, but he had been one of the most active friends of freedom at home. Nor had he ever before shrunk back from any duty imposed upon him. Now his consolation was that he might be able to avert the threatening storm, which seemed about to break upon the head of the rector, and—for the whole truth must be told—the rector's ward.

On reaching the parsonage, he found, to his astonishment, lights burning in nearly every room, while before the door were hitched two horses well known as belonging to the principal physicians of the town. Who could need their services? He knocked cautiously.

Madame Ordway recognized the knock of her son, and soon appeared at the door, making a gesture of silence.

"Thank Heaven, dear mother, it is not you who is ill!" said or rather whispered Frank. "But who are the doctors here to see?"

"Miss Mabel. Have you not heard of her escape from drowning?"

"No. Miss Mabel in danger! When—where?"

Of the attempt at abduction, Madame Ordway herself was as yet ignorant, but she briefly narrated Selim's plunge into the river, with its results. Frank listened in silence, but his full, arching lips quivered with emotion, while the workings of his troubled heart sent a crimson flush to his cheek. Of course, his mother's account of the affair was meagre and imperfect, but the young man heard enough to make him eager to know more, especially to know who had rescued Miss Mabel.

Not wishing to intrude upon the rector while his mind must necessarily be agitated, Frank requested his mother to say that he would call early in the morning upon especial business. Then bidding his mother "good-night," he wended his way homeward, deeply absorbed in thought. Strange to say, the intelligence that Mabel had been exposed to insult awakened in the young man's heart the full consciousness that she was the object of his love. He had for years almost regarded her as a sister, but now a different emotion swept over his very soul. Love! It is impossible to say in what this passion, at once the most mastering and the most mysterious of our nature, has its origin. It springs into life on a look, a word, a thought. The heart may have remained untouched for years; it may have wondered at the weakness of others; for we cannot sympathize with what we do not comprehend, but not the less does the fated moment come at last. Then we believe in all we doubted before; then we yield to the sweet enchantment life never knows again. Such was the case with Frank Ordway. A new sensation had entered into his existence, and, alas! for humanity, sweet, gentle as it seems, it was in all probability to produce a wretchedness before undreamed.

CHINESE MOUNTAIN TRAVELLING CHAIR.

The accompanying engraving represents the mode of travelling in the mountainous tea region of China. In spite of its oddity, there might be more unpleasant modes of locomotion. The traveller sits, it will be seen, in a light seat suspended between two stout bamboo poles, supported on the shoulders of two men. There is a rest for his feet, and with a palm-leaf umbrella over his head, and a basket of refreshments slung conveniently at hand, gets over the ground much more comfortably than his bearers. It is only a particular part of the central provinces of China which is adapted to the culture of the tea, the extreme limits being too cold and too warm for its growth. The plant is a shrub having the botanical name of Thea, the leaves of which constitute the tea of commerce. The difference in the qualities chiefly arise from the mode of culture and preparation when grown. The tea plant is grown from seeds sown in rows four or five feet apart. The ground is kept free from weeds, and the plants are not permitted to grow beyond the convenient reach of the hands in gathering the leaves. The first crop of leaves is not collected until the third year after sowing, and the plants are removed to make room for a new plantation when they are six or seven years old. The leaves are gathered from one to four times during the year, according to the age of the tree, the most general number being three. The first gathering takes place about April, the second about June, and the third about August. The earliest gathering yields leaves of the most delicate color, the most aromatic flavor and the least bitterness; those of the second gathering have a dull green color, and less valuable qualities than the former; while the third collection are of a darker green, and the least valuable of the three. The quality is also affected by the age of the plant on which the leaves are borne, and by the degree of exposure to which they have become accustomed; leaves from young plants, and those most exposed, being always the best. So particular are the Chinese to ensure the finer sorts, that for two or three weeks before the harvest commences, the collectors, who are trained to this business from a very early age, are prohibited from eating fish or other kinds of food deemed unclean, lest by their breath they should contaminate the leaves. They are also made to take a bath two or three times a day, and are not allowed to gather the leaves with their naked fingers, but with gloves. These precautions, absurdly minute as they may appear, owe their origin to the evanescent nature of the finer qualities of the tea; for the finest kind may be changed into an inferior tea in one night, if the proper attention be not paid to the gathering. Then ensue the processes whereby the green leaves assume the wrinkled form so familiar to us. As soon as gathered, they are put into wide, shallow baskets, and placed in the wind or sunshine for a few hours. They are transferred to a flat cast-iron pan, over a stove heated with charcoal, in quantity about half a pound of leaves at a time. The leaves are stirred briskly about with a kind of brush, and are then quickly swept off the pan into baskets. This done, the leaves are carefully rubbed and rolled between the hands, and are next put in large quantities on the pan, and again subjected to heat; but the heat on this occasion is lower than before, and only just sufficient to dry them effectually without risk of scorching. The tea is then spread out on a table, and every imperfectly-dried leaf removed from the rest.

MARSEILLES, FRANCE.

The second picture on this page represents the harbor of Marseilles from one of the most striking points of view, with its strong fortifications on the right and left, its basin crowded with shipping and lined with warehouses, and its bold hills rising in the background over the towers and pinnacles of the city. In the foreground is a family group picnicking on the grass, one of whom is signalling a party in a boat pulling past the point on which they are stationed. The harbor of Marseilles is one of the finest in the French empire. It is perfectly secure in all weathers, and has anchorage for 1200 vessels in from 18 to 24 feet of water. It is strongly defended by the two forts shown in our engraving, the Tower of St. John on the north, and the Fort of St. Nicholas on the south. Near this spot is a wet dock, measuring 500 by 400 yards. The foreign commerce of Marseilles exceeds that of every other port in France, and its coast trade is only surpassed by that of Bordeaux. It is the great port of debarkation for passengers to the various ports on the Mediterranean. It is a place of great antiquity, having been founded by the Phœnicians 600 years B. C. The population, in 1852, was 192,527.

SEPTEMBER DREAMS.

There comes a strain from the green, dim woods,
I have heard it all the day,
From the actual life with its thousand cares
Calling my heart away!
The low, sweet murmur of many leaves,
By the wandering winds caressed,
The laugh of a thousand troy waves
At play on the river's breast.

A song from the life of every flower,
Which ended in greenness lies,
Bathed in the glory that wanders down
From September's cloudless skies;
All mingle together like joyous tides,
In one calm, untroubled flow,
Singing the while of that full, deep rest,
Which my spirit cannot know.

From my earliest days have their glorious strains
Its harp strings strangely thrilled;
And the wildest yearnings I ever felt,
Their harmony hath stilled!
I will fling off the actual's weary chain,
I will revel in golden dreams;
For I love them well, earth's glad, free things,
Mosses, and winds, and streams!

It is not with the step which my childhood knew,
The laughing lip and eye,
The bounding heart, whose pulses throbbed
To each gale that wandered by;
It is not with thee that I kneel to-day,
In the hush of the forest glade;
Life's sun shone out for a little time,
And after came the shade.

But is it a shrine for mirth and joy?
And shall it not be for tears?
The shadows that rest on the river's breast,
Are but types of clouded years,
The ivy that winds round the ancient oak
Its green and clasping vines,
Is like friendship's chain, that in weary hours
The warmer and closer twines!

Each sunbeam that kisses the lily leaves,
Seems to say, "O, human heart,
We come from above, as thy trials do,
Be strong, whoever thou art!
Sunlight and shadow, and smiles, and tears,
From Christ's heaven alike do fall;
One hand hath fashioned each spirit-chord,
And One Eye beholds them all!"

"Art thou weary and sad?—the autumn days
Breathe in whispers of the spring—
To the roughest crags, where no foot may tread,
The greenest of mosses cling."
Speak unto my spirit, O fair and bright!
Mid the falling of my tears,
Through the mist and clouds of the present grief,
The gladness to come appears.

I've drank of the glory that wanders down
From the soft September skies;
And peaceful and calm as a child asleep,
Each passionate yearning lies,
Winds wander like angels, to and fro,
And a blessing every one,
To my spirit brings—in my new-born faith
I am saying, "Thy will be done."

THE CONVICT'S WIFE.

BY MRS. MARY MAYNARD.

It was a dark and stormy night. The cold March wind howled mournfully around the little church, and rattled the old doors and windows as it strove to find entrance. Without, all was desolate and bleak; within, there was a strange blending of joy and sorrow.

A wedding party stood before the lowly altar, and a white-haired minister had just pronounced the benediction on those who knelt before him. There was little show of gaiety or mirth among the party, and the deathlike countenance of the young bride bespoke a heart ill at ease. Occasionally she cast anxious glances down the dim, dark aisle, towards the door, and at each fresh roar of the wind, would grasp the arm of her companion in an agony of terror.

But now the solemn ceremony is over, and as the newly married turn from the lighted chancel, and go out into the night, the bridegroom can scarce sustain the trembling steps of his companion. Wrapping her slender form in a heavy mantle, he places her in the waiting carriage, and with their two companions they are rapidly driven away.

Mary Lee is married—married to the man she loves. She is close clasped to his heart, and his fond words of thankfulness and encouragement are sounding in her ear, and yet is she far from happy. True, she smiles on him who bends so fondly over her; she places her little trembling hands in his with all confidence, and she clings to him as her best earthly friend. But a weight is on her heart—a burden of deception and ingratitude; and the form of an old and now desolate man rises up to reproach her. Mary Lee has this night fled from what has been her home for many years. She has left her uncle and guardian—he who has been father and friend to her all her life—to mourn over the disobedience of one he loved as his own child.

True he had no right to control the young girl's love, which is, in every respect, well placed. But now, when too late, she feels that she ought to have made greater allowances for his prejudices; to have sought longer and more earnestly for his consent, and even have sacrificed her own happiness to have secured his. But it is over now. She has dared the curse he threatened, and in her remorse she believes it already bestowed. Alas for the first deception!—the first step in the wrong path! Who can tell the misery it occasions?

Mary Lee and her uncle were the sole survivors of their race. Her father, thirteen years before, had been in a government office at Calcutta; and finding that his situation was pleasant, and likely to be permanent, he sent to England for his wife and child, who had remained behind. An older and only brother of Mr. Lee's accompanied them on the voyage out, and the husband and father awaited their arrival with anxious impatience. In vain weeks and months passed on—they came not; and the first news the horror-stricken man received, was the account of the loss of the vessel, and all she contained.

A long and fearful illness, in which he narrowly escaped the grave, was the result of this sorrow; and when he recovered, John Lee was a crushed and broken-hearted man. He gave up his situation, and some of his friends supposed he had gone home; while others, better informed, declared that it was his intention to become a wanderer on the earth. However, none knew his fate, and he was soon forgotten.

Several months after the loss of the C—, the elder brother and the little girl arrived in England. They were the sole survivors of the wreck, and had been carried by the vessel which had rescued them to the West Indies, and thence back to England. Robert Lee made every possible inquiry about the fate of his brother; but as his letters elicited nothing in return but the simple fact of his having left Calcutta, he at last gave up writing in despair. And believing that the child was an orphan, he at once adopted her; and henceforth to provide for her future fortune became the chief aim of his life.

Little Mary had always lived in London, and here her uncle made his home—and here they dwelt until the time we introduce them to the reader. From her childhood Mary had been intimate with a family of the name of Munroe, consisting of a mother and three daughters—another child, a son, she had never seen in her youthful days. Mr. Lee did not like the family, and never approved of the acquaintance; but they having been kind to Mary's mother during her husband's absence, seemed to have established a claim to the gratitude of the young girl.

When Mary was approaching her seventeenth birthday, Charles Munroe came home to visit his friends, with strict charges from the gentleman who had taken him on the death of his father, to make his visit a short one. He came—he met Mary at his mother's—he forgot his promise to return to Scotland—he resolved to remain near her who had so effectually fascinated him. For this determination on his part, poor Mary was made to suffer severely.

Her uncle, jealously awake to the danger of losing his pleasant companion and most agreeable addition to his bachelor establishment, upbraided her for giving encouragement to her young lover, and inducing him to remain near her; while Charles's friends, indignant that he should sacrifice his good prospects and lose a wealthy patron, bitterly reproached her for the same cause.

For a year Mary endured all the unhappiness her ill-fated attachment had brought on her, but at the end of that time, Charles would not allow matters to continue so any longer. An application to her uncle having met with an insulting answer and an angry denial, the young man used all his influence with her to consent to an elopement—a step they both deplored, but which circumstances appeared to drive them to.

After their marriage, they continued to live in London, Charles having obtained a situation of responsibility and profit. Every effort to become reconciled to their friends was met with insult and reproaches. Mr. Lee utterly refused to have anything to do with them; and Mrs. Munroe, though she consented to see her son, would not recognize his wife, and consequently Charles would not avail himself of the exclusive privilege.

Deprived of the society of their friends, the young couple lived alone for each other; and for a year their happiness was uninterrupted, save when the recollection of their incensed relatives caused painful feelings. Mary had hoped and prayed in vain that her uncle might relent. It was the one bitter drop in her cup of happiness; and all the lavish kindness of her fond husband could not banish the remembrance of the lonely old man in his desolate home. She knew he had breathed a bitter curse on her and her marriage, and at times a nameless terror would overwhelm her—a horrible fear of some unknown evil. It was the foreshadowing of the coming events.

Let us enter this gloomy building. We ask no leave from that surly turnkey; we are invisible. What dark, damp passages we pass through!—what massive arches overhead!—what heavy iron-bound doors! Do not shrink. Those doors have no power to detain you, though to others they may bring untold terrors.

But now we have arrived at our journey's end. It is a low, dark cell, with one deep-set, closely-grated window. A chair, a rude couch, a heavy table is the extent of the furniture. In the centre of the room stands a young man with clasped hands and upraised eyes. On his countenance is expressed the intensest agony; he is praying—praying for strength for himself and his companion. And that companion? Behold her lying speechless, almost senseless at his feet. Her beautiful hair has fallen down, and almost covers the deathlike countenance—distressing sobs from time to time burst from her bosom—she is the image of hopeless misery.

That young man is Charles Munroe. He has been accused, tried and found guilty of a great crime, and is now about to leave his country to spend the remainder of his life amid the horrors of a penal colony. And is it possible that that fair outside can cover a guilty soul?—that the noble brow, from which the dark and heavy curls are pushed back, can deserve to be branded with the vile name of "forger." We shall see.

"My husband! O, my husband!" The piercing scream which accompanies these words startles the entering officials, and causes a yet deeper shade of despair to cloud the prisoner's brow.

"Mary, my dear Mary, the hour has come for us to part. Will you not promise me that for the sake of your infant and yourself, you will try to bear this dreadful trial with fortitude?"

The only answer to this appeal is the same piteous wailing, "My husband! O, my husband!"

Raising her in his arms as he would a child, the young husband strove to impart some courage to that sinking heart, and at last succeeded in securing her attention long enough to tell her his wishes and advice relative to her future life. And who can tell the agony that brave heart endured while thus planning the lonely future for the helpless being, clinging in speechless agony to him for strength and support?

But the last minute has arrived. A party of harsh-looking men surround them, and the clank of the additional fetters they are about to place on him, strikes a chill through the prisoner's frame. And now they would unwind those clinging arms, clasping his neck with the force of despair. Again that fearful scream rings through the dungeon, and the wretched wife is kneeling at her husband's feet.

"Charles! Charles! Tell me once more before we part, as you love me, and would save me from despair, tell me that you are innocent!"

"I am, my Mary. As God is my witness, I am innocent of this deed."

One last, despairing embrace accompanied these words, and Charles Munroe was hurried from the presence of his young wife, who again sank senseless to the ground. But Mary was capable of greater endurance than her feeble appearance warranted. Once recovered from the agony of parting, she collected all her strength to enable her to fulfil his wishes. But first a journey must be performed; she must see the vessel sail which contained the only friend she could claim on earth—her beloved and much wronged husband.

To attempt to describe her feelings on that occasion were absurd. None but those who have gone through a like ordeal can sympathize in such sufferings. In obedience to her husband's wish, Mary Munroe made preparations for immediately leaving England and proceeding to America. He said:

"You will there be able to maintain yourself, and be free from the disgrace that here will always attach to you as the wife of a convict."

It was also her husband's desire that she should resume her own name. This she at first refused to do; but the touching plea, "For your child's sake, Mary, do this; let it not be branded with its unhappy father's shame," caused her to yield, and she took passage in a New York packet, under the name of "Mrs. Lee."

Not without bitter anguish did the poor girl bid adieu to the pleasant little home where she had passed so many happy days. It was hard parting with the mementoes of those days—the books, the birds, the flowers he had loved. Even the various articles of furniture were precious in her sight, each containing a little history of its own—each recalling some incident in the "days gone by." Mary had few friends and no relatives to bid adieu. Her uncle had treated her with the greatest cruelty, when during her husband's trial she had implored him to use his influence in his favor.

"Never!" was the harsh answer. "Not if one word of mine could save him from the gallows, should that word be spoken. I believe him to be guilty, and I trust he will meet the punishment he merits."

The poor wife stifled the bitter answer that rose to her lips, and rushed from the presence of her hard-hearted relative. Mrs. Munroe, amid her bitter wallings for her son's sad fate, ceased not to blame his innocent wife as the cause. "But for her, Charles would now be safe and well in Scotland." Such was the unhappy mother's lament. "O, my boy, my boy! I told you, you would rue the day you ever saw that wretched girl." Poor Mary! pining for sympathy, for some kind friend to comfort her, and realizing acutely the absence of the one on whom she could have reposed all her cares and sorrows, it was needless to add to her misery by harsh words.

There was a strange sound on board the crowded packet ship—the feeble wailing of a new-born infant mingling with the roar of the winds, the fierce rubbing of the vessel through the waters, and the loud voices of the rough sailors. Women were there—kind, gentle women, obeying the impulses of their natures, and ministering to the wants of the mother and babe. But though Mary Lee received their kindness with all the gratitude it demanded, the one crushing thought was present in her mind. Bitterly she wept over her worse than fatherless babe, and imagined all the joy that would have been hers, could he have seen and blessed his little daughter. In that hour of sorrow, the poor young wife "learned how much the heart can bear." She lived through all her wretchedness, and at last reached the place of her destination in safety.

"Have you heard the news?" eagerly inquired Mrs. Newcome of her friend, Mrs. Goodale, as she entered the pretty morning-room of the latter, in a perfect flutter of excitement. "But of course you have not, as you only got home last night. And now I must tell you all about it. In the first place, the old 'Briar Cottage' has got a tenant."

"That is not so very extraordinary," replied Mrs. Goodale, smiling. "My only astonishment is that the prettiest place in N—ville should have remained vacant so long."

"Well, but it is such a queer tenant; the whole town is in a fever of curiosity about her."

"O, it is a lady, then. I am sure I pity her, if once the curiosity of the people is raised about her. I know from sad experience, what mischief and trouble the prying into strangers' affairs frequently leads to." Mrs. Goodale sighed, and the color deepened on her visitor's cheek, as she replied:

"O, this is a very different person from you. People only wondered what made your husband choose such a young wife; but this young woman has no husband, and yet she has a little infant with her, only a few weeks old. She calls herself a widow—and of course she may be, but I think it is very doubtful." Mrs. Newcome gave her head a toss, as much as to say, "There, you have my opinion; now what do you think of it?"

"We cannot tell anything for certain about her yet. For nought we know, she may be deserving of our sincerest sympathy." The minister's gentle wife was ever for taking the part of the absent.

"O, no, indeed, we cannot tell anything for certain about her yet—until in case she should want to enter the church, we ought to be very particular. You know we cannot be too cautious who are admitted, religion is so often a cloak for iniquity." Mrs. Newcome sighed with fervor. Mrs. Goodale looked pained, and wished her husband was present. "He would have known just what to say in such a case," he thought.

Time showed that Mrs. Newcome was quite right in saying that all N—ville was awake with curiosity. Never in her life had poor Mary Lee imagined the possibility of her creating such a sensation. Not a sensation she did create, and not a small one either. The arrival of such a person—a mere girl, with a young infant, and apparently friendless—in an obscure little town like N—ville, was an event unparalleled in the chronicles of the place, and caused more speculation and comment than any event that had occurred since the Rev. Matthew Goodale, a bachelor of forty, went all the way to New York, and returned with a pretty little wife aged nineteen.

Every one knows that the generality of little country towns have some prominent peculiarity—something that distinguishes them from each other, similar as they may be in other respects. Some places are noted for the hospitality of the inhabitants, some for the dissipated habits prevalent, some for intelligence and love of improvement, others the reverse. The peculiar feature distinguishing N—ville was an excessive show of religion. Not another village of its size in the circuit of five hundred miles, contained as many places of worship, as many Sabbath-schools, as many sewing-circles, as many prayer meetings. The number of tracts distributed monthly within the districts of N—ville, was almost beyond belief; and the quantity of fancy work displayed at the different church fairs was really astonishing.

And yet (how shall it be told!) in all the wide Union, a more disagreeable, jealous, prying set of people could scarce be found. Of course there were exceptions—bright exceptions. Earnest, sincere Christians, who practised the charity they professed, and went about making peace and doing good. Of this number was Mrs. Goodale and her husband; of this number was not Mrs. Newcome.

Bent on finding out the history of the new inmate of Briar Cottage, she intruded herself at all hours on the privacy of the "Widow Lee" (for by this name was Mary known), and being of that exceedingly disagreeable class of persons who never take a hint, it was not easy to get rid of her. Vainly for a long time did she seek to discover the stranger's religious belief—the care of the little infant preventing the mother from leaving her home on the Sabbath, and Mrs. Newcome's offer to let one of her girls take charge of the child having been politely declined.

But the mystery was cleared up at last. In reply to a direct question, the widow gave as direct an answer. "She had been brought up in the Established Church, and had never entered a dissenting place of worship in her life." Poor child! she little knew that that speech made her an enemy for life in Mrs. Newcome. Brimful of indignation, she hastened to tell her pastor's wife the discovery she had made, and displayed but little mercy for the "impudent creature—the next thing to a Catholic, you know, my dear—to dare to call me a 'dissenter' to my face."

Had all the inhabitants of N—ville been like Mrs. Newcome, poor Mary and her infant must have starved. But when it became known that the pale young widow wished for work; that she was in fact actually in want of necessities, there were many who availed themselves of her skill as a seamstress and fancy-worker.

First in this number came Mrs. Goodale, bringing not only work to the lonely inmate of the cottage, but books to amuse her leisure hours, and flowers to add to the beauties of the already pretty dwelling. To penetrate the mystery of her former life, neither the good pastor nor his wife ever attempted, content to know that the present course was one of prudence and uprightness, let the past be what it might. And so for five years Mary was a resident of N—ville.

Skilled in the use of her needle, she managed to make a comfortable provision for herself and little Leila; and as the child grew up in strength and beauty, it became the pet and plaything of all its mother's visitors. Not for her own beauty and sweet disposition was the little girl beloved by her mother, but chiefly because in the features of his child, Mary could trace the miniature likeness of her lost husband. There were the same dark, blue eyes, the same sweet smile—even the clustering brown curls above the child's fair brow added to her likeness to her father. Little wonder was it that when people praised the looks of the little one, tears would dim the mother's eyes.

In the five years that Mary Lee dwelt at N—ville, it must not be supposed that she was free from the attentions of the "marrying men" of the place. On the contrary, visitors of this kind were frequent, and the poor girl had been shocked more than once by an abrupt offer of a "husband and a home." One of the first and most persevering of her suitors was Mr. Paul Newcome, a brother-in-law of the lady we have already mentioned more than once.

Now Mr. Paul Newcome was called one of the most prosperous men in N—ville, and had long been a mark for the young ladies to aim at. Very shrewd and calculating in all his transactions, Mr. Newcome had long declared that "girls now-a-days were not brought up as they were when his mother was young; and that he had no intention of seeing his money squandered by some gay, fine lady-wite." But with all his good resolutions, Mr. Paul Newcome felt no little pride in the knowledge that any of these "gay, fine ladies" would take him, and rejoice at her good fortune.

How then was he disconcerted, when, after mature deliberation, he decided that the "Widow Lee was just the person to suit him," his proposal was met with a cool, almost contemptuous negative. Vexed with himself for giving any one such a triumph over his well-known opinions, his love for the young widow was instantly turned to hatred; and Mary found to her sorrow that he could hate. With the assistance of his sister-in-law (who, having a large family of boys, was exceedingly anxious that he should remain single, and had watched his proceedings with a jealous eye), he succeeded in spreading such reports about Mary's character, as lost her some of the most useful of her patrons.

Just at this time her friend, Mr. Goodale, was taken ill, and by the advice of his physician, resolved to spend the coming winter abroad with his wife. Many of the ladies who had followed the example of the pastor's wife in befriending the widow and her child, now withdrew their liberal patronage, and before Christmas the little cottage became truly the abode of poverty. While there was work to be done, Mary toiled incessantly; but when all was over, and nothing in the future but starvation, her strength gave way, and she could only weep over the little one, who so piteously begged for the food the mother had not means to procure for it.

It was the morning of the New Year, and Mary sat in her little cottage kitchen, holding her child to her bosom, striving to impart some warmth to its benumbed and apparently dying form. She pressed its chilled hands to her lips, and kissed the little blue fingers and the pale lips. It was a sad and mournful sight, but apparently made little impression on the heart of one who had entered unobserved, and was gazing on the scene with a smile of cruel satisfaction.

The visitor was Paul Newcome, and Mary started up in alarm as she met the look he fixed on her. Taking a seat, he coolly desired her to sit down and listen to something he had to communicate. And then came the cruel intelligence that for several months he had been the owner of the cottage; that quite a large sum was now due for rent; and that unless she could at once pay it, the house must be instantly vacated, as he had another tenant ready to come in.

Half an hour previous, Mary had thought her sorrows incapable of increase; now they were brought to a climax, and for several minutes she gazed in speechless horror on the heartless monster who was evidently exulting in her misery. The cries of her little girl at last aroused her, and every thought of self vanished at the remembrance of her darling's sufferings. Throwing herself at the man's feet, she wildly implored his pity for the starving child, beseeching him in the most moving terms not to turn her out into the inclement weather homeless and penniless.

It was now that all the evil in Paul Newcome's nature was displayed. He answered her prayers with mocking, laughed at her appeals for mercy, and taunted her with a repetition of some of the vilest slanders that had been spoken against her. Then the tears were dashed aside, the slight form drawn up to its fullest height, and holding her child close pressed in her arms, Mary turned to leave the dwelling so long her home. Her hand was on the latch; one last look she cast around, one inward prayer she murmured for help, and then turning away for the last time, she found herself almost in the arms of a tall stranger, who was in the act of entering.

"Charles! Charles! God help me, can this be true?" And with a faint moan, she sunk fainting on her husband's breast.

On recovering her senses, Mary found herself on her little couch. Fondly bending over her was the well-known countenance of her husband; while contentedly seated on a stranger's knee, sat little Leila, enjoying the luxuries of a good fire and a New Year's feast. Mary closed her eyes, and silently prayed that it might not all prove a dream.

When strong enough to listen, she was made acquainted with the extraordinary events that had combined to restore her to her husband, and give her back her long-lost father—for such the stranger really was. On his deathbed, the son of Charles's employer in London, had confessed that he alone had contrived the plot against the young man, in revenge for some fancied injuries he had received from him. Instant steps were taken by the father to procure the release of the innocent one who had suffered through his means. And as soon as the necessary forms had been gone through and conveyed to the proper authorities, Charles was set at liberty. With the liberal sum sent to pay his expenses home, the anxious husband immediately took passage for America; and on arriving at New York, inserted numerous advertisements in the papers, in the hopes of their meeting Mary's eye.

For several months these were unavailing; and almost in despair, Charles started on a tour through the different large cities, advertising and offering rewards for the lost one. On board one of the numerous Mississippi steamboats, he was attracted by the name of Lee in the passenger list. The owner of the name was pointed out to him; they became acquainted, listened to each other's history, and Charles discovered his wife's father, while Mr. Lee learned to his joy and surprise, that he was not childless. They returned to New York, and there Charles found a letter from

Mr. Goodale, who had seen the advertisement in the American papers, and instantly written to inform him where Mary could be found.

The rest is known. There was no more sorrow, no more suffering for the "Convert's Wife." With her husband, her father, and her child, she found a happy home in New York. And years after, the sad events of their earlier life were told to their children and grand-children, as an instructive lesson teaching them never to doubt the good providence that orders all things well.

WHAT A WOMAN CAN DO.

As a wife and mother, woman can make the fortune and happiness of her children; and even if she did nothing else, surely this would be sufficient destiny. By her thrift, prudence and tact, she can secure to her partner and herself a competence in old age, no matter how small their beginning, or how adverse a fate occasionally be theirs. By her cheerfulness she can restore her husband's spirits, shaken by the anxieties of business. By her tender care she can often restore him to health, if disease has seized upon his overtasked powers. By her counsel and her love, she can win him from bad company, if temptation in an evil hour has led him astray. By her example, and her precepts, and her sea's insight into character, she can mould her children, however diverse their dispositions, into good men and women. And by leading in all things a true and beautiful life, she can refine, elevate and spiritualize all who come within reach, so that with others of her sex emulating and assisting her, she can do more to regenerate the world than all the statesmen or reformers that ever legislated. She can do as much—alas! perhaps even more—to degrade man, if she chooses to do it.

Who can estimate the evil that woman has the power to do? As a wife, she can ruin her husband by extravagance, folly, or want of affection. She can make a devil and an outcast of a man, who might otherwise have become a good member of society. She can bring bickerings, strife and perpetual discord into what has been a happy home. She can change the innocent babes whom God has entrusted to her charge, into vile men, and even viler women. She can lower even the moral tone of society itself, and thus pollute legislation at the spring head. She can, in fine, become an instrument of evil, instead of an angel of good. Instead of making flowers of truth, purity, beauty and spirituality spring up in her footsteps, till the whole earth smiles with loveliness that is almost celestial, she can transform it to a black and blasted desert, covered with the scorn of all evil passions, and swept by the bitter blasts of everlasting death. This is what a woman can do for the wrong as well as for the right. Is her mission a little one? Has she no "worthy work," as has become the cry of late? Man may have a harder task to perform, a rougher path to travel, but he has none loftier or more influential than woman's.—Woman's Advocate.

A POPULAR ERROR.

One of the most common and fatal mistakes made by ardent friends of education, is the indulgence of unreasonable hopes, and the maintenance of extravagant views as to what they can effect by means of it. It is often supposed that great results can be produced in a single term of twelve or fifteen weeks. Both teacher and committee aim at this rapid mode of manufacture. True education is that which aims at the slow and healthy growth of the mind; the incorporation into it of principles, and the formation of tastes and habits, the full value of which will appear only after mature years have developed their tendencies. The highest and best parts of education are incapable of exhibition. The show made at the close of a term is well enough to amuse children and their fond parents, but is often like that of newly-dressed pleasure grounds, adorned with trees and shrubs fresh from the nursery, having a show of vitality in the foliage, though as yet drawing no sap from the root. Such frostwork of the school-room is soon dissolved, and generally passes away with the occasion. All attempts at such premature results of education are entirely useless; and yet our system of employing teachers by the term renders it almost necessary for a teacher who is ambitious of distinction, to lay his plans for that kind of superficial culture and mechanical drill which can be produced in a few weeks, and shown off as evidence of marvellous skill.—President Sears.

IS THE SUN INHABITED?

Sir David Brewster makes the following remarks relative to the sun:—"So strong has been the belief that the sun cannot be a habitable world, that a scientific gentleman was pronounced by his medical attendant insane, because he had sent a paper to the Royal Society, in which he maintained that the light of the sun proceeded from a dense and universal aura, which may afford ample light to the inhabitants beneath, and yet be at such a distance aloft as not to be among them; that there may be water and dry land there, hills and dales, ruin and fair weather, and that as the light and the seasons must be eternal, the sun may easily be conceived to be by far the most blissful habitation of the whole system. In less than ten years after this apparently extravagant notion was considered as a proof of insanity, it was maintained by Sir William Herschel as a rational and probable opinion, which might be deducible from his own observations on the structure of the sun."

THE VIOLIN.

Slow and tender melodies—confided too often now-a-days to wind instruments—are, nevertheless, never better rendered than by a mass of violins. Nothing can equal the touching sweetness of a score of first strings made to sing by twenty well-skilled bows. That is, in fact, the true female voice of the orchestra—a voice at once passionate and chaste, heart-rending, yet soft, which can weep, sigh and lament, chant, pray and muse, or burst forth into joyous accents, as none other can do. An imperceptible movement of the arm, an almost unconscious sentiment on the part of him who experiences it, producing scarcely any apparent effect when executed by a single violin, shall, when multiplied by a number of them in unison, give forth enchanting gradation, irresistible impulse, and accents which penetrate to the very heart's core.—Burling.

THE AFFECTIONS.

O, man, fear not for thy affections, and feel no dread lest time should efface them! There is neither to-day nor yesterday in the powerful echoes of memory—there is only always. He who no longer feels, has never felt. There are two memories—the memory of the senses, which wears out with the senses, and in which perishable things decay; and the memory of the soul, for which time does not exist, and which lives over at the same instant every moment of its past and present existence. Fear not, ye who love. Time has power over hours, none over the soul.—Lamartine.

SISTER EMMA.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

Five years ago the sunshine swept
The upturned sod for Emma's grave;
We laid her where her brother slept
The quiet sleep death's coming gave.

Five years ago, and yet it seems
We laid her there but yesterday,
We see her image still in dreams,
Too beautiful to be of clay.

Five years ago! a lustrum told
Since, 'neath September's golden glow
We laid beneath the charnel mold
All that was left of her below.

Her white hands crossed on whiter breast,
A seal upon her baby lips,
And on her eyelids, closely pressed,
Lay the sad sign of time's eclipse.

Sweet sister Emma, loved and lost!
For her on earth the seasons rolled
But one short round adown time's coast,
And then—the lamb was in the fold.

Beyond the changing scenes of earth,
Beyond its care, its toil, its pain,
In raiment meet for angel birth,
She mingles with the angel train.

And when September's sore leaves stir,
We count the seasons that have rolled,
Since we upturned the sod for her,
And laid her form in charnel mold.

THE LUNATIC.

BY ESTHER BERNE.

"CONFOUNDEDLY warm," said my uncle for the fifth time, as he inspected the thermometer, the mercury of which stood at an incredible height even in the shade.

The thermometer gave no sort of satisfaction, and Uncle Ned came back and threw himself upon a sofa, with the muttered exclamation: "I wish I was in Greenland."

I was busily engaged arranging some flowers in the vases, thinking what a very quiet, harmless sort of life I had lived. Thus summer and winter, year after year, the same rooms, and the same objects in them to greet my eyes. Not a single strange or marvellous thing had ever happened to me, out of which my imagination could weave a romance. I had just come to the conclusion that I was quite an auromantic person, when my uncle's remark reached my ears.

"Fanny," said my uncle, after a long pause, "what a pattern housekeeper I possess—so careful, so cheerful, and so young."

"Young, uncle? Thirty-three last November, Uncle Ned," said I, in a cheerful voice.

"Well, well, Fanny, thirty-three isn't so terribly old. I shouldn't take you to be more than twenty-five. It's your cheerful heart, Fanny, always makes you young."

Uncle Ned's praise was very precious, inasmuch as there were only two who ever found anything to praise in me. But I had neither youth, beauty nor wealth, therefore it was quite natural that the generality of people should quite overlook me.

"Fanny, my dear, you and I will take a journey this summer."

"A journey, uncle?" and visions of numberless household duties rose up in my mind. A journey seemed quite impossible for me.

"Yes, a journey—it will do both you and me good. Now, Fanny, just name over some of the delightful localities that people frequent this season of the year."

"Well, uncle, the White Mountains."

"Too near by half—we will take a longer journey."

"Saratoga."

"Quite an expanded idea, Fanny."

"Cape May, Uncle Ned."

"Quite too fashionable for either you or me, my dear."

"You said you wished you were in Greenland just now, supposing, I think, we go there."

"I think we should wish ourselves back again. No—I have been thinking of a quiet little village amongst the Alleghanies, where I once passed a week or two. Though it was so long ago, yet I have a very fresh remembrance of its lovely mountain scenery, and its invigorating breezes. What say you, Fanny, to taking up our abode there for a month or two, and fancying ourselves in some paradise?"

"I should like it above all things—but—"

"No buts. Are you agreed, Fanny?"

"Yes," I cried.

And forgetting all my household duties—the preserves that would be left undone, the garments that would be left unsewed, and the flowers that would be left untended—I, a maiden lady of thirty-three, jumped up and walked around the room. Overwent my work-basket and away went spools, thimble, etc., on exploring expeditions to different parts of the room. I would have drawn Uncle Ned into the scrape, but he had escaped.

Left alone, I soon sobered down, and as I gathered up the stray articles from the floor, I read myself a severe moral lecture for the breach of decorum I had just been guilty of. But then, on the other hand, the idea of a journey was so delightful to me, who never remembered going more than twenty miles from home, and to whom every object about was as familiar as household words.

Uncle Ned, when he had decided upon anything, was very impatient to set about it. Consequently, I had but just one week to get ready—an awful task for me, but one which I succeeded in accomplishing.

On the evening before our departure, I paid a visit to the attic, and rescued from the dust that surrounded it, a portrait, representing a young man in the first flush and pride of life. Long I sat with the portrait before me, while the twilight faded into starlight. It was strange that the only cause of unhappiness I had was connected with the original of that picture, who had been and was still to me like a younger brother. Uncle Ned had but one son, Nathaniel, a fine, generous, manly fellow, in spite of his many faults. I was eight years his senior, but we had grown up together as brother and sister in our pleasant home.

In time, Nathaniel went to college, and I was left to bear all my burdens alone. Rumors reached us occasionally of my cousin's progress in his studies; and then other rumors of his wild, reckless behaviour. These last became alarmingly frequent, and finally, to my extreme sorrow and my uncle's anger, the news reached us that Nathaniel had been expelled from college. Indeed, my cousin informed us of it himself, in a long, penitent letter—for come home at this time he could not and would not. But my uncle never could forgive the seeming disgrace his son had brought upon the family; and the affair being exaggerated by officious friends, Uncle Ned was induced to write some angry letters, to which the son returned no answer. Exasperated by this unpardonable offence, my uncle declared that he would no longer acknowledge his son until he should have atoned in some way for the disgrace he had brought on all connected with him.

Nathaniel, high spirited as his father, sought for no softening of the decree that had gone out against him, but breaking up all his associations, went away, no one knew where. For five years I had heard nothing of him; for my uncle had forbidden me even to speak or write to him, and owing him the love and obedience of a child, I dared not disobey, even if I had had any knowledge of Nathaniel's movements.

One name never was spoken in our house, and in order to remove everything that made a disagreeable impression, even the portrait in the front entry was removed to the garret. My heart swelled with indignation at this desecration of something sacred to me. If ever I was disposed to set up my will in opposition to my uncle's it was then. But I resisted the temptation, and consoled myself by the thought that I could look at the portrait when I pleased, without risking a reproof for so doing.

To say that I believed all the rumors that reached us concerning Nathaniel while at college, would be saying what was not true. That he had been guilty of some errors, the very result of his frank, trusting disposition, I could readily believe, but that he had done anything to warrant the punishment that had been bestowed upon him, was a thought I could not and would not entertain for a moment.

That Nathaniel, whom I loved as a younger brother, and who was the only other one besides my uncle who had ever found anything to praise in me, should become reconciled to his father, was my earnest wish. But this reconciliation seemed almost hopeless, as both father and son were too much alike, each too proud and unbending to seek the other. It could be only under peculiar circumstances that such a thing could be effected.

As I sat that night in the moonlight, something of a hope seemed to grow out of our little journey. What might it not bring forth? What had many a journey brought forth.

I had no thought when I closed the attic door after me, that I was leaving the portrait to its undisturbed slumbers for many and many a month. Yet so it was. The dust was deep upon it, and the spiders had woven many a web over its surface before I looked at it again.

We had set off upon our journey, and in due time arrived at the termination. Shall I ever forget the sensations that crowded upon me as I found myself really revelling amidst that glorious mountain scenery? How almost with awe its wildness and sublimity impressed me. How the gorgeousness of these everlasting hills made me think myself almost in paradise.

Many and many a time since I have dreamed it all over again. The long, lonely rambles that I took, scrambling through the thick brushwoods and jumping from one rough place to another, brought back my lost youth. Uncle Ned declared that I was quite rosy when I returned from these excursions.

The lights and shadows, the ever-varying aspect of the mountains, I watched with an interest that grew every day more intense. It seemed to me as if I had but just awakened to something inexpressibly beautiful—something that brought by sympathy, all the fine and more beautiful chords of my life into action. If I had been a writer, I might have been inspired to write volumes to startle the world, or an artist, I might have sketched gloriously from nature. As it was, I only learned how life was in its best and truest sense.

Uncle Ned, from the moment of our arrival, had been seemingly perfectly happy, for he had escaped the intense heat, which he abominated. The dog star might rage, but what cared we, perched among the mountains enjoying a cool breeze and lovely scenery?

There were not many strangers in the place, and two only whom we came in immediate contact with. These were a Mr. and Miss Butler—brother and sister. The former was a very gentlemanly, agreeable person, whom my uncle liked particularly; and the two were almost always companions in their various excursions. Miss Butler, though young and strangely beautiful, always repelled me. Cold and taciturn, we had no sympathy in common. Occasionally, however, there were gleams of a terribly assionate temper, very inconsistent with her usually calm demeanor. As it was, though inmates of the same house, we associated very little, and I preferred taking my rambles alone, to Miss Butler's cold companionship.

The days went on, and with each one I expected to hear the word "homeward," a word which would force me to break up many associations, inexpressibly dear to me. But still Uncle Ned, with all the eagerness and enthusiasm of a young man, planned excursions with Mr. Butler, with the seeming desire to delay the speaking of that word as long as possible.

The autumn had touched with its breath the green foliage, and there slowly came into view gorgeous tints, which deepened and multiplied every day. A soft, gray mist hung over the mountains, and the days became deliciously cool, almost too cool for one who did not like cold weather.

One afternoon a small, sealed note was handed me, which I opened carelessly, with the dim impression that it was from some one at home, to say, perhaps, that the preserves were entirely spoiled, or that the cow had got into the garden and eaten up all my flowers, or some other abominable thing. But the first word I read showed me that no one at home had written it. It ran thus:

"MY DEAREST FANNY,—I came here a short time ago, and to my great astonishment, accidentally learned that you and my father were staying here. I must see you and talk to you. Would it be asking too much of my dear sister, for you really and truly were a sister to me, to meet me at the ledge this evening at twilight? Any nearer place of meeting would risk much for both. I shall hope to see you, for I have much to say."

NATHANIEL.

How I longed for that day to close and the twilight to come! In the meanwhile, I busied myself in thinking how my cousin would look—whether five years had changed him much, and whether he had travelled much during those years.

I could scarcely realize now that he was so near me, and that I should really see him and talk to him. Even through me might be effected the long-desired reconciliation.

The shadows grew longer and deeper, the sun finally sank to rest, and in the short gray twilight I ran hastily forth, and turned in the direction of the ledge. It seemed to me, as I left the house, that some one followed me cautiously; but I could see no one, and the twilight was already moving fast. I knew that my uncle and Mr. Butler had not yet returned from an expedition to a place at some distance, and consequently there was no one in the house but its regular inmates, including Miss Butler, therefore my first fear seemed ridiculous, and I hurried on to the place of meeting.

The ledge was well known to me, for I had often visited it. It was a steep mass of rocks, at the foot of which dashed a swollen stream. It made one quite dizzy to look over the edge at the jagged rocks and the dark waters beneath. Those who had looked once hardly wished to look again.

As I sped on towards the appointed place, a fear once more came into my mind that some one was following me. The crackling of dried leaves came distinctly to my ears, and I thought I could almost hear the stealthy footfall of some one even moving in the same direction as myself.

On, on I went, faster than ever, for the step behind became swifter and less cautious. To reach the ledge now was my only thought. To increase my agony, the idea came into my mind that Nathaniel might not be there—but hope whispered that he would. How the leaves crackled behind me as I ran on; but I was nearing the ledge rapidly.

Suddenly a swift, rustling motion immediately behind me made me increase my speed. But a grasp like iron upon my shoulder stopped me, and instinctively I turned to confront my unknown pursuer. The flutter of a white dress showed me that it was a woman, and by the faint light I traced the mildly-beautiful features of Miss Butler. She was panting with exertion, but still held me with a grasp of iron, and her eyes glared upon me demoniacally.

I tried to struggle, but the iron hands only tightened. O, if I could only reach the ledge, then I should be safe. For now the horrible fear came over me that I was alone, in the grasp of a mad woman. I had heard of the strength a mad person often possessed, but I had never experienced it before. In spite of my exertions, she held me as easily as she would have held a child. A cold sweat stood upon my forehead, as I thought of Nathaniel, standing calmly by the ledge almost in sight of me, perfectly unconscious of the agony I was undergoing.

The wild, flashing eye gleaming upon me and the hand raised, suggested new thoughts. This woman was bent on my destruction—I knew that—but how did she intend to accomplish it?

Suddenly the blow fell upon me, with a force that crushed me to the earth; it might almost have crushed an ox. I lay upon the ground not wholly unconscious, but yet without the power to speak. I believe my tormentor thought I was dead, for suddenly she stooped and with almost superhuman strength began to drag me over the rough ground in the direction of the ledge. Like lightning the thought rushed through my mind that she was going to throw me over the ledge into the black stream below. I think I made a faint effort to cry out, but I hardly know whether I succeeded, for from that moment I lost all consciousness of my fate.

Long, long afterwards I awoke to life, and found myself lying in a small, pleasant room with the well-remembered faces of those I had left at home, before me.

Was I really at home? The room certainly did not look natural, but then, in an arm-chair by a window sat Nathaniel's old nurse, and Susan, a young girl, who was a favorite of mine, and whom I had often employed to help me at home, was moving stealthily across the room. I tried to think what had happened, but the very effort exhausted me. Suddenly Susan's eyes encountered mine, and with a cry of joy she sprang towards me.

"Susan, have I been sick?" I asked.
 "Yes, Miss Fanny."
 "And how long?"
 "It will be two weeks to-morrow since you were brought here."
 "Hush, hush, my darling," said nurse, suddenly interposing,
 "you mustn't talk any more."
 "But only one word more," I urged; "am I in my old home?"
 "No, Miss Fanny, you are in the same place where you have been staying all summer."

I was silent after this, trying to recall what had happened. Slowly the whole came up before me; it seemed almost like a dream, looking back upon it at such a distance. I could trace it all out, even to the time I had been dragged upon the ground. What had happened afterwards was a mystery to me. But a more torturing problem was, what had become of Nathaniel?

Day after day I looked from my window upon the grand picture spread out before me, and day by day a portion of my lost strength returned. The sight of those faithful sentinels lifting their heads up towards heaven, drew me back to life quicker than anything else would have done.

Uncle Ned never by word or look reverted to the past, and I dared not ask the questions that were uppermost in my mind. The butlers, whom I shuddered to think of, I never saw, neither did any one in the house speak of them. All was mystery.

I was well enough to travel, and the day for our departure was set. And this journey—what had it brought forth? Much pleasure and much disappointment. Yet as I leaned from the carriage as we wound down the hills, and saw the gorgeous masses of clouds that hung over the mountains, and the wild, lovely grandeur of the landscape, I thought how, amid such scenes, a new life had commenced, how, even in my short summer's experience, the beautiful in nature had awakened higher feelings within me.

But all journeys have an end, and so ours had, and in the cool of a lovely September afternoon, we alighted at the door of our long neglected home. I walked up the steps alone, for the others lingered behind. With what regret I thought of Nathaniel, and the reconciliation I might have effected. I was coming back to resume my monotonous life, and the opportunity of doing what I so wished and longed for would never come to me again. I opened the parlor door, and shrunk back, for a stranger stood on the threshold, and yet the features looked familiar.

"Nathaniel, is it possible?" I cried.
 "It is really and truly Nathaniel," said he, smiling.
 "But you are so dark, so changed," I continued.
 "Five years in South America does not improve any one's complexion, Fanny."

Uncle Ned had come in and was shaking hands cordially with his son. He laughed heartily at the wonder depicted upon my face.

"Grows more and more mysterious, doesn't it, Fan?"
 "I cannot understand it," I cried. "But tell me first what happened after—"

"After that mad woman dragged you to the ledge. There you were saved with some difficulty by Nathaniel, who had been long waiting for you."

"And what then, Uncle Ned?"
 "To attend to your safety, he was obliged to encounter me, and the consequence was, that at such a time I could no longer persist in my foolish anger, and was only too glad to acknowledge such a son."

"And I am only too glad to think, Fanny," said Nathaniel, "that the just punishment conferred upon me, did not follow me to the grave."

"And Miss Butler," I said.
 "Was placed in a lunatic asylum by her brother," answered Uncle Ned.

I need not say what a merry party we were that evening, with the lost one in our midst.

THE MASQUERADE.

BY WILTON RICHMOND.

I HAD stopped at the last relay before entering Berlin expressly for the purpose of viewing the town by daylight. It was a useless precaution, for it showed as I never saw it now before. The street was perfectly blinding, and nothing, I am convinced, but the din of the postilion's horn saved us from being overrun a hundred times.

I ordered the coachman to stop at Myndeer Zamoiski's, a restaurant to which I had been recommended, as a comfortable abode for bachelors, where dinner was furnished a la minute, where the napkins were of a respectable whiteness, and the attendants ready and civil. I was deceived, miserably deceived, but as it is not my object to dilate upon the numberless nuisances which at this time abounded in a great inn of a great continental capital, I pass it over. Myndeer's possessed one advantage for which, however I may have felt then, I now feel that I ought to have overlooked all its inconveniences. It was situated on the — Strasse, one of the finest streets in the world. Its chateau, opera, palaces, academy of design and science, college and arsenal, all built of the costliest stone, and of the most elaborate design, its gaiety and animation, its constant glitter of splendid equipages and dazzling uniforms, united in rendering it the most attractive picture that my eyes ever gazed upon, and caused me to remain in the town much longer than I had originally intended.

Of course I had a valet-de-place. What is a stranger in a strange town in a foreign land without one? An excellent lackey he was too, a denizen of the place, and thoroughly initiated in its localities, intrigues and amusements.

It was the time of the carnival, and balls, routs, plays, processions, punch and masquerades were the order of both day and evening. The king and princes of the blood attended some of these amusements, and it was rare indeed that you did not see at least one of the royal family at the opera during the course of the evening. Frequently they all attended and remained through the performance. I was pleased to see it. It endeared the king to the people, and did more to firmly seat him upon his throne, by implanting his image in the breasts of his subjects, than the secluded grandeur of hundreds of riotous private entertainments to the nobility could ever have effected.

I entered the grand opera at ten, just as the prince royal and his wife, with a crowd of starred nobles, were quitting the royal box. They had just finished one of Spontini's grand operas, and the night was to be ended with a masquerade. The pit had been boarded over, and when I entered, the whole immense area was crowded with a grotesque assembly of harlequins, columbines, actors from the recent opera, Cossacks, bears, tumblers, fools, Indians, monkeys, devils and angels. A glorious band was in attendance, discoursing such music as one only hears when among the most musical people in the world. I came for amusement and bade fair to have plenty of it. I had scarcely crossed the threshold, and was obliterating with my handkerchief an involuntary smile, when I was seized and whirled round in a fearful waltz with what to my confused senses seemed a counterpart of Beelzebub. The next moment a bear had me in his clutches, and drove me down in a gallopade with a rush which nearly annihilated my seven senses. As we came down upon the stage, my hirsute partner turned shortly, and letting me go, sent me by the irresistible centrifugal impulse into a side scene, which gave way and deposited me upon the boards, not much hurt and considerably relieved. It was while raised on my arm, gazing leisurely at the tetotum twirlers, that my attention was riveted by a beautiful figure hanging on the arm of a man in a black domino. I was up instantly.

"Strange," said I, "that I should discover the finest shape I ever saw in this incongruous country of sweet music and sourkrout!"

I walked by them; she observed me. As I turned round I saw her speak to her companion, and as I lived, I thought I saw her mouth, which was the only feature of her face visible, smile. Now, though I have since seen enough to convince me that travelers speak too lightly of German manners, I was not then as skeptical, which will account for my proceedings in the sequel, that might otherwise seem strange and inexplicable.

The waltzes and dances were now in their highest twirl; so was my heart at that small waist, and those delicate feet. I kept constantly near the object of my solicitude, constantly looking at her, and constantly blushing very red as I did so. It may have been conceit, but I thought her altered looks assumed the shape and expression of an interrogation point. "Why don't you ask me to dance?" seemed to me the inquiry. The customs of a German ball-room, I thanked heaven, dispensed with a formal presentation, and enabled a bashful stranger to approach the object of his adoration with some confidence. So, making a hasty calculation of the probable result of a personal combat with her father or brother or lover, or whichever he was, accompanying her, I boldly made up to the fascinating mask, and stammered out as elegant a request in German as my knowledge of that language allowed.

With an air of stolid indifference her companion released her to me. I was glad of it, for I disliked trouble, and I knew that in the event of it, the German's phlegm would have the advantage over my mercurial temperament.

As I gazed on the animated countenance of my partner, and whirled her in the dizzy mazes of the waltz, the most romantic fancies filled my imagination. I concocted in my excited brain, the whole plan of an elopement; pictured a lovely cottage on the banks of Maggiore and I believe devoted the rest of my existence to the moon, the muses and a Cremona fiddle, or a guitar. But my heart sunk again as I looked at the smooth and nicely rounded chin, and the lips of my partner, which would have entered the most attic of loaves from the fairest and most fragrant flower in creation. And then the little taper waist upon which my hand lightly rested! I had great misgivings if I could persuade the possessor of all these attractions to go with me; and besides, there was the phlegmatic man in the black domino. It occurred to me that he might object too. But I decided that if she would consent he would have to waive his objections.

My head filled with these poetic imaginations, the waltz was finished much sooner than I wished. I felt that I must relinquish her, and with a sigh I passed her over to the phlegmatic black domino, whom I felt very much like punching in the ribs.

The music stopped and I leaned against a column which supported the first row of boxes, to enjoy the misery of beholding my incognita promenade with the stolid German phantom. Again the band struck up, and the dance was again at its highest. A tall Spaniard, with the fiercest of moustaches, accosted the object of my flame, and in a moment they were impelled past me in a gallopade. Her cheeks were flushed with the exercise, and her eyes darted upon me through the little black vizari, a glance which made me curse the long-legged Spanish monster, and resolve to secure her hand again, come what would.

I kept close to the black domino, well knowing that wherever the Spaniard took her, he was the depot at which they would wind off. She soon appeared, panting and flushed. The German stoic led her to a seat, and a murmuring conversation took place.

"Tis him again!"
 "I know it. I have watched him. You must stay by me the rest of the evening."

And then followed a conversation during which I discovered that, though I had not spoken to a female German, or any female whatever, since I entered Berlin, she knew intimately my every motion and almost every word since I entered town. Curiosity now added fuel to my passion, and with unaffected boldness I approached and again asked her hand for the dance. Her companion set his teeth and tried to retain her arm, but she adroitly slipped her taper fingers through his, and in a moment I was again whirling with her in the dance. As we finished, I walked into a cool recess, and, taking her gloved hand, said:

"How did you know I went to Charlottenburg this morning?"
 "I saw you."

"How knew you I was at the grand chamberlain this afternoon?"
 "I heard you say so."

Whew! thought I, this beats anything in German intrigue that I ever read in poetry or romance.

"Fair incognita, know that since I entered the theatre this evening I have been equally watchful of you. You have not made a motion I have not observed and admired, nor bestowed a favor which has not torn my heart with jealousy. Deign to remove your mask, and allow me to gaze on the face it invidiously conceals."

"No; I cannot."

"At least remove this glove, that I may have the pleasure of holding your hand, and not a couple of ounces of French kid."

The servant brought some loulous, and she was about complying with my request, more from convenience than to gratify me, I thought, when a sharp intonation surprised us both, and turning round, I saw the horrible German ogre just raising his hand from giving my companion a little blow upon the shoulder. In an instant the glove was on, and I was alone before I could realize it.

I was not much disheartened by this sudden manoeuvre, but resolved that when she was again under my wing I would take her to the supper room, when I flattered myself she would be under the necessity of removing her mask in partaking of some refreshment. So I watched the opportunity, and pounced upon my quarry while the pipe-smoking German was absorbed in a metaphysical discussion, I supposed, with a confre. She ate supper with a degree of modesty and naivete which captivated me; tasted a little Rhine wine, and took ice, but did nothing to gratify my curiosity but lift the smallest possible portion of the little crape veil which fell from the nose of the mask, disclosing merely the mouth and upper lip. Nothing I could do would induce her to expose her face. I almost felt as if under the direction of Ovid, who recommends tearing the bracelet from the lady's arm, and was almost impelled to seize the envious mask. I restrained myself though, and in spite of all anxieties danced with my unknown partner till two o'clock in the morning.

At this hour we were confronted by the black-dominoed German, who suggested that it was time to retire homewards. The domino went for his carriage. The coachman, in turning, had run against a lamp-post and smashed a wheel.

"I should be only too happy," I said, "to give them the use of mine."

They protested. I insisted, and carried the day, assuring them that it was but a few steps to my lodgings and I could walk.

With a heart palpitating with all the emotions excited by the evening's adventures, I conducted the beautiful and blushing fair one to my own carriage, saw her enter, and gave her hand a sentimental squeeze. The domino followed; the carriage door closed on my hopes, and they were off. With a heavy heart I walked towards Myndeer Zamoiski's, reached it, and saw my carriage at the door. I was surprised, for I had been told that my recent flame lived on the Lindau. I ran up to my room and was confronted by the black domino. The scene was fast drawing to a close. I asked him what he meant by the intrusion, when taking off his mask, I discovered my lackey-de-place, who humbly asked me if I had any further use for the horses. I had been making love all night to the pretty filled-de-chambre of Myndeer Zamoiski. I had walked home at two o'clock in the morning in the cold wind and snow, to accommodate my valet-de-place and his flame with a ride. The mention of a masquerade ever after threw me into fits.

HON. HANNIBAL HAMLIN, GOVERNOR OF MAINE.

We present herewith a portrait of Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, elected governor of the State of Maine, Sept. 8th, 1856. It was drawn for us by Mr. Charles Barry, from a photograph by Burnham Brothers, of Bangor, Me., and may be regarded as a reliable likeness. Hannibal Hamlin was born in the town of Paris, in the county of Oxford, in the State of Maine, in 1810, and is in the full vigor and prime of life, being forty-six years of age. His father, Doct. Cyrus Hamlin, was the son of Capt. Eleazar Hamlin, of Massachusetts, who commanded a company of infantry in the Massachusetts line during the whole war of the Revolution. His mother was Anna Livermore, the daughter of Deacon Elijah Livermore, the proprietor and first settler of the town of Livermore, removing thence from the town of Waltham, in Massachusetts, in the year 1774. Hannibal Hamlin, in 1832, settled in the town of Hampden, about five miles from the city of Bangor, and commenced the practice of law. In a few years he was elected a Representative to the Legislature by the Democratic party, and was subsequently re-elected four times. He was twice elected speaker, and discharged the duties of that office with ability. In 1842 he was elected a Representative to Congress, and was subsequently re-elected. In 1847 he was elected to the United States Senate to fill a vacancy, and in 1850 he was elected for a full term, which expires March 4, 1857. As chairman of the important Committee on Commerce, he has discharged the responsible duties of his station acceptably. At the Republican convention held in Portland, Maine, July last, Mr. Hamlin received an unanimous nomination for governor of the State. He accepted the nomination, resigned his office as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and in a speech, declined acting any further with the Democratic party, and avowed himself in favor of the Republican party. Prior to the election in Maine, upon the 8th of September, Mr. Hamlin thoroughly canvassed the State, passing through the seaboard region from Kittery to Calais, and speaking to large mass meetings in all the principal towns. He then went northward to the Valley of the Anroostook, then west across the whole northern part of the State to Fryeburg on the New Hampshire line. He thence came to Bangor through the central part of the State, addressing his fellow-citizens in all the principal towns upon the route. The result of the election was as follows: Hamlin, 69,471; Wells (the incumbent) 44,967; Patten, 6668.

A WARNING.

A few weeks since, in the course of conversation with an eminent broker, who has been over forty years acquainted with the leading moneyed men of the country, we asked if he ever knew a schemer, who acquired money or position by fraud, continue successful through life, and leave a fortune at death? We walked together about three minutes in silence, when he replied: "Not one! I have seen men," he said, "become rich as if by magic, and afterwards reach a high position in public estimation, not only for honor and enterprise, but even for piety, when some small circumstance, of no apparent importance, has led to investigations which resulted in disgrace and ruin. Afterwards we again conversed with him upon the same subject, and he stated that since our last interview he had extended his inquiries among a large circle of acquaintances, and with one solitary exception, and that doubtful, their experience was to the same effect as his own. He then gave a brief outline of several small and big schemers and their tools, their rise and fall. Suicide, murder, arson and perjury were common crimes with many of those who made "haste to be rich," regardless of the means; and there are not a few, who may be seen on 'change every day, ignorantly striving for their own destruction. He concluded that fortunes acquired without honesty generally overwhelmed their possessors with infamy.—Boston Atlas.

REGATTA ON THE THAMES.

The accompanying picture represents one of those exciting scenes in which the good people of London take especial delight, viz., a regatta. In the middle distance, in front of two elegant bridges spanning the Thames, are seen the long, low race-boats, shooting like arrows over the water, the oarsmen straining every nerve to win the goal that lies before them. The pier on the right is crowded with spectators; so is the flag-barge that lies beside it, and the steamer with the union jack hoisted at her bow. Just without the race-track is a perfect fleet of wherries, the occupants of which are lustily cheering the competitors. In the foreground is a characteristic group—watermen, ladies and gentlemen, children, fruit vendors and equestrians. We can appreciate the excitement of the multitude, for boat-races are no novelty among us, aquatic sports being a legitimate inheritance from our transatlantic ancestors. The annual regatta of our Fourth of July celebrations has come to be one of the most interesting features of the day. At New York, the races at Hoboken always attract an immense multitude. Rowing is one of the healthiest and most exhilarating of athletic sports, and the speed with which a light boat may be driven through the water is truly surprising. No less so is the length of time which constant training enables oarsmen to hold out. A whale boat's crew will pull for several hours without becoming exhausted.

THE OLD TALE EVER NEW.

Says an old song, "O Love has been a villain, since the days of Troy and Helen, when he caused the death of Paris, and of many, many more." And the truth of the quaint, plaintive old verse is verified every day. It is true, the villainies of Love seldom come out very romantically in these days of "crown's quest," and judicial inquiries at the Pig and Whistle; but it is possible to read a romance of love in the report even of a crown's quest: and here is one: On Saturday evening last (we stick to the original report—the reader must find the romance for himself), Mr. G. T. Brent, the deputy-coroner, held an inquiry at the "New Crown Inn," St. Paul's Terrace, Ball's Pond, Islington, into the circumstances connected with the suicide of a very fine young woman, named Ellen Louise Felstead, aged twenty-one, the daughter of a gun implement maker, residing at 12 Holton Street, Lower Road, whose body had been found on the previous day, in the New River, at a short distance from where the inquest was held. It appeared from the evidence of Mrs. Donaldson and the deceased's father, that for some time past she had been keeping company with a young man named Parrott; and on the evening of Monday last she called at Mrs. Donaldson's, about nine o'clock, in company with Parrott. The latter had an angry altercation with her about visiting at the above house, after which they went away, but not together. The deceased called again at half-past eleven, and inquired if Parrott had called and asked about her, and on being answered in the negative she became greatly excited, saying he would never see her again, and that he had sworn at her, and she could not bear such an insult—she could not live to be so addressed by him. She then went away, and witness saw no more of her alive. Mr. Felstead, her father, stated that she had an altercation with Parrott at her own house, between nine and eleven o'clock, after leaving Mrs. Donaldson's. She said to her lover, "You ridicule and satirise the family when we are together, and I cannot bear it." After that she went up stairs to her room, and divested herself of her bracelets, combs, etc., and when the family retired to rest, slipped quietly out of the house, and was never after seen alive. Mr. Rogers, a medical gentleman, residing next door, informed the jury of her high-spirited disposition, and how deeply she would suffer under anything that she construed into an insult. She was a young woman of a very superior cast of mind. The jury, after remarking on the melancholy nature of the case, returned a verdict in accordance with the testimony of the witnesses.—On the morning of this same Saturday, a man also killed himself, not from love and pride, but from love and poverty. His widow, Mary Bradley, came forward at the inquest and said that they had only been married three weeks. She was a servant at the Dover Castle Tavern, and the deceased had paid his addresses to her for nearly five years, but from his poverty their marriage had from time to time been postponed. They afterwards, however, agreed that they should be united, and live apart for a few months until the deceased could procure a little money to buy a few articles of furniture. He was then thrown out of employment, and he became very desponding, and several times said if he could not procure her a home he should be unable to live. Poverty still holding him fast, he took a large quantity of laudanum, and so put an end to his existence.—At the Morgue, in Paris, lately was deposited the body of a young married woman who had been afflicted with a disease of the skin, for which she had tried all remedies in vain; life became burdensome because she fancied her husband could not love her on account of the malady. One day the husband scolded her slightly for not having got his dinner ready in time; she seemed much affected, and after warmly caressing a lap-dog, she approached to kiss him, but he turned from her. Greatly agitated, she left the room, and went straight to the bridge of Grenelle and threw herself into the Seine.—London Illustrated News.

STENA KILL.

Respectfully inscribed to "JENNIE KABLE."

BY "OATY HUMBOLDT."

I love the songs of quiet streams,
Just floating in the dusk that seems Between this and the land of dreams.

—What time the world grows hushed and still,
Till the sad moon looks o'er the hill,
And listens to the whippoorwill.

—What time the swallow's drowsy wing
Falls downward dim and darkening,
Till lost like an imagining.

—What time the very leaves seem grown
Upon the breathless air alone,
Upon the stirless ether strown:

Till the sad shades of night sweep down,
From Adirondack's bosky throne,
And the winds rouse them with a moan.

And yet this glorious autumn eve,
What is it makes all nature grieve,
But dreaming dreams of Genevieve?

And yet there is a soul should light
This gloomy, mourning autumn night
Into a day divinely bright.

And yet, could those deep-beaming eyes
Greet mine—with what a glad surprise,
As a freed seraph's, paradise!

Yet could I sit upon this shore
(As we did on one night before),
Till the stars bent the treetops o'er—

Till the mad-hustling world grew still,
And the bright moon rose o'er the hill,
To listen to the whippoorwill—

Till weary sleep should fold her wing,
And the drowsed bird forget to sing,
And naught be heard but whispering

Of the deep waves, as on they rove,
Of the light houghs in heaven above,
And of those lips of "her I love,"

And could—but well-a-day! alone
Must my path henceforth lengthen on,
Till the last dreary day—is done!

SIXES AND SEVENS:

—OR,—

HOW TO HAVE A PLEASANT HUSBAND.

BY JOHN THORNHERRY.

SOME ladies are blest with fault-finding lords. Mrs. Lemon was one of that unhappy class. If her husband came in too late or too soon for dinner, or supper, if he heard the baby cry, if the room was too hot, or his shaving-water too cold, or everything did not go exactly right and just to suit him, he was up in arms about it forthwith, and there was no peace till his particular whims and wishes were gratified.

Without meaning to be uncomfortable himself, or without even knowing that he was so, Mr. Lemon brought unhappiness to a circle where he certainly desired to confer nothing but comfort and delight. There are a plenty of such men, though they are too blind, some of them, to see it in themselves. It is a most lamentable fault to fall into, and no doubt many of my fair friends will thank me for telling them how Mrs. Lemon managed to cure her husband of it. In order to understand the modus operandi the better, it will be as well to deal out the matter in the form and spirit of a narrative.

So Mr. Lemon comes home to supper, and begins to fret round because his slippers are out of place, and the fire in the grate has got low, and the carpet is littered over with the baby's playthings. When he left his office for home, it is not to be denied that he was in the best of spirits, and pledged to himself to dispense sunshine all around him as soon as he got where his wife was.

Mrs. Lemon comes into the room, on hearing the outer door shut, and smiles to see him returned from his day's labor.

"Are you in a hurry for tea?" she asks. "Because if you are, I will have it got ready at once."

He gives a sneer, and says something in a low voice about "tea's never being ready when he is ready."

Fortwith his wife cheerfully turns about and orders tea without delay.

On the table were toast, tea and cake. They ate dinner rather late, and the meal was a very hearty one of boiled salmon. Mr. L. uncovers the toast, lifts a slice or two daintily with the spoon, and declares it is done too much; when will she learn not to burn her toast up so?

"I don't know," says she; "perhaps that top piece may be done a little too much. Give it to me, my dear, and do you help yourself from the bottom of the dish."

"No, I'll eat it, now I've begun with it," is his reply. "I'll trust to luck for a better piece next time."

So that branch of the subject is settled. Presently he begins to sip his tea.

"Did you put sugar in my tea?" says he.

"Yes," she replies, pleasantly. "But here is more, if you wish," passing him the bowl.

"No; no matter now. What flat-tasted stuff it is, though! I'd as lief drink dish-water. Latterly, I don't seem to get a cup of tea that's worth a cent. I wonder why we can't have as good tea as other people."

Now his wife really took extra pains with the tea that night, and for her own part thought it was the best she had drank in a long time. She could therefore say but little in answer to his complaint, though she wanted to say enough to silence it forever.

Next morning at breakfast it was just the same. As soon as he came down, the fit of fretting seized him.

"This breakfast is stone cold!" said he.

"Margaret has just taken it from the fire," said Mrs. L.

"What's the matter with that baby? I can't stand that. You must carry it out of the room, or I must go myself!"

So the bell is rung, and Margaret is told to take care of the baby till breakfast is over.

"You used to have good coffee," said he, after sipping a little from his cup. "Why can't we have as good now? I declare, it's downright insipid! It's worse than no coffee at all!"

And he reached the water-pitcher to pour himself a glass of water.

First it was the potatoes, after this experiment at fault-finding; and then it was the ham. The eggs were either underdone or overdone. The toast was burned up again. There never was a colder morning, and that was just the kind of a morning to have a cold room to eat breakfast in. And so on till he finished a decidedly hearty breakfast, and got up to go out to his business.

For dinner, he sent home a roasting piece of beef. When he came back to eat it, however, he began to carve it, and at once declared it was as raw as it ever was in the world. It wasn't fit for anybody to eat. Mrs. Lemon expostulated. He always had preferred rare beef,—very rare beef; and she was sure that this was as much done as any she had ever cooked for him. But that was to no purpose. The beef was not right anyway. And the potatoes were "soggy" and heavy. And the other vegetables were not half cooked. Even the water was warm, winter as it was at the time. And to wind up the performance,—what was the matter with that baby?

This was the enjoyment pertaining to the dinner hour. Mrs. Lemon came to the conclusion, after her husband had gone out, that she could not bear with it any longer. She must either subdue this fell spirit of unhappiness and discomfort, or it would subdue her. She took the afternoon to think it all over, and at night installed a new order of things.

When Mr. Lemon first put foot in the house at night, he was met with the heavy brow of his wife.

"O, dear!" said she, beating her husband all out of sight with her fretful manner, "I do believe I shall go raving distracted! I'm almost worn out already! This child, and this housekeeping business, and this one thing and another will certainly finish me! And what I'm to do, I don't know! I don't much care!"

Having arranged his own countenance for a diatribe of fretting of much the same character, Mr. L. was set back not a little at finding that his thunder was thus suddenly stolen away from him. The shock of astonishment had the effect to momentarily silence his complaints. He looked at her face, and wondered what in the world had come over her. And he wondered, and wondered, all in vain.

As soon as they sat down to the supper table, she began the business in good earnest. He would have liked to begin first; but she was careful to dip in her oar before him.

"I tell you one thing, Mr. Lemon," said she; "I've done drinking tea, such as this is. If you can't get better stuff for the table, you must drink it yourself, for I won't!"

So he had nothing left him to complain of on the score of the tea. He might have been about to begin upon the toast, as usual, when she struck in before him again.

"Just the daubiest, clammiest, flattest, wretchedest toast I ever did eat!" said she, throwing down her knife and fork. "I wish, Mr. Lemon, we could have a girl that could cook well enough to earn fair wages. I'm sure, I don't see why I must have saddled off upon me such kind of help as I'm obliged to put up with! I've got tired of it, thoroughly! For my part, I'm for breaking up housekeeping altogether, and going out to board. I've been thinking how much easier 'twould be—and I've pretty much come to the conclusion that I won't try to keep house any longer!"

Mr. Lemon offered some very tame sort of a reply, the whole of which conveyed no other meaning than that he was completely "dumbfounded."

The baby happened to grow restless.

"I declare," said she, with one of the direct expressions of countenance conceivable, "that child is enough to worry the life out of me! I wish you had it to take care of; I guess you'd know how to pity me! Sometimes I wish that children were—I won't say where!"

Mr. Lemon grew more astonished still. Never before had he heard her say a syllable in this spirit about her baby. Something was certainly the matter. He looked up at her; she seemed never more in earnest than then. He looked down upon the table; and she went on in just the same strain for several minutes. And so she kept it up. Next morning, she was the veriest scold at the table it is possible to imagine.

"What coffee! O, what coffee!" she exclaimed, as soon as she commenced drawing it from the urn. "You must either get me another girl, or I shall give up; for as for going on in this way, I can't and won't!"

Her husband ventured—wonderful thing for him, that it was! to say that he thought the coffee was as good as it ever was, or ever would be. But she flew at the subject with increased fury, and pell-melled at him till he was thoroughly tired of it. She carried her point, and he was glad to beat a hasty retreat.

"Just see that steak now!" she exclaimed. "Was there ever a woman tried as I am? All browned and wiggled up! If I want a thing rare, I'm sure to get it overdone. And that's just the way it is! I'm worried to death in this way!"

"But," cried Mr. L., blandly enough for him, "what is the trouble with the steak? I think it's good enough. The greatest fault I have to find with my meat is, that it's always so rare! I never can eat it!"

(Now wasn't that a whopper?)

"No, you needn't pass me the bread," she went on. "Raised bread I sometimes like; but dough, absolute dough—I'll not put up with it!"

It was hard to sait her. Mr. L. studied her face by stolen glances; but he was able to discover nothing that indicated a disposition to trifle with the subject. She seemed to be terribly in earnest. At dinner she was worse than ever. They had fish on the table. Her husband helped her to some, which he did with a grace that really charmed her.

"O, this abominable fish!" said she, tasting the first forkfull. "I used to like fish; but I don't now, I must confess. Smoked, and soaked, and parboiled, and spoiled! I'd made up my mouth for a beautiful dinner; but just look at it!"

"My dear," asked Mr. Lemon, quite cowed by this time, "what is the matter with the fish? I see no fault in it. It is a good fish, and it has been well cooked. Don't let us complain too much."

"It isn't half done," said she. "I might have expected as much. I'd as soon eat one right out of the river!"

"Where is Lizzie?" asked her husband, wishing to direct attention from this subject to the base.

"Asleep, I hope! Don't for mercy's sake wake her up! She's the plague of my life now; and I ain't certain at all that she won't finish me! If she'll sleep, let her sleep, for conscience sake! For my part, I've had enough of her!"

Mr. Lemon left his dinner table a more thoughtful man than he had been in a long while. He was pledged to himself to find out what the trouble was so suddenly.

When he came home to supper, it was just the same. In the evening, he went out; for he was fairly driven out by his wife's fretfulness. She almost trembled when she thought that she was driving him to this step, yet she sustained her courage all the way through with hope.

And so she carried on for about a week. By the end of that time her husband had forgotten all his old complaints, and appeared to be a changed man throughout. He could sit down to the table and eat as hearty a meal as anybody, and without grumbling, either. This was a victory for his wife, although she still kept up her new device.

One night, when he seemed more quiet and genial than ever, she set up a furious onslaught upon the cheese. He declared to himself he had never heard her go on so. First he looked at her, and then at the cheese; and then he tasted of the cheese. And finally he looked at her again. And next came an explosion.

He laughed out as loud as he could!

"This is too bad, Eliza," said he; "but it was good enough for me. I have deserved it all. Now let us stop right where we are, and agree to have no more of it. I confess you have cured me. I can see now for myself how terrible my habit of fretting had got to be; but you shall not suffer any more in consequence of it. I pledge my honor to that!"

He passed round the table and kissed her. The tears gushed from her eyes.

Both wept anew; but the tears were welcome tears of joy. The poor wife felt that she had fairly won her husband over again.

And from that day forward there never was a house where peace presided, and happiness dwelt, with a better prospect of permanence, than in the dwelling of Mr. Nathaniel Lemon, merchant.

NOAH'S TOMB.

A mosque has risen up over the grave of the great patriarch. I do not remember the exact measurement of the tomb; but if this is his sepulchre, Noah must have been a very tall man, for it certainly seemed to me, at a random guess, to be about a hundred feet in length. The old man who showed it to us, told me that this was his length as far as the knees, the rest being bent downwards. Over the grave is a green cloth, the favorite color of the Mahometans, and it is visited not only by Moslems, but also by Christians.—Wortabel's Syria and the Syrians.

EDITORIAL MELANGE.

There are 4382 hood-organs ground in the streets of New York city daily. — A gentleman of New York, who came out the other day in the steamship Persia, and whose word is reliable, saw in Paris, in the middle of August, tomatoes selling at five francs each, and apricots three francs—owing to the cold wet summer, it having rained near two months. — President Pierce intends to take up his residence in Portsmouth, N. H., after the 4th of March next. — The library of four thousand volumes, lately belonging to Professor Lucke, of Germany, and purchased for the use of the Divinity School in Cambridge, chiefly by the generosity of Col. Benjamin Loring, of Boston, has arrived in safety at the institution for which it is designed. It will make a very valuable addition to the means of there pursuing a theological education. — News from Key West reports the markets to be filled with wrecked goods. — The Nebraska City News says that "corn in Nebraska promises a most unprecedented yield. The average crop will be from fifty to eighty bushels to the acre. Strictly temperate men could hardly exist on soil that becomes so uncommonly corned on such slight provocation." — In the Irish language the electric telegraph is called "Sgeul abhata bolta," the literal translation of which is, "News upon stilts." — The Rev. David Moore, D.D., eldest son of the late Bishop Moore, of Virginia, died lately at the rectory of St. Andrew's Church, Staten Island, in the 70th year of his age, and 48th year of his rectorship on the island. Dr. Moore was highly esteemed for his many excellencies, and his loss will be severely felt by his parishioners. — A mother-in-law in an establishment is a rare good servant, but a precious bad mistress. — The San Antonio (Texas) Herald says, that a gentleman residing some thirty miles west of San Antonio, has a "live" wolf, some eight months old, which attends his stock of sheep in the same manner as a shepherd's dog, going out with them in the morning, and returning with them at night. His wolfship was captured when young, and has been trained with the sheep. — Some say that sausages are "dog cheap" in this city. However pleasant the fact may be in a pecuniary sense, the suggestions it calls up are by no means agreeable. — Wm. Arrison, the torpedo murderer at Cincinnati, has been sentenced to the State Prison for ten years. — A butcher, who has just died, and who was a great dog fancier, has left orders to his heir to pay the taxes on a hundred dogs belonging to him, and to devote a part of the revenues of a very fine estate to their support. There's an eccentric and benevolent butcher. — Carefully preserve the fallen leaves of trees, and procure as many as you can; when rotted into mold, the produce is invaluable. — The hotels in New York are crowded. At the Astor House the privilege to sleep in a room with seven others is sold at a high advance; and at the St. Nicholas, one thousand persons hive together. — A creditor of the city of Philadelphia, despairing of being able to get his pay of the treasurer, has attached the furniture of the council chamber. — By a recent collision on the Michigan Southern Railroad, three new locomotives, which were on board one of the trains, were completely smashed to pieces and rendered worthless. — Besides the commerce of the lakes at Chicago, twenty-six trunk railroads and branches bring to it the trade of the interior. — A correspondent writes that Noah Pense, Esq., of Meredith, killed at one shot forty-one pigeons from a flock that alighted upon a stand prepared for the purpose on a wheat stubble.

VARIETIES OF FOOD.

What is there that men will not eat, either from necessity or caprice? Shipwrecked mariners have often made a hearty meal of boat-soop; and mule-steak has often done the hearty pioneers good service. The natives of Tonquin, according to Dampier, give their friends arrack, in which snakes and scorpions have been infused. The Calmuc Tartars also feed on snakes, and the Syrians eat crocodiles. The inhabitants of Cochin-China prefer spoiled eggs to fresh; the Tonquinese enjoy locusts, whether raw, pickled or broiled; the West Indians have a taste for caterpillars, and ants are a luxury in Africa. Mungo Park astounded Sir Walter Scott while walking with him, by running his stick into an ant-hill, and then after it had been covered with insects, drawing it through his lips. He said they tasted like currants! Truly, there is no accounting for taste.

A PROOF-READER.—The most industrious proof-reader we remember, was a lady to whom, at her request, we sent a revise of an article she had written for us. As there were nearly a hundred superfluous commas in it, according to her account, she "sat up all night, and scratched them out with a penknife so neatly that no one could perceive them."

HOOP, HIRNNAU!—The ladies hoops still afford subject matter for small wits to exercise upon. It is now asserted that a cooper of this town has entered into partnership with a milliner, the two branches of trade being identical.

ATTORNEYS AND LAWYERS.—Sterne insinuates that attorneys are to lawyers what apothecaries are to physicians—only that they do not deal in scruples. Some of them are not averse to drachms, however.

THE PRESS.—It was Victor Hugo who called the press "the formidable locomotive of universal thought." Louis Napoleon "looks out for the engine" so sharply in France, that it does not run very well there.

MUSICAL.—"Vestrali the magnificent" has gone off to Mexico with a magnificent troupe of opera singers.

A certain sign-board has the following classical inscription:—"All persons what are found fighting or trespassing on this ground will be executed with the utmost wicker of the law."

The coronation of the emperor of Russia took place at Moscow on the 7th of September. The barbaric gorgeousness of the scene, and of the preparations for the coronation, appear to have dazzled all beholders, and it is said that the cost exceeded $5,000,000.

It appears that nearly all the Western railroads at the present time are overran with freight transportation, and so serious is the inconvenience resulting therefrom, that a general rise in freights, both upon the roads and rivers, is anticipated, or has already taken place.

The French Inundation Committee have collected and remitted to the President of the Central Relief Committee, the sum of 105,515 40 francs—equal to $20,621 72—which has been subscribed in New York for the benefit of the sufferers by the recent inundations in France.

Near Greensboro (S. C.), an entire railroad train ran over a drunken man, lately. He had fallen on the track, and the cow-catcher being sufficiently elevated not to carry him with it, he lay there in safety, to the amazement of the conductor and engineer, who, of course, thought he was cut to pieces.

The New England Society of New York have made arrangements for a course of six lectures, to be delivered by New England orators prior to the next December anniversary. Among the speakers engaged are Hon. George P. Marsh, Hon. George Lunt, Rev. A. L. Stone and Rev. Dr. Osgood.

The officers of Murray's Asylum for the Insane, Scotland, believe that no better medicines for the mind are known than rational occupation, recreation and education; wherefore they are endeavoring to extend and vary the modes of employing, amusing and instructing those who are committed to their care.

A powder-horn was discovered recently on one of the "Hunting Islands," near the mouth of Morgan River, South Carolina, marked "2 Rudolph." It is the only trace ever discovered of the revenue-cutter Hamilton, Captain Rudolph, which was lost off the Charleston (South Carolina) Bar, in 1853, and never heard of.

The yellow Newtown pippin is the most popular apple in the English market. It frequently sells there for $16 per barrel; and packed and prepared for export, commands $6 to $8 per barrel in New York. This apple, we believe, is raised nowhere in perfection, except on Long Island and the banks of the Hudson River.

The Detroit Daily Advertiser, of October 24, says:—"A company of six hundred men, women and children started from Tabor, Iowa, lately, for Kansas. They are farmers and mechanics, who go to make Kansas their permanent home. Two hundred men from Western Iowa volunteered to conduct them into the interior."

The Jacksonville (Fla.) Republican says so severe a frost as early as the 24th of September, has not been experienced in that section for twenty years, and considerable damage must have been inflicted on the cotton and other crops. In the vicinity of Brunswick, Missouri, it is said that at least one-half of the tobacco crop has been destroyed by the frost.

The boring of Hoosac Mountain has gone in over 300 feet, and is still in progress at an average of 4 1/2 feet a day. Fresh air is pumped into the hole through a long box by horse power, and soon clears the end after a blast. On the strength of these demonstrative experiments, it is the purpose of the parties interested to make another appeal to the legislature for more State aid.

Among the visitors at the late Fair of the Essex Agricultural Society, at Newburyport, Mass., was an aged lady from Cavendish, Vt., 81 years of age, who moved around in the crowd with no appearance of fatigue. She came from her home, 120 miles, to visit friends in the city—her first ride in the cars. When she saw the crowds of people, she said it seemed to her that "all the tribes of Israel had come again together."

The frauds of Carpenter and Grelet, clerks of the Northern Railway, in France, the most important of all the French railroads, are greater than those of Schuyler upon the New Haven Railroad, or any others yet developed in this country, and only equalled by the late swindling banker in London. The directors admit the frauds to amount to 3,000,000 francs, or $600,000; while the letters and public opinion in Paris set the amount at a much higher figure—even as high as 15,000,000 francs, or $3,000,000. The robbers are described as young men of honorable families.

The French railroads are managed well. On one railroad line, two hundred and forty trains pass a certain bridge every day, and no collision. The roads are well built. They cost high, compared with ours—but what would ours cost, if made as good as these? The stone-masonry, the grading, the ballasting, the sodding of the slopes, the depots, the station-houses, the cars, the order and the preciseness are all models which we shall follow eventually. No conductor can cheat there; no collecting in cars; no confusion on getting in. Their tunnels are excellent, and their street crossings admirable.

In a thunderstorm, says an English paper, which broke over the village of Berghem, on the road to Wurzburg, in Rheinisch Bavaria, lately, the lightning set fire to a barn filled with forage, and the flames spread so rapidly that they destroyed not fewer than 130 houses before they could be extinguished.

Not fewer than 71,000,000 of newspapers per annum—or about 200,000 every day—pass through the London post-office. The number of "book-packets," exclusive of newspapers, which now pass through the London office, is at the rate of 1,400,000 per annum, being an increase of more than a million, or of 273 per cent, on the number in 1854.

A waterspout, says the Presse Belge, passed near Hellbourg (Bavaria), on the 24th of August, and snatching a child eight years of age, swept it into the air to a height of forty feet; fortunately the child fell on a haystack and was unhurt. A goat was likewise transported to a distance of three hundred paces, and was deposited safely in the highest branch of a tree.

THE KREMLIN AT MOSCOW, AND TOWER OF IVAN.

SCENES IN RUSSIA.

Since the recent coronation of the Emperor of Russia, Moscow has become more than ever an object of interest, and to gratify this feeling we have placed on this page striking representations of two of the most noted buildings, the Kremlin, and the Palace of Petrowski, in the environs of the city. The Kremlin is to Moscow what the Acropolis was to Athens, and the Capitol to Rome. It is surrounded by a strong and lofty wall, embattled with many towers and turrets, and several gates. The principal in our illustration is the tower of John the Great,—Ivan Veliki. The dome by which it is surmounted is gilded, like the other domes of the Kremlin—about 60 in all. It is 269 feet 6 inches high, and each story is a belfry. The largest bell weighs 64 tons. The bell at its base was cast by order of the Empress Anna, in 1780. It weighs about 400,000 pounds. The palace of Petrowski, depicted in the second engraving, is one of the sights of Moscow. It was a creation of the Empress Elizabeth. It is fantastically built, and glaring in color, with red and white walls, embattled like those of the Kremlin. The grounds are beautifully laid out and ornamented with trees, and the great carriage road, more than a mile in length, is one of the finest drives in the world.

SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS.

We present on this page a fine view of the State House, in Springfield, the capital of the State of Illinois, a flourishing post-town, and the seat of justice of Sangamon County. The State House is a noble stone building, of great architectural beauty, as will be seen by Mr. Kilburn's graphic delineation, executed expressly for us, together with the other pictures of the series of Springfield views, which will be seen on turning to page 312 of the present number. The State House stands in the centre of a square of three acres, bounded by Fifth, Sixth, Adams and Washington Streets. The grounds are laid out with great taste, and shaded by ornamental trees. The building cost $180,000. The town is situated three miles south of Sangamon River, and 230 miles southwest of Chicago. It is laid out with great regularity, the streets being wide and straight, the public square we have depicted being in the centre. The town contains a court house, three banks, a United States land office, churches of various denominations, several academies and hotels. Five or six newspapers are established here. It became the seat of government in 1840, a circumstance which imparted a sensible impulse to the place. It is here that the Chicago and Mississippi Railroad intersects the Great Western Central Railroad, which extends from the Mississippi across the State to Indiana. The western division of this line, which extends fifty-five miles from Springfield to the Illinois River, has been in operation several years, under the title of the Sangamon and Morgan Railroad, the eastern portion of which is still in the process of construction. The Chicago and Mississippi Railroad is completed from Alton to Bloomington, a distance of 130 miles, intersecting at the place last named, the Illinois Central Railroad. The city is surrounded by rich and extensive prairies, which contain large quantities of bituminous coal. The population in 1853 was 6500, and has largely increased within the past three years. It must be remembered that the place was laid out only in 1822. On page 312 we continue our illustrations of its prominent localities. The next view shows the depot of the Chicago, Alton and St. Louis Railroad, which runs through Springfield. Another view presents a scene upon Washington Street. The building on the right is the Chenery House, and the church seen on the left is the Presbyterian. The remaining view on page 312 depicts the buildings occupied by the courts, State banks and insurance companies. They are located on Sixth Street, and front on the Capitol Square. ## MABEL, THE RECTOR'S WARD:

—OR—

TRUTH AND TREASON IN 1777.

BY MAJOR BEN: PERLEY POORE.

CHAPTER V.

LOYALTY AND LOVE.

"For love, at first, is but a dreamy thing,
That slyly nestles in the human heart;
A morning lark, which never plumes his wing,
Till hopes and fears, like lights and shadows, part."

THE rector, at an early hour on the morning following the rescue of his ward by Herbert Yancey, entered the young officer's room and greeted him with a cordial grasp of the hand.

"When I tell you, sir," said the old gentleman, with emotion, "that I am the guardian of the young lady whom you saved last night from a watery grave, you will excuse this intrusion. I shudder to think what might have been her fate had you not have providentially interposed, and have come to invite you to breakfast with us at the parsonage, that Mabel may express our gratitude to you for her rescue."

A flush illumined Herbert's cheek, as he modestly disclaimed having done anything but his duty, then accepted the invitation with the ease of a true gentleman.

"Come right along, then," said the rector. "But first tell me, are you in any way related to the Yanceys of Virginia?"

"I am from the Old Dominion, sir, where my ancestors have resided since the first Yancey landed on the American continent, in the days of Queen Bess."

"And in which county have your immediate ancestors abided?"

"In Charlotte, sir."

"Charlotte! Can it be possible that you are the son of my old friend in England, Renegard Yancey of Evermay?"

"I am, sir. But my father died several years since. I now reside at Evermay with my mother."

"Young gentleman, you have a double claim to my esteem, both as the son of an old friend, and as the preserver of my ward's life. But come, let us start for the parsonage. Madame Ordway, my housekeeper, dislikes to have her coffee cooled before it is drank."

"I am at your service," said Herbert, and they left the tavern.

As nearly every one in Newburyport knew by this time that opposition was to be made, in some shape, to the prayers of the rector for the king of England, it was shrewdly conjectured by the bar-room idlers that the Provincial Congress had taken the matter in hand, and that Herbert had an especial mission to execute. At any rate, it was strange that the rector, who was such a bitter opponent of everything which savored of whiggery, should walk quietly through the streets with a revolutionary officer, and that officer wearing the uniform of the most obnoxious portion of the "rebel" army.

Could they have seen how warmly the young man was welcomed into the parsonage, that focus of Toryism, their wonder would have been increased, although Herbert, at the time, had no idea of the politics of his host. But no sooner did he cast his eyes around the parlor into which he had been ushered, than he discovered unmistakable evidences of female taste. The room, although corresponding in size to the study which has been described in a preceding chapter, reminded Herbert of his own mother's parlor at Evermay. An open harpsicord, upon which lay a pile of neatly-copied manuscript music, an embroidery frame, in which was an unfinished fire-screen rivaling the products of the Gobelin looms, a sketch book, a chess board, and other evidences of refinement and accomplishments, were tastefully arranged, while the air was filled with the perfume of bouquets.

Ere Herbert could hastily inspect these attractive objects, in which he somehow felt an unusual interest, the rector re-appeared, followed by his ward, whom he introduced thus:

"Mr. Yancey, let me present to you—the son of my old friend, Mabel Gwynne, whose life you yesterday preserved."

Stammering forth his gratification at having been able to render Miss Gwynne a service, Herbert took her proffered hand, and stole a glance at the face which had haunted his last night's dreams. Though somewhat pale from the effects of her double fright, a faint blush overspread her beautiful features, while her lustrous eyes, half-veiled in their own lashes, danced in their own light. Never had Herbert before experienced the intoxicating power of female beauty.

Eloquently but modestly thanking Herbert for his timely aid, Mabel asked him to join them at the breakfast table, which (as was the custom in those days) was spread in the kitchen. That apartment, however, was inferior to no other room in the parsonage. All the smoke and effluvia passed up a wide-mouthed chimney, at the back of which yawned the greater and the lesser oven, while the long buffet in the corner glistened with well-scoured pewter-ware. Madame Ordway was duly presented, and "grace before meat" having been said, the party sat down to the excellent repast.

Greatly to Mabel's delight, the young soldier appeared to walk at once into her guardian's good graces. In fact, there was much similarity in their tastes, each expressing a marked preference for manly sports, and yet displaying an intellectual cultivation peculiarly attractive to the fair sex. Mabel, who had enjoyed much of her guardian's society, had a keen appreciation of intellectual training, and was soon captivated by Herbert's sound remarks, polished wit and general information, so seldom displayed by gentlemen of his age. Gossip, politics and the weather were the stereotyped topics of the Newburyport beaux, and she came to the conclusion, ere they left the table, that Mr. Yancey was just such a young man as Mr. Gwynne must have been; in other words, he filled her beau-ideal of masculine excellence.

Soon after they returned to the parlor, Mr. Gwynne was summoned to his study by Madame Ordway, who informed him that Frank wished to see him on especial business. This left Herbert and Mabel together, and soon the young man found that her charming person was but a fitting shrine for mental abilities of a high order. Her superior intellect was nurtured by study, and her accomplishments, in which she was her own instructor, were of a high order—truly feminine, yet not at all frivolous. Above all, there was no affectation in her character. Brought up with the rector upon the most frank and confiding footing, every emotion that thrilled in her heart, or floated through her head, at once found its way into words—frank, unstudied words, bearing the fresh mint stamp of the heart.

An hour was thus passed—it did not seem five minutes to either, during which they talked of many things, but the heart of each felt a new and previously unknown emotion. All at once, their interview was interrupted by the rector, who burst into the parlor, evidently in a towering passion.

"The rascal!" he ejaculated. "The ungrateful scamp!"

"What has happened?" asked Mabel.

"Happened!" blurted the indignant rector—"happened! Why, did you not hear Madame Ordway tell me at breakfast that her son wished to see me? Her Frank—a boy that I almost reared—that I have treated as a father should have treated a son! A boy to whom I have given the best of advice, ever exhorting him to be loyal to his king and to his church! And now what d'ye suppose, Mabel, the young scapegrace has demanded of me?"

Mabel's first thought sent the crimson heart-blood flowing through her veins—but no! Her old play-fellow could not have asked her hand. She trusted not, and replied:

"Indeed, sir, I cannot imagine."

"I knew you couldn't. Well, the impertinent jackanapes came into my study, and after a hypocritical whining about his disagreeable task, threw off his disguise, and actually ordered me—me, ordained rector of St. Paul's,—not to read prayers for the king again!"

"But, sir," interposed Mabel, relieved to find that this was the offence.

"Don't sir me, miss. I told the young scoundrel to leave my house, nor ever to set foot in it again. His poor mother, who had entered the study unperceived, threw herself on her very knees, begging him to retract, and to ask my forgiveness. But he remained stubborn, and departed without sign of repentance. Excuse me, Mr. Yancey, but this ungrateful, rebellious conduct of a young man brought up at my own hearthstone, has quite made me forget myself."

"I regret that anything has occurred to annoy you," replied the young officer, "and will take my leave, as I have important business that must be attended to."

"You will, perhaps, return and take tea with us," said the rector, as they escorted their visitor to the door, and a glance of endorsement from Mabel's eyes made Herbert at once accept the invitation, with thanks.

All that day did her image dance before his imagination, and although he had much else to occupy his thoughts, she reigned paramount. Night came at length, and on entering the parsonage, Herbert saw with delight that the rector was more calm than in the morning. He was engrossed with the subject, however, and no sooner had greetings been interchanged than he referred to it. Exile, he said, would probably be his lot, yet he would not yield to the popular edict, and sacrifice what he considered his duty as a Christian minister.

Mabel said little. It was evident to her admirer that she was not certain in her own mind that her kind guardian was correct, yet she endeavored to soothe him as he was passing through the ordeal, cheering him with a touching devotion. Adversity, after all, is the microscope by which things that were invisible before are made plain to our wondering eye. Prosperity never brings out character. As the waters of the becalmed ocean attract no attention, so the even course of a prosperous life presents nothing observable. We need the tempest; we need to have the passions agitated, in order to have our attention arrested. It is then that our eyes are fixed, and that we seek to analyze the soul by watching each shade of character.

Herbert Yancey, sympathizing himself with his father's friend, felt himself drawn towards Mabel Gwynne by sweet chords of sympathy, as they endeavored to comfort the bruised spirit of the rector. At any other time, the young couple might have been months in becoming as well acquainted with each other as they felt when they separated that night.

"Call again to-morrow," said the rector, when Herbert rose to leave. "I must pass the day in my study, preparing my discourse—a discourse that I may not be permitted to deliver. But Mabel will be glad to see you."

"I shall be occupied in the morning, sir, but in the afternoon, will be too happy to call. Good-night."

"Good-night," replied both the rector and his ward; nor did the latter think that those parting words, which rang like silver vesper bells in Herbert's heart, grated harshly on other ears.

Concealed in a large lilac bush near the door—so near that he could have almost touched Mabel as she spoke, was Dan Holbrook. The scar on his face was more livid than usual, and gave a fearful effect to the pale ferocity of his countenance. Yet he was again balked in his schemes of abduction; for soon after the officer's departure, an athletic young man mounted guard, as it were, before the parsonage, pacing slowly to and fro. Hour after hour did Holbrook wait the departure of this unknown sentry, but he continued his lonely round. At length, in a fit of rage, he sprang from his place of concealment, fired a pistol at the watchful guardian, and took flight. The noise of the shot roused the rector from his troubled dreams, and on going to his open window, he heard groans, as of a human being in distress.

Hurrying on a few garments, Mr. Gwynne hastened out of door, and there, almost upon the door stone of the parsonage, lay Frank Ordway, weltering in his blood. Humanity at once cast political bitterness into the shade; the sufferer's mother was summoned; he was placed in the rector's own bed, and the good man hastened for a surgeon.

The next morning, the Newburyport gossips had it that Frank Ordway had been sent by the Sons of Liberty to "warn away" Parson Gwynne; that the parson offered Miss Mabel to the young man if he could remain; that Frank was obdurate, and that the parson had then fired at and nearly killed him. Ere nine o'clock, a score of versions of this famous tale were spread from Belleville to Joppa, and each narrator added some marvellous variation.

CHAPTER VI.

THE FAREWELL DISCOURSE.

"—And it is Sabbath morn,
And toll and laden care are, for a time,
Forgotten. The solemn bells peal their slow chime
Impiously. The throng, in gay attire,
Would the diverging steps; some to adore
In consecrated aisle, with prayer and chant,
The God of all! While others, less devoutly,
But go to church in quest of novelty."

SUNDAY came, clear and pleasant as was that solitary Sabbath passed by Adam in Paradise, ere sin had dashed its gall into the cup of human life. The earth seemed sanctified, the very air holy, the deep blue sky more beautiful, and the few fleeting clouds that floated over its surface of such pearly whiteness, that they might serve as resting-places for angel-gazers. Nature, arrayed in her autumnal robes, stood sublimely great in her mature vigor, and the genial breath which spread a few golden leaves over the bosom of mother earth, gave no indication of the cold, bleak blasts soon to shriek the requiem of the year. It is a melancholy reflection that earth's loveliest things must be sacrificed by the unsparring hand of time,—that the fair buds which have opened their golden leaves to the sunbeam should wither, and that the earth, so lately clothed with fertility, should become desolate. But a gold-tinting sunlight enlivens these deepening shadows. A spirit of beauty pours glory upon the autumnal scenery with lavish hand, and the woods, thus garnished with the tints of the rainbow, are gorgeously magnificent, like an Hindostan sultana decked for the funeral pyre of her dead lord.

The bells rang out their assembling notes, and the streets were crowded with worshippers, on their way to the various churches. Yet it was evident that some movement was agitating the community beyond ordinary worship. The church of St. Paul's, which had been almost deserted for nearly a year by all save its parishioners, was the focus of attraction, and before its bell had ceased tolling, every pew was crowded, with one exception. Although the very aisles were filled, no one sought a seat in the rector's pew.

There was a convulsive movement throughout the church as Mabel quietly entered and took her accustomed seat. The gossips had made up their minds that she would not attend, and it had never entered their fertile imaginations that she would come escorted by Herbert Yancey. Yet such was the case. Herbert had passed most of the preceding day at the rectory, where Frank Ordway's wound had opened a new source of uneasiness. Fortunately, it was not at all dangerous, although a large effusion of blood had rendered him very weak; and as his mother naturally wished to attend him, Herbert had volunteered to escort Mabel to church. She rather shrunk from accompanying him, but the rector, who apprehended violence, rather insisted. So when the young officer made his appearance at the parsonage in citizen's dress, she accepted his arm. Indeed she began to feel that there was a mysterious blending of their destinies, and to look up to him for protection, although the earth had made but three circuits round the sun since she had first seen him.

The bell ceased to toll, the door of the vestry was opened, and the rector entered, walking to the reading desk with wonderful placidity, his countenance beaming with devoted resignation to the will of his Master. He wore a surplice as white as the drifted snow, yet no whiter than the masses of long hair which fell upon his shoulders. Many had seen him in this same attire, and with this same truthful expression of countenance upon many a solemn occasion. Yet never had he appeared inspired with such divine authority as when—after having knelt in private supplication—he stood unflinchingly before them, and commenced the sublime exhortation of "Morning Prayer."

"The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him." Among that congregation the impressive command was obeyed. Every eye was bent, with fixed intentness, upon the speaker, and each one present, rivetted by the spell of powerful emotion, listened to the sublime petitions of the Episcopal rite with unrelaxed attention. It was the prelude; what was to follow? Would he dare pray for the royal tyrant?

Yet, with the exception of a few loyal parishioners, the congregation neither rose at the "exhortation" nor knelt at the "liturgy," for it had been determined to listen in respectful silence, until the offensive "collect" should be offered. Men sat with stern resolution, and women with anxious fear, alike depicted upon their countenances; yet as the service proceeded, the sternest Son of Liberty could not altogether steel his heart against a mysterious reverence for the rector. The purity of the good old man's soul, diffusing itself from the reading-desk, went forth like the dove from the ark. Pacificality, and with quiet calm, the clear tones of his voice fluttered over that deluge of angry passion, stealing into even the hardest hearts like the deep tones of music.

The creed was ended, the collects for the day, for peace and for grace were read, and then a current of strong emotion passed over the rector's countenance. But he bravely continued, in a distinct tone of impassioned earnestness:

"O Lord, our heavenly Father, high and mighty King of kings and Lord of lords, the only Ruler of princes, who dost from thy throne behold all the dwellers upon earth: most heartily we beseech thee, with thy favor to behold our most gracious sovereign, Lord King George, and so replenish him with the grace of thy Holy Spirit, that he may always incline to thy will and walk in thy way. Endue him plentifully with heavenly gifts; grant him in health and wealth long to live; strengthen him, that he may overcome and vanquish all his enemies; and that finally, after this life, he may attain everlasting joy and felicity, through Jesus Christ, our Lord."

When this obnoxious petition to the throne of grace was commenced, there was a shudder among the female portion of the congregation, but the Sons of Liberty seemed themselves more like culprits than like judges. The heroic courage with which the venerable rector, in a voice as firm as his conscience, had thus braved their wrath, disarmed his opponents. And the victory was completed by the response, which came from the rector himself, after he had waited in vain to hear it from the congregation: "Amen!"

King George had again been prayed for in Newburyport, and there had been an emphatic response to the prayer, yet no one had dared lay the sacrilegious hand of violence upon an ordained priest of God, as he ministered at the altar. The puritanical education of the rudest of the rude restrained them, and paralyzed their plans.

The hymn was then read, and there was a general disposition to join in singing it, as a true thanksgiving. Herbert Yancey, revolutionist as he was, had been charmed by the display of Christian fortitude, as he was now entranced by the sweet notes of Mabel's voice, as her joyful heart pealed forth the beautiful stanzas concluding:

"Only thou our leader be,
And we still will follow thee."

The last notes died away, and the rector ascended the high pulpit, wearing his black silk gown. Kneeling, he bowed his head devoutly, as if to seek divine grace; then rising, he gazed around on the upturned mass of faces, each wearing a different expression, and announced as his text: "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's."

Upon this important precept he commented at length, enforcing that obedience to law and to order, to church and to king, which he considered "ordained of God." Though he loved peace, he loved truth more, and with him the voice of conscience was the command of his Divine Master, in obedience to which he now exhorted his flock, in trumpet tones, to bow their rebellious necks to the "powers that be."

"With these conditions of duty," continued the rector, "should I hesitate? What have I to fear? Shall I, ordained as a disciple to preach the word, fear the frowns of men? Or shall I, in my old age, with a bare inch of life's candle left to me, desert the society which has partially supported me for years, and sustained my ministry in this sanctuary? Desert my heavenly Master and my earthly patrons, too, without any inward conviction of conscience that I should do so, and with every feeling of my nature in open repugnance to the foul wrong in which these rebellious colonies are now engaged. No, my hearers—no! You may tear from me these sacred robes; you may prohibit me, as a faithful shepherd, leading my flock into the 'green pastures' of salvation,—nay, you may shed the last drop of loyal blood in these veins, but never can you make me recreant to my trust, or a traitor to my king."

"Yet, my hearers, I see plainly that another Caesar is to reign over this land, and he is before me in the vigorous, active forms of these misguided young men. Against them, personally, I have no quarrel, and had I, my years would deter me from warring against them. My energies and faculties have alike been wasted with my decaying frame, and I have no longer strength to resist the current. Yet fear appals me not. I have had sufficient strength to stand here to-day, and to solemnly protest against the threats communicated to me. Nay, I have prayed for King George—the lawful sovereign of us all. Blessed be my Redeemer for thus giving me strength to speak sober, truthful words in behalf of down-trodden right—in condemnation of the sway of evil, despite the menaces of those who profess to be Christians. Now when Peter was imprisoned with one of his brethren, the terrors of the edicts were powerless to silence him. When offered liberty if he would thenceforth preach no more, was there not straight-forwardness in the answer made: 'Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye; for we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard?'

"This was no bravado—no boast, any more than I now speak in a vaunting tone. It was rather the result of the inspiration of that Comforter which emboldened Moses, centuries before, to refuse to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer with the children of God, than to share the pleasures of sin for a season—the work of that Spirit which was with the ancient prophets, who, when surrounded by the splendors of the old dispensation, dared to exclaim against 'spiritual wickedness in high places,'—such as inspired John the Baptist when the sound of his voice went forth like an announcing trumpet,—such as our Saviour possessed in its entirety,—such as all who labor in his vineyard must receive. It was that spiritually-felt power of Jehovah's might which proves that there is immortality in virtue; that there is divinity in moral strength, that the fatherly protection of his Holy Spirit is given to all who ask it.

"Animated by this divine spirit, my hearers, I have remained steadfast in my allegiance to my earthly king and to my earthly church. Unwieldy by the fury, and the mockery, and the wrath of rebellious spirits, I have gone on in my appointed work, without doubt or fear—even until to-day, when I saw before me men whom I had been outfitted were ready to lay sacrilegious hands upon me, if I performed my holy duties. Bear me witness that I quailed not. You have heard my words, and I hope that you will remember them.

"But I yield!—not from any conviction of wrong, but from the necessities of age and its increasing infirmities. The sound of my voice in this sanctuary shall trouble you no more. I cannot compromise in a matter of duty, or mar the fair proportions of the church service by omitting any portion of it. I adhere to the landmarks, and if my voice is silent in days to come, let all who hear me now bear testimony that it is in obedience to the wilful decision of law-defying men. I announce, therefore, that St. Paul's Church will be closed for the solemn service of God, until this provincial contest is terminated; neither is it at all probable that you will ever again hear the sound of my voice within its walls. Yet I will say as parting words: 'If I forget thee, O Jerusalem—if I forget thee, O thou church and city of my God,—let my right hand forget her cunning! If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy!'

"And now," he concluded, "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with us evermore. Amen!"

As the venerable rector left the sacred desk, with a calm and resigned air, many of his parishioners were moved to tears. When he afterwards came out from the vestry, they crowded around him, and would fain have assured him of their sympathy.

"Not now, my dear friends,—not a word now. My heart is too full for speech," was his earnest remark, and he was suffered to walk home, accompanied only by his own thoughts. Glorious thoughts they were, too, for, although he felt grieved at severing the link which bound him to St. Paul's, he also felt that he had achieved a victory, not for himself, but for his church and for his king.

Upon no one did this separation-service fall heavier than upon Mabel Gwynne; yet as Herbert, during their homeward walk from church, spoke to her in kind and consoling tones, she experienced content again stealing over her mind. Her love for her guardian, or for his parishioners, was but mere instinct—an earth-germ. But a heaven-sprung plant was beginning to moisten its fibres in her heart blood, and to throw forth bright flowers, which kept back the darkening shadows that chequered the present hour.

"Good-day, Miss Gwynne," said Herbert, when they reached the parsonage. "I will not now intrude."

"But you will call to-morrow," modestly replied Mabel, raising her full, irresistible eyes.

"With pleasure."

The glance was returned, and the eyes—love's telegraph—conveyed a deep meaning to those simple phrases. Yet they, simple words, were saddening sounds to the jealous ear of Frank Ordway, who heard them as he lay in the chamber above the door. Surely he must go out on the morrow.

CHAPTER VII.

TRUE LOVE NEVER RUNS SMOOTH.

"In peace, love tames the shepherd's reed;
In war, he mounts the warrior's steed;
In halls, in gay attire is seen,
In hamlets sports upon the green.
Love rules the camp, the court, the grove,
And men below, and saints above,
For love is heaven, and heaven is love."

So universally was Parson Gwynne esteemed, even by those of a different faith to that which he so zealously adhered to, that his sermon made a deep impression upon the good people of Newburyport; not that it abated their desire for independence, but it made many express a wish that a reconciliation might be effected with the mother country, and the Sons of Liberty felt relieved when it was announced that the advance-guard of Arnold's army was fast approaching the town. The stalwart forms and bronzed faces of the continentals, as they marched through the streets, their drums and fifes playing the just adopted national air of "Yankee Doodle," made the popular heart beat right again. All was excitement. Many of the troops were known to have been at Bunker Hill, while their gallant bearing enlisted the admiration of the veterans who had fought at Louisbourg under Pepperell.

Immediately on his arrival, the captain in command reported to Yancey, who assigned him quarters, and immediately gave his men occupation in loading the stores and ammunition on board of the fleet. This arduous duty, accompanied by no small share of the attendant responsibility, necessarily occupied much of Yancey's time, but he was nevertheless able to pass every evening at the parsonage, where Mabel ever welcomed him with a cordiality not to be mistaken. The rector was generally busy in his study, for he began to arrange his papers with a view to emigration in company with other Tories to New Brunswick. Madame Ordway (whose son had recovered sufficiently to go to his boarding-house) kept discreetly out of the way, and the happy couple were thus left undisturbed to enjoy each other's society.

Each successive visit but served to increase Herbert's passion, and he found with joy that Mabel's heart was worthy of the fate in which it was enshrined. Those who had but a common place acquaintance with her, deemed that the current of her being was incapable of emotion, so calm was her deportment; yet Herbert soon felt that he could read in her tender eyes the evidence of a nature as susceptible as his own, and of a heart which could make for him a heaven of earth. Neither was she unconscious of the hold which she thus exercised on the young soldier's affections—affections which she sincerely reciprocated. Entrancing each—perhaps the happiest phase of love. They spoke not of the past, they thought not of the future, but they were content with the present. In this lack of forethought was their happiness; there was none of that anxiety which is the fever of hope,—no fears, for there was no calculation,—no selfishness, for nothing was asked for,—no disappointment, for nothing was projected. Like butterflies, they basked in the quiet sunshine, without thinking either whether the buds of love-promise would ripen into bright flowers, or whether dark storms would alike sweep them and the half-opened petals away.

So entirely were Herbert's ideas absorbed by his love, that he avoided all intercourse with the good townspeople and with his comrades, thus endorsing the many slanderous reports already in circulation concerning his visits at the obnoxious Tory parson's house. He neither knew of nor heeded these idle tales, however, and was equally ignorant of the fact that in Frank Ordway he had a rival—ay, an enemy. It has already been stated that Frank had discovered his own love for Mabel, and had since eagerly fanned the flame. He had recalled their conversations, weighed every kind word which she had ever addressed to him, and had succeeded in convincing himself, as he lay upon his couch of suffering, that Mabel really loved him, although the appearance of Herbert had diverted her love. Irritated by his wound, he denounced himself for not having before secured the prize which he had coveted, and looked upon Herbert with deadly hatred. Nay, he felt that it was the young officer's hand which had levelled a deadly weapon at him, as he was walking before the residence of his beloved, happy if he could see the reflection of her shadow upon the window-blind. Dreadful, unjust suspicion, and yet, fanned by his jealousy from a thought into a fact, it had full possession of his soul. Yet it was not revenge that he sought; it was Mabel Gwynne's love.

A JAPANESE PARADISE.

After a march of ten miles along the picturesque shore, we reached one of the loveliest spots on the island. It was a village perched on a bold promontory, overgrown with the pine, banyan and sago palm, at the mouth of a charming valley which opened up between the hills to the base of the lofty peak behind Harrow's Bay. A stream of sweet water threaded the valley, which was covered with the freshest verdure, and overhung with beautiful groves of pine. It was a picture of pastoral loveliness, such as is rarely found in any country. Nothing struck me more during the journey than the great variety of scenery which the island encloses in its narrow compass. We passed through at least four different districts, which bore but the slightest resemblance to each other, either in features or character. We had both the groves of the tropics and the woods of the north, the valleys of Germany and the warm shores of the Mediterranean.

The village was large, thriving, and as neatly laid out and hedged in as an English garden. The scrupulous neatness and regularity of the Lew Chew villages was doubly refreshing to one familiar with the squalor and filth of China. The sight of the cung-qua (public house), which occupied the place of honor at the top of the promontory, completed our raptures. Its roof of red tiles glittered in the sun; rows of feathery sago palms threw their brilliant leaves over the wall of the enclosure; the whitest and softest of mats covered the floor; the garden blazed with a profusion of flowers; and stone basins, seated on pedestals, contained fresh water for our use. Its aspect of comfort and repose was a balm to travellers as weary as ourselves, and I directed Terry at once to hoist the stars and stripes upon the roof.

I hastened back to make a sketch of the beautiful valley before sunset, while Mr. Heine occupied himself with a view of the cung-qua. A venerable old man, with a snowy beard reaching nearly to his knees, approached the bank where I sat, but upon noticing me, made a profound but dignified reverence, and retired. The village was named U-na. We had not yet reached the region of fowls, but the people sent us two small fresh fish, with a pumpkin and some cucumbers. For our breakfast, there were sent two long eel like fish, resembling the gar, a few young egg-plants, and a basket of sweet potatoes.—Narrative of Com. Perry's Expedition.

AN ADVENTUROUS NUN.

Markham, in "Cuzco," relates the annexed story of Catalina de Erasmo, a Spanish lady nun and warrior.—"There are two nunneries in Gamaanga, Santa Clara and Santa Teresa, the former of which was the scene of a strange romance. In 1617, a young ensign in the Spanish army, having slain his adversary in a duel, fled to the bishop's palace after sanctuary. His name was Don Alonso Dias Ramirez de Guzman, and he confessed to several other murders of the same fashionable kind. From various circumstances, however, the suspicion of the bishop was aroused; and, after undergoing an examination, the young duellist proved to be a woman. A full confession then followed: her name was Dona Catalina de Erasmo, a nun of the convent of San Sebastian, in Guipuzcoa, whence she had escaped, and, dressed in man's clothes, embarked for the New World. Landing at Payta, she eventually attained the rank of ensign, and became famous as the greatest duellist in Peru. The bishop placed her in the convent of Santa Clara, whence she was subsequently sent to Lima with a guard of six priests, and placed in a nether convent, where she remained two years, and was finally transmitted to Spain. It is added that the pope eventually granted her permission to wear man's clothes, and she went out to Mexico as an officer in the viceroy's guard."—Troy Budget.

A writer beautifully remarks that a man's mother is the representative of his Maker. Misfortune and mere crime set no barriers between her and her son. While his mother lives, a man has one friend on earth who will not desert him when he is needy. Her affection flows from a pure fountain, and ceases only at the ocean of eternity.—Life Illustrated.

THE COSMOPOLITAN ART ASSOCIATION.

We have heretofore alluded in terms of commendation to this American Art Association, the object of which is to popularize a knowledge of and taste for art, by the distribution of examples of high art, engravings, statues and pictures, at the lowest possible cost, and in some instances gratuitously. The machinery by which this great object is accomplished is similar to that of the London Art Union, and has been managed with such energy that the Association has been a success from the very start—only two years ago. It has carried a taste for art into whole communities, where before the subject was the speciality of a few individuals. It has placed noble specimens of the creative powers of genius in humble homes, whose inmates never dreamed of compassing such treasures, while giving its members more than a full equivalent for their subscription fee. Success has only stimulated the managers to new exertions, and the past year has only witnessed redoubled efforts on their part in their character of art-missionaries. Before describing more particularly the plans and arrangements of the Association for the present year, let us refer to the illustrations on this and the succeeding page.

In the first place, we present an interior view of the new gallery, crowded with paintings and statuary, with a throng of visitors circulating beneath its graceful arches, showing the effect of the whole when completed. In view of the necessities of the Association in the way of galleries, it has been determined to erect a building especially devoted to the purpose. To this end, Guidermeister, the celebrated architect of the New York Crystal Palace, has furnished a design and details, as follows:—"The new gallery forms an oblong of one hundred and fifty feet depth by forty feet in width, and is divided by two rows of columns into a centre nave and two aisles, at each side of it, affording in the former ample space for statuary, while the latter give free passage to those viewing the pictures hung on both walls. The architecture of the whole is in the Gothic style, and, as will be seen, is of very light and graceful proportions, great strength at the same time being attained by the use of iron in the principal parts of construction. The columns support light arches of cast iron, the spandrels decorated with open tracery, another longitudinal row of arches bracing the columns in that direction firmly together; on these arches rest the girders of rolled iron supporting the ceiling, which is plastered with projecting ribs, forming an elaborate panel-work, and painted à fresco in delicate tints, so as to present a mellow, harmonious hue, not interfering with the works of art hung on the walls. Light is admitted abundantly through large circular skylights. The height from the floor to the ceiling is rising from about twenty-five to thirty feet. In the centre of the room is a handsome marble basin, with a jet d'eau, with seats arranged around forms—a suitable place for those wishing to rest awhile from looking at the surrounding world of art—at the same time adding to the ensemble. It is designed to have this building constructed as soon as possible, and it is confidently hoped it will be completed in time to receive the next annual collection." The succeeding illustrations are representations of a few of the numerous works of art to be distributed by the Association in January next. The first of these is a statue of "Innocence," executed by an Italian, artist in Carrara marble, after the original by Biceaimé. It is the figure of a child, lightly draped, with his arms folded on his breast, and gazing upward with a guileless and confident expression. The next, the "Captive Bird," a life-size statue in marble, represents a child binding the feet of a dove he has just ensnared, with a fillet of ribbon. Like the preceding work, this pleasing statue is elaborately finished. We next have a life-sized and life-like bust of the great statesman, Henry Clay, carved by the celebrated sculptor, Rocca, from a single block of Carrara marble. A marble bust of John C. Calhoun, the great Southern statesman, is next in order, and was executed by the same sculptor expressly for the Cosmopolitan Art Association. It is pronounced the most faithful likeness extant of the great original. The "Child of the Sea," another work purchased for distribution, represents a beautiful little cherub sleeping in a sea-shell. It is in marble, and sculptured by an Italian, after the original by Perelli. Following this, we present an engraving of the "Wood Nymph." This piece of sculpture will indeed be a prize to the winner. It was executed in Italy by Biceaimé expressly for the "Cosmopolitan." The statue was wrought from a single block of pure Carrara marble, and represents a partially nude female figure of exquisite beauty of face and form. On her left shoulder is perched a forest bird, while in her left hand and in her lap, she holds a profusion of wild flowers elaborately sculptured and wrought. The Cosmopolitan Art Association commenced operations in June, 1854, and met with unexampled success. The first year of its existence, it had 22,418 subscribers, and distributed several hundred works of art. The second year, its list of subscribers had swelled to 24,488. From the first start, the Association linked literature and art together in its plan, and this was probably the secret of its fortunes. The first feature was to place the subscription of membership at three dollars a year, which sum ensured one of the leading three dollar magazines for the year, and also secured to the holder of the certificate of membership one chance in the distribution of works of art for each certificate. The second year the magazine feature was still adhered to, and the works of art distributed were of increased value and much more numerous. The association have now prepared a magnificent steel engraving, called "Saturday Night," which subscribers of the present year will receive in lieu of one of the magazines, if they prefer it. Furthermore, the Association have issued an elegant illustrated quarterly publication, called the "Cosmopolitan Art Journal," of large quarto form, which is furnished to the subscribers of the association free. More attractive inducements to subscribe can hardly be imagined. The next annual distribution occurs on the 28th of January next, when a more varied and valuable collection will be offered than has yet been presented. The marbles we have illustrated and noticed are but a tithe of those to be distributed, while the collection of paintings is unusually large and valuable. Works from the pencils of American and European artists of renown, of different sizes and styles, and representing the various schools of art, will be disseminated broadcast, satisfying and creating a taste for art. It is difficult to set a bound to the good influences of such an association, managed with spirit and liberality. It is only by such a plan that the artistic resources of this country can be developed. It is only by appealing to the people—to the masses—that any great enterprise can be accomplished in this country. Under institutions like ours, it is not to be hoped—perhaps not to be desired—that government will be more than an occasional patron of art, while wealth in this country is too equally distributed to allow of many colossal individual fortunes adequate to the support of art. And art will best fulfil its mission when depending on a whole people for its support; its character will be more truly reflective and cosmopolitan. We thus regard with peculiar favor the designs of the institution under notice, and commend it warmly to the patronage of our friends. Let it be remembered that the payment of three dollars not only entitles a subscriber to either a magnificent steel engraving or a three dollar magazine for one year, but to a copy of the Art Journal for one year, and a ticket in the distribution, ensuring four dollars' worth of reading matter, and a ticket which may add a costly work of art. The engraving above referred to is of large size and pleasing character. It is from the bust of Lemoine, the celebrated line and stipple engraver of London, and he has been employed on remittingly on the work for two years, receiving $5000 for the labor. Such an engraving in London is never sold for less than five dollars, but the Association have been enabled to afford it at three dollars. The Cosmopolitan Art Journal, given free to subscribers, is very well conducted, and contains a large amount of valuable art information. Further particulars concerning the Association may be found in the catalogue number of the Art Journal, which, we believe, is sent free on application to C. L. Derby, the secretary of the Association, at either of its offices, 348 Broadway, New York, or 166 Water Street, Sandusky, Ohio, to either of which places subscriptions can be sent. We have devoted considerable space to the projects and proceedings of this Association, because we believe that aesthetic culture is destined to exert a most important influence on the future of this country. Hitherto, with grand and glorious exceptions, gemming our national pathway here and there, like bright flowers, the intellect and ability of this country have been devoted almost exclusively to strictly practical objects. This has been a necessity forced upon us by the very circumstances of our being. A continent to be redeemed from the forest and the savage, agriculture to be fostered and expanded, churches, school-houses and court houses, the altars of the soul, the mind and the right, to be set up, political independence to be established on an enduring basis, commerce and manufactures to be built up, creating wealth in one way, while science developed wealth in another,—all these were foremost tasks, and work enough for many centuries, which the indomitable energy and perseverance of our people have accomplished in the lives of some half a dozen generations. The base and the shaft of the pillar were to be hewn and set up, and now comes the Corinthian capital of art. That society is not perfect in which the finer aspirations, the delicate sensibilities, the craving for beauty and ornament implanted in our nature, are not catered for. Without the arts, without painting, sculpture, music, poetry and the drama, this would be but a poor work-day world after all, and little worth. The spiritual nature needs these accessories and aids. error—the fatal mistake of the Puritans was their ignoring of the beautiful and ornate. These stern iconoclasts, with all their grandeur and loftiness of purpose, with all their spiritual purity, lacked knowledge of the human heart, and lacked discrimination. In the carvings of the shrine, in the graves of architecture, in the gorgeous dreams of poet, and painter, and sculptor, they saw only the device of the Evil One to lead the human heart astray, and the ruthless hammer, yet wielded with an honest purpose, ruined more than the mere handiwork it shattered—it destroyed the choicest food of the soul. But the present age is wiser. The seeker after spiritual truth, faithful to the aims of his predecessors, hesitates not to worship in fumes that have taxed the utmost cunning of the architect, nor closes his ears to the strains of the organ lingering round the fretted arches of cathedral piles. There is no sect now bigoted enough to condemn works of art. Their lofty spiritualism is universally acknowledged. We should ever keep in view the high mission of art, but its culture appeals also to the worldly-

PHOTOGRAPHY IS FORGING.

A curious circumstance lately happened in Paris, which may be justly regarded as alarming. The science of photography has, for some time past, been the rage among the young men of fashion in Paris, and has been carried to great perfection by many of them, but none to a greater extent than by M. Aguado, whose successful studies from nature are well known among the artists of every country. Recently, this gentleman sent word to the experts of the Bank of France, that he had at length succeeded so fully in the imitation of one of the thousand franc notes that he defied them to detect it; and to show his perfect conviction of the impossibility of discovery, he warned them that the note would be presented at the bank between the hours of one and three. According to this intimation, the experts were all assembled at the caisse, and each note brought in was submitted to their examination before it was accepted. The hours passed by, and no false note appeared; the whole of those presented during the interval specified, lay in a row spread out before the experts, who already crowded over the idea that M. Aguado had not dared to hazard the experiment, when, just as the clock struck three, in he walked, smiling and triumphant, with a thousand franc note in his hand. "Well, have you detected my forgery?" asked he, with the greatest coolness. "No," replied the head expert, "for the good reason—you never sent it." "Why, there it lies right under your nose—the third to the left, and here is the original I took it from." The dismay of the experts may be conceived, when even upon comparing the two they found it to be impossible to say which was the genuine one, and which the false. A committee was held to determine upon the course to be adopted, as, according to report, a great number of these photograph notes were in circulation, and M. Aguado declares himself able to manufacture any quantity in a given time, and that none shall be detected, either by sight or touch. The consternation created by the announcement is not to be described, and report tells us that the bank has already accepted the offer of a learned English doctor resident there, to furnish a chemical preparation, of his own discovery, which shall immediately decompose the photograph by the touch of a camel's-hair brush, dipped in the liquid, and passed lightly over the printed lines. The adventure has served to make us laugh, although rather grimly, when it is considered that already the greater proportion of the notes in circulation may not be able to stand the test of the learned doctor's brush.—Home Journal.

THE CHILD OF THE SEA.

minded, to the political economist as well as to the man of taste. Look at Italy—impoverished, down-trodden, politically ruined, she owes the bread of life almost to the treasures of art which she possesses, the accumulation of long centuries. The lavish patronage of art of her earlier churchmen, princes, nobles and merchant princes, like bread cast upon the waters, has proved a judicious investment. In the language of the mart, it has paid, and paid well. Look at the monopoly of many branches of manufacture engaging the French. The elegance of their fabrics, of their porcelain, of their furniture, is to be attributed to the taste of their mechanics, and that taste is but the fruit of the works of art and the artistic culture which abound in the French capital and in all the large French cities and towns. A French artisan is more than an artisan—he is almost an artist. Art adds not only to the intellectual, but to the physical wealth of a nation

PATIENCE.

Is it to sit with folded hands,
And eyes that will not weep,
Passive and calm, while in our souls
Life's earnest thoughts do sleep?

Is it to grow more cold and proud,
Beneath our heart's sad pain?
Methinks if clashing worketh thus,
Then chastening is in vain!

Alas! pride meeteth not our need,
Nor can it aught avail,
When in our path the shadows lie,
And turns earth's sunlight pale.

This is not patience!—not at least
That patience Christ doth teach—
Alas, dear Lord! we cannot keep
Thy rules within our reach.

O, worldly maxims differ so
From all thy love doth will—
Thou dost indeed beneath thy rod
Command us to be still.

But thou hast not forbade our tears,
Thine own were freely shed!
O'er thy beloved—and may not we
Weep o'er our treasures fled?

Alas! if in our hours of pain
We had no place to flee,
Save the cold world—which in its pride
Naught of love's heart can see!

Kindred and friend may fail to read
The spirit's inmost needs,
The voice that still for love and peace,
For rest and comfort pleads.

And lonelier, wearier than at first,
We turn in tears away,
From seeking that which cometh not
To find thee while we may.

And patience hath her perfect work
When clinging to thy side,
We find in Love Divine the peace
The human hath denied.

ON THE WHARF.

BY FRED. W. SAUNDERS.

THE exigencies of commerce during the last fifteen or twenty years have wrought great and wonderful changes in everything connected with marine affairs. The dull sailing drogher that formerly occupied three years in an East India voyage, has disappeared before the mammoth clipper that reels off her fourteen or sixteen knots an hour with ease, and completes her voyage in a period of time that an old time ship would have consumed in loading and discharging. Steam bids defiance to adverse breezes, and "taking the wings of the morning, flies to the uttermost parts of the earth," while an "ancient mariner" would have been mast-heading his topsails, and getting his anchors. Short cuts and isthmus transits reduce the size of the world to less than half its former magnitude, and no place is now so far away that it may not be visited on a pleasure trip. Time was when a traveller who had been in foreign lands, and with his own eyes surveyed the "jumping-off place," enjoyed a certain degree of distinction at home, was pointed out as a lion, and was permitted to roar in whatever manner seemed best unto himself. But now, everybody's folks have circumnavigated the globe at least once or twice, and the voyager, instead of surprising people with the extent of his travels, is himself astonished to find that his absence has not been remarked by his most intimate friends; and if, with a view to making an acquaintance's "eyes stick out," he ventures to remark that this is the anniversary of the day on which he was presented to the sultan of Borneo, the acquaintance aforesaid forthwith gives a detailed account of how, while playing leap frog with the high dignitaries of the court of Peking, in the month of March last past, he had the misfortune to tread on the emperor's toes, and thereby lost the chance of being made prince of Nogo, which distinction would otherwise have been conferred upon him; and what makes the matter still worse, the acquaintance's story is a fact. But perhaps the most intolerable nuisance brought about by this facility for peregrinating, is the restriction it places upon "free speech." The time-honored privilege travellers formerly enjoyed of pulling the long bow, can now be exercised no longer. If a returned pilgrim to the frozen regions of the north, trusting to the ignorance of his auditors, spreads himself on an account of the wonders there to be witnessed, some barber's clerk coolly takes up the thread of the narrative, and displays a silver medal which was presented him the last time he was in the Arctic circle, upon the coming of age of the heir apparent to the crown of Greenland, when he (the barber's clerk) distinguished himself by shinning up, and removing a stuffed seal from the summit of the North pole, which had been greased for the occasion.

But great as have been the changes in ships and floating stock, as a railroad superintendent would doubtless say, a still greater change is observable in the character of the men who navigate them. As I wander dejectedly about the docks and among the shipping, I seek in vain among the tall-hatted and long-coated mariners of the present day—who can scarcely be distinguished from laudsmen,—for the careless, good-natured, happy-go-lucky sailors of old times. Now-a-days, sailors read and write, keep sober when on shore, and perpetrate other enormities; and the disciples who pin their faith upon "Captain Marryatt, C. B.," will be disappointed in their search after the jolly, ignorant, generous, superstitious, honest, half-sober, semi-pious jack tars they had been led to suppose were as plenty as blackberries about the docks of all seaport towns, and in the bitterness of their disappointed hearts they cry aloud, "Where are the Long Tom Coffins, and Jacob Faithfuls that for years I have known and loved so well, as they fearlessly plowed their way through oceans of printer's ink, and manfully spread their 12mo. sails to catch the favoring newspaper puff's of four lines duration?" Paddy's echo will mournfully reply, "I'm blowed if I can tell you, my lad, what has become of them. They are not here, neither if they were, would they be of any use, for they were slow coaches, old fogies, and behind the times, and have passed away with the lumbering tubs they manned."

It was with such ideas seuffling round and working Tom Cox's traverse under my new straw hat, that I sat, one pleasant afternoon this summer, upon a pile of cotton bales, at the end of Short Wharf, my feet hanging over toward the water, enjoying the cool breeze that comes off from the bay. Presently I observed a boat put off from an inward bound ship that had just come to anchor in the stream, and pull toward the end of the wharf where I was sitting.

"Holloa there, shipmate! pass down a rope's end, and give us a lift with this donkey, will ye, my lad?" exclaimed a familiar voice, as the boat touched the pier.

Not feeling particularly anxious to give anybody a lift with anything on such a hot day, I cocked my eye over toward the boat, to ascertain whether my petitioner was worthy any extra exertion on my part. The proprietor of the voice was a well looking sailor of the old school, in tarpaulin hat, blue jacket and pyramidal trowsers. That he was a brother sailor was abundant reason why I should comply with his request; so dropping over the end of a coil of running rigging that lay alongside, it was made fast to the lashing of the donkey—as he called his big sea-chest,—which I speedily transferred to the wharf; then dropping over the line a second time, and holding it fast for a man-rope, the owner of the chest scrambled up hand over fist, and in another moment stood by my side.

"Bliged to ye, shipmate," he said, seating himself upon one of the bales, and brushing the sleeves of his jacket. "Proper warm this arternoon."

I admitted the charge, and sailor-like proceeded to inquire where he hailed from, and whither he was bound.

"From Batavia last, come passenger, and am bound for Washington, first boat," he returned.

"For Washington!" I exclaimed. "What the deuce are you going to Washington for?"

"I'm going to Washington to get justice done me," he replied, with an air of importance.

I could not repress a smile at this answer; who wouldn't have smiled at the idea of a friendless sailor going personally to the capital to obtain justice, a commodity for which the demand so greatly exceeds the supply.

"You needn't grin, shipmate," he retorted, somewhat sharply. "I want you to understand that, under the lid of that donkey, there's as good as eight thousand dollars of current coin, and if that won't get justice, what will?"

The mention of the money of course, and very naturally, inspired me with profound respect for my web-footed acquaintance, and I frankly owned that with such a backer, his chances were not so desperate as I at first supposed.

"But," I persisted, "may I be permitted to inquire the description of justice you demand? If we were all to have strict and even-handed justice meted out according to our deserts, some of us would be hung before this time next week."

"I think it's very likely," he replied, dilly. "We wont argue the point, however, for I think probable you are the best judge of that sort of thing. But you may take my word that's not the sort of justice I'm after. No, sir. I want damages from the Dutch and English governments, and I'm going to have it, too, I tell ye. But I say, shipmate," he continued, starting up suddenly, "what time does that boat start for Baltimore?"

"O, not this two hours; don't you see she hasn't got half her freight aboard yet?" I replied, directing his attention toward the steamer, which lay nearly abreast of where we were sitting. "It's cooler here than it is aboard; so stretch yourself out in the shade here, and give us the set and drift of your government rumpus."

"Why, it aint much of a yarn any way," he replied, coiling himself down in a comfortable position under the lee of the bales, and with much circumlocution, he proceeded in a rambling sort of way, to give a history of his troubles.

"A little rising of a year ago, myself and an old shipmate of mine, Joe Grummet,—you know Joe, don't you? he's sailed out of this port nigh upon a thousand years."

"I've heard of him," I replied.

"Well, as I was saying, a little more than a year ago, Joe was coxswain, and I pulled the bow oar of the captain's gig belonging to an Uncle Sam's frigate, on the East India station. There were laying in harbor at the same time, an English, French and Dutch man-of-war; and, as usually happens under such circumstances, much rivalry existed between the representatives of the different nations, each endeavoring to excel the other, in every little point of sea etiquette. If one ship did anything particularly nice, there was no peace or rest on board the others until something still better had been done.

"At this time, that scourge of the earth, the Asiatic cholera, was raging with great violence on shore, and not a few belonging to the men-of-war lost the number of their mess through the same fell destroyer. As a general thing, a sailor's funeral is a matter of very little ceremony, the defunct tar—if the ship is in port—being planted almost anywhere, with very little fuss or delay; but with us, the rivalry between the ships extended even to such solemn events, and nothing would do but there must be a procession of boats, muffled oars, the national flag, a regular grave, and a parson to pilot the poor fellow beyond the river.

"Now in the matter of parsons, there is a great difference between this country and some others I could mention. In England, where church and state are so closely connected, young fellows take up the ministry, as they would any other profession, merely as a means of obtaining a living; and as a natural consequence, a good many rather rapid young clergymen are turned out by the colleges, who are no more fit for their position than I should be. As the good sense of the people prevents the worst of these youngsters officiating professionally at home, they are only too glad to accept an appointment to some distant colonial station, where an indifferent people tolerate them, despising the man, though with some show of respect for the office; and where there is no one to call them to an account, except, at intervals, their bishop, from whom they contrive to hide their short comings. Such a state of things is melancholy, certainly; but there can be no help, so long as Queen Victoria is the head of the church, and a clergyman is but a government official.

"It was upon such young Levites, as the sailors called them, that we were obliged to call, for the performance of our funeral services. Well, upon one occasion, when a poor fellow had been rolled in his hammock and covered with the flag, preparatory to the dark journey to that other country, a parson was notified, and our long procession of boats started in great state, with mournful music and muffled oars, pulled about among the shipping for show, and took our way to the graveyard; but the parson was not there according to agreement. The officers fretted and fumed, and the captain did worse, but all with no satisfactory result. A messenger was despatched for the delinquent, but he could not be found. What was to be done? A parson must be obtained somehow, for the English ship had got up a rousing funeral the day before, and it would not answer to be outdone. A messenger was sent to another cleric at the other end of the town, while we waited in the broiling sun. At length he made his appearance, with surplice and prayer book. All was in readiness, and he was about to begin, when the parson who should have been on the ground at first, was seen coming on the dead run, his surplice streaming in the wind. The new comer, unwilling to lose his fee, now that it was so nearly earned, precipitately opened his book, and in a hurried voice commenced the beautiful burial service of the Church of England, 'I am the resurrection and the life'—but had proceeded no further, before his rival, breathless and red with anger, was at his side.

"What do you mean, sir, by interfering with my professional duties?" he exclaimed, angrily pushing his 'reverend and dear brother' to one side. 'I you want to understand, sir, that I am the one employed for this ceremony, and I am going to perform it, and—' opening his book with a jerk—"I am the resurrection and the life"—and so continued to read the remainder of the service, amid the grins of all present, who could not but think that he had taken upon himself a somewhat responsible office, considering that he was quite a young man; and that if he were indeed the "resurrection and the life," there was but a slim chance for poor Jack.

"The funeral being over, the boats returned to the ship, while the officers proceeded toward the town, where they had been invited to meet the officers of the other ship-of-war laying in port, at a grand dinner party, given by one of the high government officials. Joe and myself, from our positions as officers in the captain's boat, formed the old man's body guard, and usually followed him about in his tramp on shore. On this occasion, we tagged along behind, and took our stations in the dining hall, to be on hand to execute any orders that might be given.

"The captain of the English frigate was a pompous and most ungentlemanly man, who mistook rudeness for frankness, and supposed that, to carry out the character of a true John Bull, he must make himself just as disagreeable as possible. For some reason with which I am unacquainted, our captain was particularly anxious not to come to an open rupture with this man, although there was certainly most abundant cause of misunderstanding, and but for this reason, I am convinced there would have been a jolly row long before. As the dinner progressed, the English captain took occasion to say that—

"'Aside from the American naval officers—who from their constant intercourse with people of other nations could not avoid picking up some refinement—he had never in his life, notwithstanding he had been in many Yankee ports, met with an American gentleman. No, sir,' he repeated, with an oath, striking the table violently with his fist, 'I have never seen an American gentleman!'

"The table was electrified by this unprovoked insolence. Our subordinate officers started from their seats and looked earnestly at their commander. He must have had some extraordinary reason for desiring peace; for, though he turned almost purple, and ground his teeth with rage, he nevertheless retained his seat and remained silent. Our younger officers, who of course could not take up the quarrel while their superior officer was present, slunk back into their chairs with looks of surprise and humiliation. A profound silence ensued; no one seemed to know exactly how to act. While this was going on, Joe had been standing behind the captain's chair, twisting his countenance in a remarkable manner, and in the midst of the pause that followed the Englishman's declaration, he turned to me, and in a low but distinct tone of voice, remarked:

"That's a melancholy fact, true as gospel, every word of it."

"The Englishman's countenance was radiant with triumph."

"Take that, my man," said he, slipping half a dozen sovereigns into Joe's hand. "You're a good fellow. I wish you belonged to my ship."

"Joe pocketed the money without a word. Our own officers were struck dumb by such unparalleled audacity from one of their own men; the sight of his taking the money from the Englishman was rather too much; it broke the spell of silence, however; for although our captain might have important reasons for wishing to avoid a brush with the English captain, he had not the slightest objection to whipping him over Joe's shoulders. Boasting with rage, he sprang from his seat, and rushed upon my imprudent friend."

"O you infernal, mutton-headed, tarry-fisted, lantern-jawed old rascal!" he roared, shaking his clenched fist in Joe's face. "I'll teach ye to put in your own gentlemen are talking! Aint no gentlemen in America, eh? You're a liar, and any one else who says so! Get out of the house, you villain! and count yourself good for twelve dozen, as soon I get on board. Aint no gentlemen in America, eh? you thundering old scallawag!"

"I didn't say there wasn't no gentlemen in America, yer honor," said Joe, twitching his forelock, respectfully.

"Don't talk to me, you infamous rebel!" yelled the captain; "think I haven't got any ears? What did you say?"

"Why, yer honor," said Joe, shifting his hat from hand to hand continually, "when his t'other honor said as how he'd never met an American gentleman, I jist said as how 'twas true; for, d'y'e mind, yer honor, it's plain enough even to me, that his t'other honor never has seen one; for if he'd ever been in the habit of sociating with American gentlemen, or indeed gentlemen of a most any other nation, he'd have long ago learned better than to make any such little-boy statement as he's jist got through him. That's all, yer honor."

"It was now the Englishman's turn to air his billingsgate; he was perfectly frantic, and demanded that Joe should be sent on board in irons and flogged to within an inch of his life. Our captain, for his own reasons, determined to humor him, and with much show of indignation, he ordered us to quit the house, but added in a low tone as we passed him, that we were to wait for him at the door. Joe touched his hat, and as he passed the furious Englishman, drew the half dozen sovereigns from his pocket, and began coolly counting them over, apparently to the great annoyance of her majesty's officer, who I really feared would get himself with apoplexy."

"I have since heard that, after we left, our captain demanded an explanation of the Englishman, who finding he was likely to have half a dozen successive duels on his hands at once, finally explained that his words were to be taken in a Pickwickian sense. That when he spoke of gentlemen, he referred to the class of people designated by that title in England—to wit, persons who live on their income, and who would scorn to engage in any matter of trade or useful profession; whereas, our people, he had observed, however wealthy they might be, always inclined to dabble in some kind of business speculation, and therefore could not be gentlemen, according to the English acceptance of the word. Our captain was fain to accept the explanation, and even went so far as to thank the Englishman for the compliment, thereby lowering himself prodigiously, no doubt, in the estimation of that worthy champion of aristocracy."

"We had to wait at the door a good spell before the captain made his appearance, and when at last he did come, he was highly indignant at the gross misdemeanors of which Joe and myself had been guilty, for he included us both in his condemnation. The affair, he said, was a very grave one. The English captain was highly affronted, had been laughed at, and compelled to explain, and what made the matter worse, we being such insignificant characters, there was no way in which he could be revenged. For sailors, he continued, to obtrude any remarks of their own upon their superior officers, was subversive of all true discipline. He considered us dangerous fellows, and by way of punishment, ordered us not to show our faces on board—at all events in the way of duty—for the space of one month. As, however, he did not consider it exactly proper to turn adrift even such rascals as ourselves, without some provision for their subsistence, he supplied us with a liberal allowance, adding that, if there was any description of vice or wickedness, of which sailors are popularly supposed to be so fond, that our stock of funds would not purchase, we were to apply to him for more; and with a series of inward chuckles, he waddled off to the landing, leaving Joe and myself no less delighted than surprised at our unexpected leave of absence for a whole month."

"Now, although Joe and myself had been for a long time particularly anxious to obtain shore leave, and had conjured up a hundred things we would like to do, in case it was granted, yet, no sooner did we find ourselves at liberty, than we were at a dead loss as to the manner in which we should occupy the time so as to make the most of it. A dozen things were proposed and rejected. We didn't care about a spree, and it was too sickly to tramp about the country. We were almost upon the point of going on board and declining our leave of absence, when Joe was struck with a bran new idea."

"Some years before he had been on board an American ship, bound to the Straits of Malacca, which had been lost among the Archipelago far down at the entrance of the Straits, not far from the coast of Sumatra. She struck on a sunken rock, or something of that sort, and went down in very shallow water, not above a dozen fathoms at the outside. Ever since the occurrence, Joe had run away with the idea that a good deal of valuable property might be raised with very little trouble, and he now proposed that we should charter a native boat and make the attempt."

"I took kindly to the notion, for I didn't suppose he would start on such an expedition unless he was pretty sure of his ground; and even if we were not successful, the trip promised to be a pleasant and somewhat exciting one. It was too late to accomplish anything that afternoon, but we were at work bright and early on the ensuing day, and soon effected an arrangement for a large sized Chinese boat of about ninety tons, with two masts and lateen sails of tremendous spread and hoist; a dozen stout China riggers were engaged to man her, a plentiful supply of rice and water was got on board, and all being in readiness, we dropped down with the evening tide."

"The wind went down with the sun, leaving us becalmed a few miles outside of the harbor. We had expected as much, and so quietly turned in to await sunrise and a breeze, which were pretty sure to come together. At the first streak of dawn, light cat-paws began to ruffle the water, growing stronger as the day advanced, until we were howling along about seven knots. As we swept by a projecting headland that had for sometime hidden the harbor from our sight, Joe carelessly took up the telescope to have a parting squint at the port."

"Well, I'm blowed if there isn't that English frigate, the Intolerable, with the Blue Peter flying at the fore and her top-sails hanging in the buntlines, all ready to trip!" he exclaimed, closing the slides of the telescope with a jerk. "Who ever knew she was off to sea so soon!"

"Yes, we know all about," replied our Chinese helmsman, in his "pigeon English." "Him catchee one pilot yesserd'ay, for trip down the coast. O, yes-ee, me know-ee."

"Well, good luck to her, and here's hoping she may have a speedy passage to the bottom, that's all I wish her," returned Joe, benevolently."

"Our rapid headway soon sunk the harbor below the horizon, and we squared away south-south-west for the Java Sea. It was now the turn of the monsoon, which had been blowing from the northeast, and was, while it lasted, favorable for the downward trip. We calculated to reach the great island of Banca before the shift, and lay by until the wind settled steadily in the southeast, which would bring the scene of our operations well under the lee of the land, and consequently in middling smooth water. The run was made in something less than a week, and we arrived at our proposed anchorage just in season to escape a violent typhoon that had been blowing for some days. The wind soon after hauled round permanently to the southeast, and we were ready to commence operations."

"Another week was spent in hunting up the wreck, which we at length found, as Joe had supposed, in about five fathom water. Her whole hulk could be readily made out when there was no wind to ruffle the water. She was lying just as she went down; her masts gone close to the deck, her bows stove in, and the hull canted over a little to one side, in which position she was held by the sharp, projecting rocks. Our Chinese sailors were good divers, and with their assistance, aided by a strong windlass, we soon had both the ship's anchors, and about a hundred and fifty fathom of chain cable on board our lighter. This was a pretty good haul to begin with; but these apparently were the only things that could be obtained."

"The ship's deck, which was as firm and solid as ever, effectually prevented our reaching any part of her cargo, and resisted all our efforts to break it up. This was particularly vexatious, as the between decks was stowed with a description of merchandize which in all probability was wholly undamaged by water. The ship, although scarcely carrying out the old joke of being freighted with 'rim and missionaries for the coast of Africa,' was partially loaded with pipes of brandy for the East India market. Another week was frittered away in fruitless efforts to make an opening in the deck. Our month's leave had almost expired, and we must either return at once, or have our names recorded on the ship's books as deserters. This matter was duly considered, and having decided that it was quite as well to be hung for an old sheep as a lamb, we renewed our exertions to lay hold of the 'old sheep' which was beneath the vessel's deck."

"Why not sink a keg of powder under her bottom and blow her up?" asked Joe, with animation, as we were one day considering the chances."

"Why, that's all well enough, as far as sinking the keg of powder goes," replied I, "but how the deuce are you going to get the fire to it?"

"True!" replied Joe, "that is something of a puzzle."

"The solution of this important question caused my shipmate to scratch his head prodigiously, as with an air of profound perplexity he paced the deck through the whole morning watch."

"Ah, I have it!" he exclaimed, at length. "What a chuckle-head I was not to think of it before!"

"A small pocket pistol, capped and cocked, was fastened inside of a large keg of gunpowder, with the end of the lead line attached to the trigger. A piece of oiled silk, while it allowed sufficient play to the string, prevented the ingress of water; the whole concern was then covered with a coating of pitch, and carefully sunk in a proper position beneath the ship's bottom. Our lighter was hauled off several hundred feet from the spot and the string pulled. A tremendous explosion followed, throwing a column of water fifty or sixty feet into the air, and causing our lighter to quiver as though she had struck a rock. The hubbub and commotion having subsided, we had the satisfaction to find that the hulk had parted jist forward of the mainmast, leaving almost the entire cargo exposed."

"To make a long story short, we soon had our vessel loaded to the water's edge with a miscellaneous assortment; and having decided not to return to the port from which we sailed, the vessel's course was directed toward Batavia, where we arrived in safety, after a somewhat prolonged passage. Almost the first thing we saw on entering the harbor, was H. B. M. frigate Intolerable."

"That craft is bound to do us an ugly turn before we part company," said Joe, as we swept by her, toward the town."

"We found a purchaser for one half our trumpery almost as soon as our anchor was in the ground. I thought then, and I still think we didn't get half enough for it. But eight thousand dollars in cash was not to be sneezed at, so we jumped at the first offer. We had several good offers for the remainder, and were hesitating, like the ass between the two bundles of hay, when, as we were tramping through the town one morning, who should we meet face to face but the captain of the Intolerable. He gave us a look as black as an opposition candidate's character, and passed on. I didn't much fancy the spirit of his eye, and apprehended evil; nor were my apprehensions removed upon observing that we were dogged wherever we went by a couple of British marines, and upon returning to our vessel, we also found that, through the English captain's suggestions, the Dutch government had forbidden any further sale of the property, until there could be examinations, and inquiries, and I don't know what all, which meant nothing more nor less than to deprive us of the stuff altogether. The Englishman even went so far as to manufacture some cock-and-bull story about what he had known of us before, so as to induce the government officials to lay violent claws upon what funds we had already received, and to do them justice, they were no ways backward."

"Seeing how things were likely to go, it was decided between us that Joe should remain where he was, to keep up our claim on the property until some American man-of-war came into port, while I should take passage, with the money, on board a homeward bound ship then lying in the harbor, with her foretop-sail loosed, all ready for sea. So now you see what I'm going to Washington for, don't ye?"

"Well, good luck to ye, my lad. I hope you'll be successful," I said, as he went on board the boat, which was now casting off her fasts."

"No fear but what I shall be successful," he returned. "I'm going to see the President and have a talk with him, and if he don't do the right thing, somebody will catch a confounded whaling, and 'twont be me, I promise you. That's the way to legislate now-a-days! If they don't do the handsome thing, why, just hammer 'em. Nothing like it to bring 'em to their senses."

And the boat swept away from the pier. How my marine friend made out in his interview with the President, and also how it has fared with Franklin, I am alike unable to say. I incline to the opinion, however, that government must have done all that was necessary in the matter, from the fact of my not having heard of our chief magistrate's receiving a "confounded whaling," or indeed, any assault having been attempted."

COFFEE-SHOPS IN BEYROUT.

They have a lawn outside, where small stools like a cubic foot are placed for the accommodation of the customer; a raised fireplace is in the corner, whereupon the coffee-pot is heard simmering, whilst immediately above it are two shelves where the nargheles are placed. The customer here enjoys the luxury of a smoke and a cup of coffee for the trifling sum of ten paras, about two farthings. Some of the large coffee-shops have the appendage of a story-teller, who comes of an evening, and either entertains the audience with a story from the "Arabian Nights," or relates to them some gallant deed of some deceased warrior. These stories are well received. In relating the story, the speaker does not stand on a platform, as in the West. The customers are divided to two sides, and an open space is left between them. In this space he walks to and fro. He begins the story by clapping his hands, which at once secures for him breathless attention. In place of the "Ladies and gentlemen" of the West, the story-teller, on clapping his hands for attention, addresses them thus—"My honored sirs." He speaks a little, then helps himself to a whiff of narghele from one of the customers, who gladly offers it to him; he speaks a little more, takes another whiff from the narghele of another, and so on until he is done.—Syria and the Syrians.

RAILROAD STATION, SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS.

They are fine buildings and add much to the appearance of the town. The growth of the towns in Illinois, though almost unprecedented, has by no means reached its climax. The various railroads which intersect the State have but just commenced their work of developing its resources. An immense amount of the best of land is as yet unimproved, and its occupation will materially contribute to the rapid growth of the cities. Illinois is pre-eminently an agricultural State. The soil in some of the river bottoms is twenty-five feet deep, and the prairie land is but little inferior in quality. Lippincott's Gazetteer, a very reliable work, furnishes us with some important statistics in reference to the climate, soil and productions, from which we borrow the following particulars:—Illinois, extending through more than five degrees of latitude, has considerable variety of climate. Though somewhat milder than the Atlantic States in the same parallels of latitude, there is great irregularity in the seasons. Generally, there will not fall six inches of snow at one time, which does not lie more than a few days, but at distant intervals the rivers are frozen for two or three months, and the snow lies on the ground for that period of time. The summers are hot, but tempered by moderate breezes from the prairies. Cattle are often left out of doors during the whole winter. With regard to soil, the Great American Bottom, lying on the Mississippi, between the mouths of the Kaskaskia and Missouri Rivers, is of exceeding fertility, and has been cultivated for more than a century without any apparent diminution of its productive powers. The bottom is about 80 miles in length, covering an area of 280,000 acres. On the river side is a strip of heavy timber, with dense underwood, which extends for two or three miles. The rest is mostly prairie to the eastern limit, which is terminated by a chain of sandy or rocky bluffs from 50 to 200 feet in height. This fine region is not, however, healthy, though probably a thorough system of drainage would render it so. The Rock River country is another highly fertile district on the Rock River and its branches; of the same character are the regions about the Sangamon, Kaskaskia and other rivers. Other portions of Illinois are fertile, but those we have particularized are pre-eminently so, frequently yielding 40 bushels of wheat and 100 bushels of Indian corn to the acre. This is especially true of the narrow bottoms immediately adjacent to the shores of the rivers. The prairies of this State are peculiarly adapted to the raising of dairy stock. These prairies are beautiful features of the scenery, of vast extent, decked with flowers of every hue that can gratify the eye, and covered with waving grass, conveying, besides their quiet landscape beauty, a feeling of sublimity from their vastness, similar to that created by a view of the ocean. They are in fact oceans of verdure. Besides wheat and corn, the other agricultural staples are oats, Irish potatoes, hay, butter and cheese. Besides these, there are large quantities of rye, wool, beans, peas, barley, buckwheat, fruits, garden vegetables, and some tobacco, sweet potatoes, wine, grass seeds, hops, hemp, flax, silk, maple-sugar and molasses, beeswax and honey, and the castor bean, are produced. Of indigenous fruits, there are a variety of berries, plums, grapes, crab-apples, wild cherries, persimmons and the pawpaw (a sweet, pulpy fruit, somewhat like the banana). Of orchard fruits, the apple and peach flourish best, but pears and quinces are cultivated with ease. Of nuts, the shellbark or hickory, walnut, butter-nut and pecan abound. According to the census reports of 1850, there were 76,208 farms in Illinois, containing 5,039,545 acres of improved land, and producing 9,414,577 bushels wheat, 83,364 of rye, 57,646,984 of Indian corn, 10,087,241 of oats, 82,814 of peas and beans, 2,514,861 of Irish potatoes, 157,433 of sweet potatoes, 110,795 of barley, 184,504 of buckwheat, 841,394 pounds of tobacco, 2,150,113 of wool, 12,526,543 of butter, 1,278,225 of cheese, 601,952 tons of hay, 17,807 bushels of grass seeds, 160,063 pounds of flax, 248,904 of maple sugar, 869,444 of beeswax and honey, live stock value at $4,972,286, orchard products at $446,049, and market products at $127,494. In our number for July 26th, we published some other interesting statistics in relation to this State, in connection with an emblematic picture by Billings. There were in Illinois 12,282 inhabitants in 1810; 55,210 in 1820; 157,445 in 1830; 476,183 in 1840, and 851,470 in 1850, of whom 445,544 were white males, 400,490 females; 2777 colored males and 2659 colored females. The ratio of increase in the last ten years preceding 1850, was nearly 79 per cent., notwithstanding there were in other States about 50,000 citizens born in Illinois. This population was divided among 149,153 families.

WOMEN OF NAPLES.

You have heard of the bright eyes and raven tresses, and music-language of the Neapolitans; but I can assure you there is nothing like it here—that is to say, among the lower classes. The only difference that I can detect between them and the American Indians is, that the latter are the more beautiful of the two. The color is the same, the hair very like indeed, and as to the "soft bastard Latin" they speak, it is one of the most abominable dialects I ever heard. I know this is rather shocking to one's ideas of Italian women. I am sure I was prepared to view them in a favorable—nay, in a poetical light; but amid all the charms and excitements of this romantic land, I cannot see otherwise. The old women are hags, and the young women are dirty, slipshod slatterns. Talk about "bright-eyed Italian maids!" Among our lower classes there are five beauties to one good-looking woman here. It is nonsense to expect a beauty among a population that live in filth, and eat the vilest substances to escape the horrors of starvation. But it is otherwise as to form. In form the Italians excel us. Larger, fuller, they naturally acquire a finer gait and bearing. It is astonishing that our ladies should persist in that ridiculous notion, that a small waist is, and, per necessita, must be beautiful. Why, many an Italian woman would cry for vexation if she possessed such a waist as some of our ladies acquire, only by the longest, painfulest process. I have sought the reason of this difference, and can see no other than that the Italians have their glorious statuary continually before them as models, and hence endeavor to assimilate themselves to them; whereas our fashionables have no models except those French stuffed figures in the windows of the milliners' shops. Why, if an artist should presume to make a statue with the shape that seems to be regarded with us as the perfection of harmonious proportion, he would be laughed out of the city. It is a standing objection against the taste of our women the world over, that they would practically assert that a French milliner understands how they should be made better than nature herself.—Headley's Letters from Italy.

PARIS IN 1856.

A Scottish gentleman visiting Paris writes:—"Paris is indeed wonderfully changed since I last visited it—changed in every way. The streets are clean and kept in excellent order, and the police, although partly armed, are quite as civil and respectful as those of London. Nor is there any external indication that we strangers, as well as the Parisians, are living under a despotism which will not allow of any conversation about political matters. Still, so far as one can judge from external appearances, there is great order and skillful arrangements everywhere in Paris. Vice is at least not seen walking the streets; all the Paris gambling-houses have been shut up; the sellers of immoral books put in prison, their authors severely punished, and order and decency firmly maintained. Yet the mon is not popular with the thinking classes, although they acknowledge his administrative ability. However, all is for the best at present; and as the emperor rides about without an escort, we cannot help thinking that he is not generally unpopular. When I visited Paris first, some thirty years ago, one could manage to live well and cheaply at the same time, although in little accessories there was room for much amendment. The streets were then very dirty, the carriages bad, and there was little appearance of wealth, and no improvements going forward in the streets and houses. Napoleon may well say, 'Nous avons changé tout cela!' The streets are now being widened, and new houses erected, in place of old ones knocked down, all through Paris, and already the city presents everywhere indications of having renewed its youth. It is really and truly, now, a magnificent city: the houses are all palaces; the common stairs in most of the new buildings would put to shame the vaunted palaces of our great nobility in London, and the cleanliness of the stairs is quite wonderful. Nor are the houses less so when you get into the interior. To be sure, you have few carpets, but the floors of the lobbies and rooms are all neatly parquetted in oak, which is kept so well waxed as to make it shining, and rather ticklish to walk upon for those unaccustomed to it."—Art Journal.

A RUSSIAN FOUNDLING HOSPITAL.

Colonel Lake, in his "Kars and our Captivity in Russia," says:—"I was much interested in the temple of St. Saviour, which was being erected. Round it are groups of figures, twice as large as life, in alto relievo, cut in hard white stone, and attached to the walls by iron hooks. These figures represent scriptural events, such as 'David's Victory over Goliath,' in which the faces struck me as very beautiful. Before these figures were finished, the artist died; but as little remains to be finished, the original design cannot be much interfered with. I was much delighted with the Institute for Orphans and Enfantes Trouvés, certainly one of the finest buildings I have ever seen. We visited it in company with Madame de Metz, who is the directress, and much beloved by the young girls, and with Madame de Belobusky, a very interesting, clever woman. We saw all the children and young ladies. The noble charity is under government patronage, and, besides providing for the Enfantes Trouvés, offers an asylum to the widows of officers. Each infant has a nurse, and a certain number are accommodated in a room airy and capacious. Each nurse has a bed, and a little cradle by its side, all exquisitely clean, and the washing department in each room is perfect. The elder girls are divided into classes, and are dressed in green gowns with white jackets. I saw them all at mass in a beautiful chapel, which was highly decorated with marble pillars, and in very good taste. We afterward watched them at dinner, a most excellent repast, consisting of soup, meat and pudding, all of which I tasted. They speak French and German, and are taught drawing, music, etc. In short, they receive a first rate education to qualify them for the situation of governess, in which capacity they leave on attaining the age of twenty. I heard them play and sing, and repeat poetry in different languages. The drawing-hall was hung round with the performances of the young ladies. The directress, in the kindest manner, begged that I would select a drawing, and accept it as a souvenir of the institution. I took one in water colors, beautifully executed, which I value highly. There is also a room for gymnastics, and, in short, there did not seem to be anything wanting either for their instruction or comfort."—New York Journal of Commerce.

MADAME IDA PFEIFFER.

We present herewith an authentic portrait of Madame Ida Pfeiffer, the great female traveller, who may perhaps be regarded as the most wonderful woman of the age, for she has travelled more than any of the celebrated men of the middle ages, or indeed of the present, for she has not only visited the Continents of Europe, Africa, and Asia, but America and the Polynesia; she has traversed over 130,000 miles by water, and 18,000 by land. In appearance, she is slight, and rather under the middle size; her complexion is somewhat darkened by exposure to weather and the heat of the climates in which she has travelled. She is generally regarded as plain looking, but an English gentleman who met her at Vienna, said: "I cannot understand how any one, who has seen her while conversing, can say so. Her smile is particularly sweet and captivating. Her soul beams from her eyes, and I can compare her smile to nothing less than the sunlight darting from behind a cloud. She is very unassuming in her manners; animated and easy in her conversation. She spoke of her travels in an unaffected style, and her thoughts flew in a moment from one part of the world to the opposite, whenever she related a story and wished to draw a contrast between different people. She has been where no white man has ever dared to venture—amidst cannibals in both hemispheres—and I laid three of my fingers in a scar on the upper part of her left arm, inflicted by a cannibal of Patagonia." Madame Pfeiffer was born at Vienna in 1797. In early childhood she displayed traits of character which foreshadowed the future "strong-minded woman." An illustration of her fixity of purpose is not without interest. When Napoleon was residing at Schonbrunn, after his entry into Vienna, he was to hold a grand review of his troops, at which all the inhabitants of Vienna went, from a desire to see the greatest general of his time. Ida, who was then eleven years old, had learned from books and persons by whom she was surrounded, to look upon him as a tyrant and an oppressor of her country, and she consequently entertained the most intense hatred towards him. She had refused to go when asked by her mother, but the latter not wishing to be deprived of the pleasure, took her daughter by force to the review. They obtained a good station, from whence they could see all that passed. At length the procession began to move, and as a body of officers were riding by, Ida, in order that her eyes might not be polluted with the sight of the man she so thoroughly detested, turned her back towards them. The emperor was not, however, amongst them. Her mother, annoyed at her obstinacy, took her by the shoulders and turned her back again, but Ida, determined not to look at him, resolutely closed her eyes, and kept them shut till the emperor and all his retinue were passed. In her preface to her first work, she tells us of the intense desire for travel she experienced during her childhood, but which circumstances prevented her from indulging. In 1820 she married Dr. Pfeiffer, of Lemberg. By this union she had two sons, one of whom followed the musical profession, and studied under the great Mendelssohn; and the other became a merchant. On the death of her husband, the desires of her youth were renewed in all their vigor, and she thought that having fulfilled her duty to her family, in bringing them up and establishing them in life, she was not acting contrary to her duty in following the bent of her inclinations. She knew that dangers, difficulties, and even death, might befall her, but should any of these happen to her during her travels, she would thank God for the sweet hours she passed in beholding the wonders of his creation; and she begs her readers not to impute to her in her travels a desire for notoriety alone, nor to judge her by the common opinion that such a life is not befitting a woman. When she had, by several years of strict economy, amassed a sufficient sum, she set off upon her first pilgrimage to Jerusalem and the Holy Land, "for," says she, "I always felt the most intense longing to tread the spot rendered so holy by the footsteps of our Redeemer." She returned safe, filled with delight at her success, and published her first work, entitled "The Travels of a Vienna Lady to the Holy Land," a work of great interest, and bearing the impress of truthfulness in every line. Unsated in her thirst for travel, she next visited the extreme north of Europe, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and Denmark, the result of her adventure being published in Pösth, in 1846. She now carried into execution a project of making a voyage round the world. This she accomplished during the years 1846 to 1848. She left Vienna May 1, 1846, and arrived at Rio de Janeiro, after a stormy passage, Sept. 18 of the same year. After travelling through the Brazils, Ida went round Cape Horn, travelled through Chili, visited Otaheite, set sail for China, and then went to India. Thence she went up the Tigris, to visit the interesting ruins of Babylon and Nineveh, then wandered through Khoordistan and Persia, passed the Caucasus, and travelled through the south of Russia, thence to Constantinople, and through Greece, home. When we remember the dangerous regions she traversed, we are astonished at the intrepidity of a woman travelling alone, amidst the most savage tribes on the face of the earth, passing from country to country, from tribe to tribe, braving dangers, fatigue, hunger and thirst; and it is indeed impossible to withhold our admiration from the lady who could undergo all these trials and hardships, and display a courage that very few of the opposite sex can boast of. But her very helplessness was her best protection. In 1851 she sailed from London for the Cape of Good Hope, and thence took ship for Singapore, to visit the islands of the Indian archipelago; after this she went to Sarawak, in Borneo, thence through the dangerous country of the Dayaks to the Dutch possessions in the interior and on the west of the island. After visiting the Moluccas, she went to California, and thence home. She has now started once more on an extensive tour, intending it to be her last. During all her journeyings she has enjoyed excellent health, and says herself that she possesses "nerves and sinews of steel." It should be added that she has not travelled to obtain a reputation, but for her own satisfaction and improvement.

MADAME IDA PFEIFFER.

ASYLUM FOR FATHERLESS CHILDREN, DENMARK HILL, ENGLAND.

This institution is one of the many noble charities of England. It was founded, about twelve years ago, for the benevolent object of relieving fatherless children, without respect to place, sex or religious distinction, the only qualification, in fact, being that the child should be destitute, and above the condition of the pauper. The children were to be received at any age (from their birth, if necessary), and are all retained and provided for, the boys until fourteen, and the girls until fifteen years of age. The institution founded on this liberal principle has, it appears, enjoyed a career of uninterrupted and increasing prosperity. Since its commencement it has received 314 children, and it has now no fewer than 134 within its walls. It is sustained by the voluntary contributions of the benevolent; all who subscribe are members of the institution, and participate in the management of its affairs, and it now flourishes under the immediate patronage of the queen. The new building, which, it will be seen by our engravings, is of great extent and of great architectural beauty, is now in the process of erection, and will cost about $100,000. The ground is about two miles from Croydon. The site is remarkably fine, and the building will form a striking addition to the landscape. The plan is in some respects peculiar, but the architect has kept in view the bold undulations of the ground, and has arranged his design in three well marked groups, which will be appropriated to the infants, the boys, and the girls respectively. The structure, which, it is calculated, will accommodate at least 350 children, will be in an Italian style, and it will possess a frontage of no less than 350 feet, with wings, giving it a depth of about 200. The ornamental portions of the work are to be executed in freestone, and the great masses of surface in Devonshire marble. Altogether the building is well worthy of the design, and the institution is an honor to the land which well boasts its multitude of charitable and beneficent channels of relief to the suffering.

ROSES AMONG THE ROMANS.

Whatever the time of the year, the Roman must have a rose in his wreath. "The commonest union was violet, myrtle and rose." Stout old gentlemen who wished to drink unusually deep without feeling unpleasant consequences, wore double wreaths about their heads and necks, as preservatives. The generous rose, however, did something for the ladies also. When the renowned and not over scrupulous Aspasia was a child, she had a wart on her face which defied nurses, doctors and caustic. The pretty child cried herself to sleep one night at the blot on her beauty; and lo! while she slumbered, she saw Venus's dove, and the dove told her to take some rose leaves from the statue of the goddess, and lay them to her neck. The girl did so, full of faith, and she became as perfect in beauty as in intellect, and helped Pericles to corrupt the morals of the Athenians with infinite elegance. That the rose might be so drugged as to poison the wine into which it was thrown, and with which it was often drunk when the toppers were at the height of the jollity, may be seen in Pliny; which passage many evil persons have read to infamous purpose, including Tawell, who thereby committed murder contrary to scientific evidence, but happily did not escape the gallows. In what is called the classical period, roses seem to have been employed on every occasion from birth to death, inclusive, and to have made a part in every ceremony, public or private, joyous or saddening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

THE OLD CHURCH.

BY JAMES F. FITZ.

No gorgeous edifice with columns fluted,
Or towering steeple, stretching heavenward—
No lofty pile to ostentation suited,
Is yonder church, where beaves the velvet sward.

No—for the temple on that hill erected,
Was built by Puritans in years agone;
Whose bones now rest in peace, where they selected
The quiet graveyard from the grassy lawn.

Its time-worn beams and rafters bear the legends
And stories wild of early pioneers,
Who, in the wild, unbroken forest regions,
Commenced a settlement in early years.

Here, where the smoke from Indian lodge ascended,
And where the dark, primeval forest rose—
The prayerful accents of the Pilgrims blended
With solemn chant and wail of Indian foes.

And here came hardy men and women tender,
And youths and maidens on the Sabbath day—
To praise with hymn and prayer the Great Defender,
And unto him for preservation pray.

Here, when the demon War his torch had lighted,
And bands went forth to seek the Indian foe,
With women pale and children darkly frightened,
They came to ask a blessing on their blow.

Such scenes beheld this temple, now decaying,
In old colonial times, forever gone;
And Time his final stroke appears delaying,
While all around his ceaseless work goes on.

He still preserves this shrine from desolation,
A silent monitor for us, to stand;
A spectacle for serious contemplation—
A relic of the ancient Pilgrim band.

THE RICH COUSIN.

BY MRS. MARY MAYNARD.

"But, my dear father, he has had undisturbed possession so long, that it is cruel to reduce him to beggary now."

"Cruel! You know nothing of the sweets of revenge, boy, or you would not say that. Think you that I have waited all these years to gratify a purpose, and now when the time has come, give it up because it is cruel?"

"But his wife and children? Surely, you will not—cannot punish the innocent for the guilty?"

"In that is my revenge. What would poverty be to Edward Leicester alone? No, no; he must see his family stripped of all the luxuries they have so wrongfully enjoyed; he must lose his proud position, and labor for their very bread; he must encounter all the horrors of the most absolute poverty, before I shall be content to say I am satisfied."

"Father, this is horrible! You will crush out all the love and reverence my sainted mother so carefully sought to instill into my heart. I do not believe now that you can be serious in this matter, or that you will load your conscience with so much guilt. We are wealthy. Even now I am at a loss how to spend the income that is mine—what do we want with your cousin's possessions?" Let him live in peace. It will be a sweeter revenge than any you can take."

"Silence, boy! This is no affair for you to meddle in; and though my fond indulgence gives you much license, beware how you abuse it by interfering in what you do not understand. I have told you my plans now, knowing that you would find them out on our arrival in England, not because I wanted your advice. The instant I set foot on my native land, I shall take steps to carry out those plans, and no impertinent interference of yours can prevent their succeeding. You have mentioned your mother—another act of disobedience. 'Tis pity you do not resemble her as much in mind, as you do in person. I never had occasion twice to remind her of her duty. And now let this conversation cease, never to be renewed. Whatever I do, I will not be questioned; and I warn you now never again to dare my anger by like conduct."

Dear reader, after such a conversation, need we say that Col. Leicester was an overbearing tyrant—hard-hearted and revengeful, domineering, often cruel to his dependents, pitiless to his foes, feared by his friends, with but one tender spot in his heart, and that occupied by his only son.

True, the colonel had loved his wife—a beautiful, gentle creature—who never in her life presumed to contradict him, or dared to think differently from his will. But she was born to be cherished and sheltered, and the cold formality of her life withered the warm young heart pining for its mate. Her husband wished her to dress like a princess; and to please him, she robbed her slender figure in the richest satins, her pale brow arched under the sparkling gems that pressed it, and diamonds glittered on her fair neck and arms. But she sighed for the days when free and happy she had wandered amid the hills of her "Highland home," and shuddered at the thought that under the burning Eastern sky her grave should be made.

Once only did Mrs. Leicester venture to ask her husband to let her "see her home once more;" then silenced by his cold refusal, she un murmuringly submitted to her fate, and calmly resigned herself to die. It was an unexpected piece of rebellion on the part of his gentle partner, that astonished Colonel Leicester when informed that she was no more. He had told her that he wished her to get better—in fact, she must get better—and she had disobeyed him; hence his sorrow was largely mingled with anger, and he forlode her name ever to be mentioned in his presence. This prohibition fell heavily on his son, who, idolizing the memory of his lost mother, could with difficulty refrain from speaking of her; and favorite as he was, this was a fault that always drew on him his father's anger and reproach.

At the time our story opens, young Leicester was in his eighteenth year. His father did not speak the truth when he expressed a wish that he had resembled his mother in temper; for in his secret heart did the old man rejoice at the evidence of a fine, manly spirit already manifested by his son. And the handsome, noble-looking youth possessed great influence over his parent, though not sufficient to turn him from his revengeful purposes. Brought up in the East amid scenes and with habits foreign to his nature, young Leicester had joyfully left his native land to seek the early home of his parents, and the knowledge of his father's purposes had been the first cloud that had overshadowed his happiness. One week after that conversation they landed in England.

Had England been searched over, a happier man than Edward Leicester could scarce have been produced at the time we commenced this little history. The devoted husband of an excellent and amiable wife, the proud and happy father of three lovely children, the possessor of a magnificent home, and an income more than adequate to meet his utmost wishes, surrounded by friends and a prosperous tenantry, what could man wish for more?

And Edward Leicester knew his privileges, and was thankful for them. No man could say that in word or deed he had offended him, and endless were the blessings bestowed on the kind landlord, the liberal master, and the firm friend. No formal ceremony, no forced show of humility prompted the greeting that everywhere met the Leisters, that taught the cottager's wife to curtsy, and the laborer to touch his hat at their approach.

And Edward Leicester loved his people, and never lost an opportunity of increasing their comfort, and adding to their means. He built them new cottages, he planted them fruit trees, he gave them a school, and he encouraged education. His wife, no less energetic and enthusiastic, attended to other wants, and unlike many of her station, she sought for and relieved their necessities, ere she expected them to comply with all her wishes.

Again we say, a happier man, a happier family, or one that better deserved prosperity, could scarce have been found in all England. But sorrow and trial were in store, misfortune as complete as it was unexpected, and poverty as distressing as it was undeserved.

"My dear Mary, you look sad this evening. Surely, that is a scene to inspire you with pleasant thoughts." And Edward Leicester passed his arm round his wife's waist, and leading her to the open window, pointed to the lawn on which their children were merrily sporting.

"I feel sad, Edward," was the low response. "An unusual presentiment of evil has shadowed me all day, nor can I look on my children without a feeling of terror."

"My dear wife, this is unusual for you. Certainly, at present we have no reason to apprehend any trouble; but should misfortunes come, we must meet them with fortitude. Earth's bitterest trial, poverty, we have no reason to dread."

Alas for the confidence in earthly riches! That day week, Edward Leicester and his family were far away from the scene of their happiness, homeless, almost penniless, and with the humiliating consciousness that for long years they had been appropriating the inheritance of another.

"It is time to talk over our plans for the future, my Mary," said the unhappy husband and father, as the family gathered together on the first night after their arrival in the humble London lodging-house that must henceforth be their home. "Our means are barely sufficient for present wants, and I must lose no time in seeking employment. At present I am unable to determine what I had better try first."

"My husband, this is the cruellest blow of all. Freely would I have yielded up all we loved so well—freely have endured poverty and privation; but to see you labor for our very bread, O, my Edward, it is hard, very hard." And the loving wife, who without a murmur had parted with the luxuries and comforts long use had made necessities, wept at the thought of her husband's trials.

"Mary, you know that for years I have indulged my love of painting as an amusement, and have been called no mean artist. What better plan can I adopt, than now to make it a source of profit?"

It was with sincere sorrow that Mrs. Leicester gave her consent to this proposal; but feeling at last that without something of the kind her children must perish from want, she smothered her grief, and her smile and kind caress cheered the heart of the weary artist when, in long after days, he was sinking under the united effects of incessant toil and repeated disappointment.

Colonel Leicester felt that his revenge was complete, when those whom he had employed to watch the proceedings of the ruined family, informed him that not only was his cousin laboring for an existence, but his wife also had felt herself called on to lend her assistance, and was even then toiling day and night to meet their increasing expenses.

"Ha, revenge is sweet! Truly, this is an hour worth living for," was his exulting exclamation on hearing of their poverty.

His son made no remark; he had long felt how useless was remonstrance. But the sum destined to the purchase of a splendid addition to his "sportsmanlike possessions" found its way to the humble home of his relatives, where it proved a seasonable and most welcome gift.

"Can Charles have relented, and taken pity on his victims?" was Edward's exclamation on beholding the bank notes.

"It is not from him. Too well do I know his implacable nature to imagine this most welcome present is his." Mrs. Leicester found it very hard to forgive the man who with abundant wealth had turned them all penniless into the world.

"Never mind, mama, who sent it," exclaimed little Marian, the pet of the household; "I will pray for blessings on our kind friend for sending us money to buy sister Alice medicine, and brother Charley books."

The mother looked at her sick child—her delicate, beautiful Alice—on whose sensitive nature her parents' distresses had produced a most alarming effect, and a fervent benediction was bestowed on the unknown for the much-needed assistance. Three months after, when Colonel Leicester heard that his cousin's eldest daughter was no more, he renewed his rejoicings with almost fiendish delight.

"You little thought when you rejected me with scorn, Mary Wyndham, that the day should come when I would mock at your sorrow and rejoice at your bereavement; nor did your proud husband dream that his defeated rival would one day crush him to the dust, and exult over his fallen pride."

But Colonel Leicester was far from being at ease, even when triumphing at the success of his schemes. Knowing the generous nature of his son, he was in daily dread of hearing him avow a determination to visit his relatives, even in defiance of the curse he had threatened to pronounce on him in case of such disobedience. But young Leicester had been too early impressed with the reverence due to his parent, to hazard so fearful a consequence. The dead mother's teachings were strong in his heart, and he felt compelled to content himself with occasionally sending his cousins such sums of money as he could venture on without exciting his father's suspicions. It was therefore with sincere pleasure that the colonel gave him permission to travel for a few years in company with a most estimable gentleman about to leave his native land in search of health.

We must now pass over a space of six years, during which the relative positions of the two families were but little changed. Edward Leicester's circumstances had slightly improved, but he still found it necessary to labor at his pencil for a maintenance. His son Charles, now nearly eighteen, was in a situation of but little profit, but which bid fair to reward him some day.

The colonel had grown very old in those few years. He had discovered that revenge was not quite as sweet as he had at first imagined. Unpleasant thoughts would arise at times, and something very near akin to remorse, whenever he thought on the child he could not but feel his cruelty had murdered. Again it was annoying to reflect that he had made himself an object of hatred to his people; that one and all detested him, and drew unpleasant comparisons between him and their former landlord. His son, too, gave him many a heart-pang; for well he knew that, disguise it as he might, the noble young man in his inmost soul looked with horror on his father's guilty revenge. Altogether, it was not wonderful that Colonel Leicester looked old, that his hair had grown gray, and the care lines had come thickly on his countenance.

Our next scene opens on the banks of one of those beautiful "Lochs," the pride of Scotland and the delight of poets. A blue sky and bright sunshine were not wanting; nor fine old trees, nor distant hills and rocks—all that artists love to paint and poets to sing of. But the loveliest object in our picture was a fair young girl, who, gazing thoughtfully on the blue waters, looked the very personification of graceful beauty. She stood on a mossy bank, one hand clasping the low, drooping branch of an overhanging tree, the other carelessly holding a gipsy hat, the long blue ribbon of which trailed at her feet. Her white dress was perfectly plain, and there was something in her whole attire that showed her one who wore no ornaments; while her exceeding beauty at once told the beholder that there was little need of them.

Long she stood in silent thought, all unconscious that one was gazing on her in rapt astonishment, with quickly throbbing heart and strange emotions. But he advances a step, and the spell is broken. With a start the maiden raises her head and beholds the intruder. The next instant she makes a backward movement—her balance is lost; for a second she seems falling into the deep waters—another, and the stranger's arm is round her; he clasps her to his breast, and she feels that she is saved from a fearful death.

After such an introduction, was it likely that they should be other than friends? They met again and again in those shady walks on the banks of the beautiful Loch, and Marian Leicester (for the maiden was none other than she we last saw as a child) gave her heart into the keeping of the handsome stranger. And stranger he truly was, for not even did she know the name of him who had established so great an influence over her future life.

She loved him passionately, devotedly, with all the strength of an innocent, unworried heart; and he returned her affection with a love no less sincere and pure. Yet never for an instant did the young girl forget the duty she owed her parents. No promise would she make him, and he revered her for her filial respect.

"Fain would I call you mine, Marian," he said, when the time came that the maiden must return to her English home. "Happy should I be to call you my own betrothed, but I dare not ask you to do aught displeasing to your parents. All I may say is, do not forget me. We shall meet again, when I may openly avow my name, and with the sanction of your friends, claim your promise. Until then, darling, keep me in your heart, and never, never doubt my truth. I shall come to you some time. It may be very shortly—it may not be for years; but I shall come—never doubt that."

And Marian promised all he asked, and then the farewell words were spoken. For one instant she was clasped to his heart, his first kiss was pressed on her brow, and they had parted.

The night after her arrival at home, Marian Leicester told her parents all. Very slightly did she allude to her feelings on the subject, but readily the mother's heart divined all her child might have expressed.

"God shield my darling from the misery of a blighted, disappointed existence!" was the mother's prayer.

"Let us trust in Providence, my wife. That our child loves an honorable man, his conduct proves. I am deeply grieved at the course of events, but they might have been worse. Our Marian has returned to us with recovered health and strength; let us not repine that a new love has brought light to her eyes, and joy to her young heart."

The father's words seemed prophetic. Marian Leicester—the quiet, reserved Marian—was wonderfully changed. Her merry songs were ever sounding through the house, a sweet, contented smile was ever on her countenance, and her words, always kind and pleasant, now took a tenderer tone.

It was summer when she parted from her lover. For six months the remembrance of those happy days was as a pleasant dream; but Christmas came, and with it a token that another also remembered. Mr. Leicester looked sad as he perused the few lines addressed to himself; but he placed on his child's hand the costly gem her unknown lover had besought him to allow her to accept, and though pained at the continued mystery, there was nothing he could reasonably feel displeased with in the letter itself. On the contrary, it breathed sentiments the most honorable to the stranger.

On Marian the letter and its accompanying present produced very little effect, and her father felt some surprise at her indifference.

"Are you aware of the value of that ring, my child?" he said, one day, looking at the sparkling gem on her finger. "Do you know that none but a very wealthy man could make you a present of so valuable a diamond?"

"I always knew he was wealthy, dear father, but that makes no difference. I should have been as happy had his letter come alone. I needed nothing to remind me of my promise."

The winter passed, and when the spring came, Charles Leicester received an offer from his employer to go out to China and transact business for him—an offer so good that the young man felt unable to refuse. It was a sad parting for the whole family; but none dared make objections to what was so obviously for the benefit of the beloved son and brother. After his departure, Edward Leicester's health declined visibly. He lost the energy that had hitherto characterized his endeavors to maintain his family, and again they were made to suffer all the evils of poverty.

Early in the spring they heard that Colonel Leicester and his son had returned to India, the health of the former having suffered severely from his short sojourn in his native land. The estate was given in charge of an agent. The friend, whose secret aid had so materially assisted the stricken family, appeared to have forgotten them. Marian's unknown lover preserved the strictest silence, and the summer passed sadly to the parents and child, in the gloomy old house they had made their home.

Before the autumn came, serious fears were entertained about the safety of the ship in which Charles had gone passenger. This was the crowning of their misery. Even Marian's brave heart yielded to this great sorrow; and but for one hope, she would probably have given way to despair. As it was, in her deepest grief there came the remembrance of her promise, and she fought bravely with her fears, lest health and beauty should leave her. She knew that in his eyes she had been exceeding fair—must he return to find her a miserable invalid? No, she would hope on; something whispered to her heart that her brother would yet return, and they should be happy.

The old proverb says, when affairs get to the worst, they generally "take a turn for the better;" and it proved so in Edward Leicester's case. Their money all gone, himself confined to a sick bed, his wife vainly striving to earn enough to support them, and Marian worn out with anxiety and toil, nothing could be more gloomy than their prospects, when a letter arrived from Charles—a letter doubly welcome, as the token of his safety and the bearer of welcome assistance.

The same post brought another surprise in the announcement of Colonel Leicester's death, and a letter from his own hand, written on his death-bed. In it he bequeathed his English property to Marian, on condition that she became the wife of his son. Of her he spoke affectionately—her parents he had evidently not forgotten.

This letter was a cruel blow to the gentle hearted girl, and was the cause of more suffering than all her previous troubles combined. She felt that one word of hers would place her parents in affluence forever—removing them effectually from the fear of poverty or want. But could she speak it? Could she forever crush out of her heart all those sweet hopes that through so many trials had sustained her drooping spirits? Could she consent to marry her unknown cousin, of whom she absolutely knew nothing, and forever banish the remembrance of him who alone could possess her heart? And must she see those dear parents, in sickness and suffering, pining for the comforts in her power to bestow? The thought was distraction.

But Edward Leicester and his wife loved their child too well to see her sacrifice herself for their benefit. The character of their young cousin was totally unknown to them, and the father had done little to prepossess them in favor of the child. Marian was forbidden to agitate herself with any more questions on the subject.

"Our happiness would be dearly bought by the sacrifice of yours, my darling," whispered the mother, as she pressed her child to her bosom and kissed away the tears from her pale cheeks.

Filled with gratitude for their unselfish kindness, the poor girl parted with the precious token she had received from her unknown lover, and with the proceeds obtained for her invalid father numerous little luxuries rendered absolutely necessary by long custom.

"Marian!" She was seated in the dingy little room they called their parlor; tears were on her cheek, and painful thoughts were evidently occupying her mind; but the sound of that voice has driven them away, the tears that are now falling are tears of joy, for once more Marian is clasped to her lover's heart.

"My own, have you doubted? despaired of my coming? forgotten your promise?"

"Never, never. But O, the trouble, the poverty."

"Hush, my Marian, it is all at an end. No more care, no more sorrow, nought but joy and love for my beautiful bride."

With mingled feelings the father gave his consent to his daughter's betrothal. He felt that the stranger exerted a great influence over himself, that he felt peculiarly pleased and interested in him; yet the mystery of his name was still unsolved, and that excited suspicion.

"In two days you shall know all; at present I am too anxious to remove you from this wretched place, to spare time for the long explanations that will be necessary. Surely you cannot doubt me."

Edward Leicester gazed searchingly into those truthful, earnest eyes, and felt that his fears were groundless.

It was the afternoon of the second day. For many long hours the party had travelled without rest, and Mr. Leicester and his wife were leaning wearily back in the luxurious carriage so carefully provided for the comfort of the invalid. The bright autumn sun shone in the windows, the roads were dusty, the air was oppressive; Marian removed her bonnet. The sight of her ungloved hand had appeared to suggest a thought to her companion.

"I have never seen you wear your ring, Marian. Did it not meet your approval? or is your dislike of ornaments so great?"

He was watching her attentively, and she blushed deeply at the confession she was about to make.

"I kept it through long months of poverty and distress, and once I thought that nothing would tempt me to part with it. But a few weeks since my father saved me from a fate worse than death, and in gratitude I felt compelled to give it up, painful as the sacrifice was."

"And so it would have been 'a fate worse than death,' to have married your rich cousin, would it, Marian? That little speech is more precious to me than a thousand assurances of your love. But here we are at our journey's end." And before Marian could recover from her astonishment to inquire how he had learned her well-kept secret, the carriage turned into a magnificent avenue of trees, dashed past the gate-keeper's lodge, and in a few seconds drew up at the entrance of an elegant and strangely familiar mansion.

Springing to the ground, the young man assisted his companions to alight, and then led them confused and puzzled into the house, where bowing attendants ushered them into the well remembered rooms. Edward Leicester and his family were in their old home, and to their companion they now looked for a solution of the mystery.

"This is Marian's home, and I am Bernard Leicester," was his answer to the inquiring looks and words. "My father's command, not my own will, kept up the deception. He wished to put my betrothed wife to a severe proof, and truly she has passed nobly through it; and in my new character I must strive to obliterate any lingering prejudices she may entertain against a marriage with her 'rich cousin.'"

ADVICE TO A YOUNG PHYSICIAN.

Let me strongly forewarn you against one frequent error. Young physicians often dream that by extending the circle of their acquaintances, they must afford themselves the best chance of extending the circle of their private patients. In following out this chimerical view, much invaluable time is frequently lost; and what is worse, habits of pleasure and indolence are often with fatal effect, substituted for those habits of study and exertion that are above all price. No man will in any case of doubt or danger intrust to your professional care the guardianship of his own life, or of the life of those who are near and dear to his heart, merely because you happen to be on terms of intimacy with him. The self-interest of human nature forbids it. To have professional faith and confidence in you, he must respect you in your calling as a physician, and not merely in your character as a social friend and companion. The qualities for which he might esteem you in the latter capacity are often the very reverse of those which would induce him to confide in you in the former. The accomplishments which may render you acceptable in the drawing-room are not always those which would make your visits longed for and valued in the chamber of sickness and sorrow. I repeat, therefore, that if you dream of making patients by making friends, you will utterly delude yourself, and damage your own prospects. By your undivided devotion to your profession, labor to create for yourself a sound and just medical reputation, and that will create for you patients.—Simpson's Physicians and Physic.

WHAT THE HEART IS.

The heart is like a plant in the tropics, which all the year round is bearing flowers, and ripening seeds, and letting them fly. It is shaking off memories and dropping associations. The joys of last year are ripe seeds that will come up in joy again next year. Thus the heart is planting seeds in every nook and corner; and as a wind which serves to prostrate a plant is only a sower coming forth to sow its seeds, planting some of them in rocky crevices, some by river courses, some among mossy stones, some by warm hedges, and some in garden and open field, so it is with our experiences of life, that sway and bow us either with joy or sorrow. They plant everything round about us with heart seeds. Thus a house becomes sacred. Every room hath a memory, and a thousand of them; every door and each window is clustered with associations.—Christian Freeman.

"The virtue that doth make them most admired;
"The modesty that makes them seem divine.—Shakespeare.

LAPLAND LOVE-MAKING.

When a young gentleman in Lapland desires to assume new responsibilities, he lays in a large stock of brandy, and his parents, relatives and friends meet in as great numbers as possible, to treat the friends of the bride desired. Neither bride nor bridegroom is expected to betray anxiety or interest in the proceedings; the Arctic Mrs. Grundy, who is very strict in such matters, would be very much scandalized if they should. Besides the great mass of relatives and friends, of aunts and fourth-cousins, who must attend, there is a still greater number of outsiders, who are attracted by their curiosity to see whether anybody gets the mitten. The intensity of their curiosity is to some extent determined by the amount of brandy circulating. On the side of the gallant, there is a spokesman called Sopponiase. Brandy flask in hand, he goes over to the other party, and offers liquid hospitality to the father and mother of the young lady. This is a signal for indiscriminate attack of a similar nature by the entire invading party upon the lady's friends. Everybody drinks to her father, everybody drinks to her mother, and she herself is borne in grateful memory. When all are sufficiently elated, the proposal is embodied in a long speech, vibrating between poetry and prose. Her parents ask to see the lilch, the wedding presents. If they are accepted, the matter is settled, and there is nothing more but to go the next day to the parson, to get them published.

Most matches are made at the fairs and great festivals, but they are never made without brandy. Indeed, "courtship with brandy" is a proverb among Laplanders equivalent to the French courtship à la fin. When the lady is rich, and the suitor is not, he very often throws his brandy away. The influence of riches in matrimonial matters is nowhere felt more strongly than here; dress counts for nothing; one sheepskin is as good as another. Rank is determined only by the number of reindeer a man owns. Practically, marriage is a mere matter of bargain and sale. Still, the Laplanders recognize the sacredness of the relation in their way. The silver which they pay for their bride must not be in the shape of six dollars—it must be made up into ornaments. This is better than nothing. If a marriage is broken off, the party who takes a divorce generally returns the bridal presents, and the more conscientious add a gift for the wasted brandy. So, too, when the parents say "no," many are so generous as to pay for the brandy. As all the relatives have a word to say, there is generally a good deal of quarrelling before the answer is agreed upon, and some management is required, oftentimes, to make it favorable.—European Sketches.

LIGHTING THE DESERT FIRE.

A strange Bedawy, with an idiomatic cast of features, now came from the neighboring tent, carrying in his hand an instrument like a broken pickaxe. Passing through the circle of spectators, he advanced towards where we sat, and, when within a yard of us, raised his weapon and sunk it deep into the soil at our very knees. The whole thing was done with such deliberation and quickness that we both started back as if the blow had been aimed at our head. The Arab laughed heartily at our fright, but the operator took not the slightest notice, and labored away as if frantic, till he had excavated a considerable hole. Another Arab now came up and threw in a few of the dry prickly shrubs that grow so plentifully in the desert; and then applying match and tinder soon had them in a blaze. A third threw in a cloakful of dry camel's dung over the burning mass. The skirt of his under garment supplied the place of bellows and fanned the heap into a brisk leaping flame. Thus they kindled the desert fire, and the half-naked Arabs gathered round it, spreading out their thin, bony hands to catch the genial warmth, and then rubbing them with evident satisfaction. Ever and anon, one of the circle would add fresh fuel, while others started up the smouldering embers with their hooked sticks or massive clubs. The night wind, too, sweeping round the tent, made the flame leap and play like a thing of life, and sometimes sent showers of sparks and hot ashes into the beads of the little circle, occasioning a momentary confusion, followed by a hearty laugh.—Porter's Five Years in Damascus.

EPICUREAN FANCIES OF SERPENTS.

We have before referred to the extraordinary length of time a python has been known to fast without injury. Their fancies as well as their fastings are rather eccentric. Every one has heard of the snake who swallowed his blanket, a meal which ultimately killed him. A python who had lived for years in a friendly manner with a brother nearly as large as himself, was found one morning solus. As the cage was secure, the keepers were puzzled to know how the serpent had escaped; at last it was observed that the remaining inmate was swollen remarkably during the night, when the horrid fact became plain enough: the fratricide had succeeded in swallowing the entire person of his brother; it was his last meal, however, for in some months he died. A friend informs us that he once saw in these gardens a rat-snake, of Ceylon, devour a common coluber matrix. The rat-snake, however, had not taken the measure of his victim, as by no effort he could he dispose of the last four inches of his tail, which stuck out rather jauntily from the side of his mouth, with very much the look of a cigar. After a quarter of an hour, the tail began to exhibit a retrograde motion, and the swallowed snake was disgorged, nothing the worse for his living sepulchre, with the exception of the wound made by his partner when he first seized him. The anti-eater, who lately inhabited the room leading out of the python apartment, has died of a want of ants.—London Quarterly.

WONDERS NEVER CEASE.

Among the wonders which are related of the "Great Western," that leviathan of steamers, which Mr. Brunel is now building in the Thames, the latest advice state on good authority, that several acres of grass land, in a high state of cultivation, will be put on board, and as many cows and sheep as will supply all the passengers with milk, cream, fresh butter and butcher's meat during the voyage out and home. It is also said that the proper machinery will be put on board for torring for coal, which, it is confidently predicted, will be found, and thus the vessel will be prepared for any length of voyage, even to the antipodes, without fear of being short of fuel!—Saturday Courier.

HOW TO LOOK YOUNG.

How is it that some men thought to be so old, still look so young, while others thought young must still look old? The cause lies very frequently in themselves. Mr. Rant, once, on being asked the reason, said: "I never ride when I can walk; I never eat but one dish at dinner; I never get drunk. My walking keeps my blood in circulation; my simple diet prevents indigestion; and never touching ardent spirits, my liver never fears being eaten up alive." But he forgot to add one of the greatest causes of lasting youth, "a kind, unenvious heart." Envy can dig as deeply in the human face as time itself.—Concord Freeman.

BERNARDO DEL CARPIO SUING TO THE KING.

BERNARDO DEL CARPIO.

BY FELICIA HEMANS.

We present on this page a number of fine designs, executed expressly for us by Mr. Warren, illustrating the most striking points in this most popular of Mrs. Hemans's lyrical poems. The story, which the poetess has made immortal, is thrilling and touching. Bernardo del Carpio, a renowned Spanish chieftain, had made frantic efforts to procure the release of his father, the Count of Saldana, who had been kept in prison by Alfonso, king of Asturias, almost from the hour of Bernardo's birth. Bernardo made war upon the crown with such success, that the leading nobles urged upon the king to compromise the matter. Alfonso agreed to restore the count to his son on condition of the latter surrendering the fortresses and prisoners he had taken—and the champion faithfully fulfilled his part of the contract. He rode forth to meet his father—the ballad informs us of the result. The early chronicles and romances leave us entirely in the dark with regard to the ultimate fate of Bernardo. Mr. Warren has sketched five designs—the first, representing Bernardo appealing to the king to release his father; the second, showing him on his way to meet the count; the third, the unhappy discovery of the truth; the fourth, the champion bringing the king and his victim face to face; and the last, the tomb of Count Saldana. The drawings are full of spirit, and the engravings beautifully executed.

The warrior bowed his crested head
And tamed his heart of fire,
And sued the haughty king to free
His long-imprisoned sire.
"I bring thee here my fortress-keys,
I bring my captive train,
I pledge thee faith, my liege, my lord
O, break my father's chain!"

"Rise, rise! even now thy father comes,
A ransom'd man this day;
Mount thy good horse, and thou and I
Will meet him on his way."
Then lightly rose that loyal son,
And bounded on his steed,
And urged, as if with lance in rest,
The charger's foamy speed.

And lo! from far, as on they passed,
There came a glittering band,
With one that 'midst them stately rode,
As a leader in the land.
"Now haste, Bernardo, haste! for there
In very truth is he—
The father whom thy faithful heart
Hath yearned so long to see."

BERNARDO REPROACHING THE KING.

His dark eye flashed, his proud breast heaved,
His cheek's blood came and went;
He reached that gray-haired chieftain's side,
And there dismounting bent.
A lowly knee to earth he bent,
His father's hand he took—
What was there in his touch that all
His fiery spirit shook?

The hand was cold—a frozen thing—
It dropped from his like lead;
He looked up to the face above—
The face was of the dead!
A plume waved o'er the noble brow—
The brow was fixed and white;
He met at last his father's eyes,
But in them was no sight!

Up from the ground he sprung and gazed;
But who could paint that gaze?
They hushed their very hearts that saw
His terror and amaze.
They might have chained him as before
That stony form he stood,
For the power was stricken from his arm,
And from his lip the blood.

"Father!" at length he murmured low,
And wept like childhood then:
Talk not of grief till thou hast seen
The tears of warlike men!
He thought of all his glorious hopes,
And all his young renown—
He flung the falchion from his side,
And in the dust sat down.

Then covering with his steel-gloved hands
His darkly mournful brow,
"No more—there is no more," he said,
"To lift the sword for now.
My king is false, my hope betrayed,
My father—O, the worth,
The glory and the loveliness
Are passed away from earth!"

BERNARDO KNEELING AT THE FEET OF THE CORSE.

"I thought to stand where banners waved,
My sire! beside thee yet,
I would that there our kindred blood
On Spain's free soil had met;
Thou wouldst have known my spirit then,
For thee my fields were won—
And thou hast perished in thy chains,
As though thou hadst no son!"

Then, starting from the ground once more,
He seized the monarch's rein,
Amidst the pale and wildered looks
Of all the courtier train;
And with a fierce, o'ermastering grasp,
The rearing war horse led,
And sternly set them face to face—
The king before the dead!

"Came I not forth upon thy pledge,
My father's hand to kiss?
Be still, and gaze thou on, false king,
And tell me what is this!
The voice, the glance, the heart I sought—
Give answer, where are they?
If thou wouldst clear thy perjured soul,
Send life through this cold clay!"

"Into these glassy eyes put light—
Be still, keep down thine ire—
Bid these white lips a blessing speak:
This earth is not my sire!
Give me back him for whom I strove,
For whom my blood was shed;
Thou canst not—and a king? His dust
Be mountains on thy head!"

He loosed the steed; his slack hand fell;
Upon the silent face
He cast one long, deep, troubled look,
Then turned from that sad place:
His hope was crushed, his after-fate
Untold in martial strain—
His banner led the spears no more
Amidst the hills of Spain.

BERNARDO RIDING TO MEET HIS FATHER.

RUSSIAN CROWN DIAMONDS.

The crown treasury of the czars at Moscow contains many precious stones. The two most considerable are diamonds, one the size of a pigeon's egg rose-cut. The Russians have given it the name of Orloff. The other has the form of an irregular prism, and is of the size and almost the length of a little finger; it bears the name of the Shah, and formerly belonged to the Sophis, and was one of the two enormous diamonds which ornamented the throne of Nadir Shah, which were designated by the Persians by the names of "Sun of the Sea," and "Moon of the Mountains." When Nadir was assassinated, his treasures were pillaged, and his precious stones divided among a few soldiers, who carefully concealed them. An Armenian named Shafrahs resided at that period at Bassora with his two brothers. One day an Afghan came to him, and offered for sale the large diamond, the "Moon of the Mountains," as well as an emerald, a ruby of fabulous size, a sapphire of the finest water, called by the Persians the "Eye of Allah," and a number of other stones, for the whole of which he asked such a moderate sum that Shafrahs suspected that they had not been honestly come by, and told him to call again, as he had not the money in the house. The Afghan, fearing Shafrahs was going to act with treachery towards him, left the place and could not again be found, although the three brothers made every search for him. Some years afterwards the elder brother met the man at Bagdad, who told him that he had just sold all his precious stones for 65,000 piastres and a pair of valuable horses. Shafrahs had the residence of the purchaser, who was a Jew, pointed out to him, and he went to him and offered him double the price he had given for them, but was refused. The three brothers then agreed to murder the Jew and rob him of his purchase, which they did, and on the following day poisoned the Afghan, and threw both the bodies into the river. A dispute soon after arose between the brothers as to the division of the spoil, which terminated in Shafrahs getting rid of his two brothers by poison, after which he fled to Constantinople, and thence to Holland, where he made known the riches he possessed, and offered them for sale to the different courts of Europe. Catherine II. proposed to buy the "Moon of the Mountains" only. Shafrahs was requested to come to Russia, and he was introduced to the court jeweller. The terms demanded by Shafrahs were—letters of nobility, a life annuity of 10,000 roubles, and 500,000 roubles, payable by equal instalments in ten years. Count Pannin, who was then minister, delayed the settlement of the bargain as long as possible, and in the meantime had the Armenian led into such extravagance that he fell into debt, and when the minister found that he had no means of paying what he owed, he abruptly broke off the negotiation. Shafrahs, according to the laws of the country, could not leave until his debts should be paid, and the court jeweller prepared to take advantage of his embarrassments, and intended that the diamond should fall into his hands for a fourth of its value. Shafrahs, however, discovered the trap, and, disposing of some of the less valuable stones, paid his debts and disappeared. Agents were sent after him, but he escaped them. Ten years after, while at Astrachan, renewed offers were made to him, but he refused unless the bargain should be settled at Smyrna. Catherine accepted, and became the possessor of the diamond for letters of nobility, 600,000 roubles, and 170,000 paper roubles. Shafrahs, not being able to return to his country, where he would have had to give an account of two homicides and two fratricides, fixed himself at Astrachan, where he married a countrywoman, and had seven daughters. One of his sons-in-law poisoned him to get his share of his property. The fortune he had acquired (from ten to twelve millions) was divided, and soon spent by his successors, and several of his grandchildren are now living at Astrachan in abject misery.—Galignani's Messenger.

EASTERN POESY.

"—the land where the olive and myrtle
Are emblems of deeds that are done in their clime;
Where the rage of the vulture, the love of the turtle,
Now melt into sorrow, now madden to crime."

We learn, moreover, that the Orientals have cultivated every style of poetry.

—“ have run Through each mode of the lyre and are masters of all,” narrative, didactic, ethical, erotic, bacchanalian, religious, epigrammatical. We have interminable epics and satirical couplets; poems of hundreds of lines and sparkling quatrains, wittier than ever Martial or Voltaire penned. Mr. Alger has opened a little way the gates of this paradise, and allowed us a glimpse of the glories streaming forth.

THE SOLDIER'S GRATITUDE

A little episode of Florence Nightingale's career in the Crimea is quite too touching to be passed by unnoticed. It appears that in one of the battles of the campaign, a Highland soldier had his right arm so severely wounded that, when taken to the hospital, the surgeons at once declared that it was impossible to save the limb, and that amputation must be immediately performed. Miss Nightingale thought otherwise, however, and caused the operation to be delayed. In the meantime, by careful nursing, she cured the wounds and saved the arm. The poor sufferer's heart overflowed with gratitude to his benefactress, which he expressed in words as well as he was able; but his silent gratitude was more eloquent. He told a comrade that whenever Miss Nightingale passed him, he kissed her shadow on the pillow. That soldier had as true a heart as ever beat beneath the stars and orders of a field marshal.

CRAYON DRAWING.—Mr. Charles Barry, whose pencil has so often been employed in illustrating our columns, has recently executed several crayon portraits, remarkable not only as correct likenesses, but as works of art, for their spirit, vigor and style. Mr. Barry is a thoroughly educated artist, and excels in more than one branch of his profession. Should he make crayon drawings a speciality, he need fear no competitor. Mr. Barry has rooms at No. 8 in this building.

FRENCH'S AMERICAN DRAMA.—Among the recent issues of this fine series of acting plays, published by Samuel French, 121 Nassau Street, New York, are "Speed the Plough," "Old Heads and Young Hearts," and the "Red Musk." These plays are all finely printed, have the stage directions, scene plots, costume and every requisite. They enjoy a prodigious circulation.

FORREST IN FIVE CHARACTERS.

On the last page of the present number we have placed a fine engraving after an original design by Champney, made expressly for us, representing our great American tragedian, Edwin Forrest, in five of the characters performed by him at the Boston Theatre. The whole group of dramatic figures is surmounted by the muse of history, on the left of whom is seen the Parthenon of Athens, and to the right a portion of the Roman Colosseum. On the lower part of the design are a Roman helmet, shield and sword. The central figure depicts Forrest as Macbeth, in Shakespeare's tragedy of that name, one of the grandest compositions of the tragic muse. To the right he appears as Spartacus in the late Dr. Bird's tragedy of the "Gladiator," and as "Metanora" in Stone's piece of that name. To the left he figures again as Jack Cade, in Judge Conrad's play of "Aylmere," and Virginia, in Sheridan Knowles's fine tragedy of that name.

Forrest is now confessedly the greatest living tragedian who speaks the English tongue, and we question whether any continental actor approaches him in excellence. His rise in the profession, from the start, was rapid; but, undazzled by his early fame, he has never for a moment remitted his studies, and now stands before us the consummate artist. It was the fashion, at one time, with a certain set to deride him and deny his genius. Because he was gifted with a fine voice and magnificent physique, this clique chose to pronounce him a purely physical actor, able enough to personate Damon or Rollo, but incapable of embodying the subtle creations of Shakespeare and his contemporary dramatists. There was a time, too, when we thought these charges had affected the artist himself, and when, in deference to their unjust censures, he was somewhat inclined to enlure his style to tameness. But he has outlived this cult of criticism, and established for himself certain sound principles of art to which he now rigidly adheres. His popularity and his powers have suffered no diminution. If he has ever played to a poor house we are not aware of the fact. On the contrary, he is, in the language of managers, a "sure card." Whether his stay in a city be long or short, he is sure to draw full houses to the very latest night of his engagement. In the whole history of the stage there is no such example of continuous success. Mr. Forrest has amassed a princely fortune by the profession in which he has labored for more than a quarter of a century.

ANECDOTE OF FRANKLIN.—When Franklin was ambassador to the English court, a lady who was about being presented to the king, noticed his exceedingly plain appearance, and asked who he was. On being told that he was Dr. Benjamin Franklin, the American ambassador, she exclaimed, "The North American ambassador so shabbily dressed!" "Hush, madam, for Heaven's sake," whispered a friend, "he is the man that bottles up thunder and lightning."

FALLING DOWN.

BY ALVIN HOSMER.

The melancholy days have come,
The leaves are falling down,
And Nature's face, of late so gay,
Is darkened by a frown;
The meads, the rills, the vales and hills,
Have put their sackcloth on,
And there in deepest grief they moan,
All desolate and lone.

So Summer died in peace serene,
Then Autumn came to reign,
And though she smiled to fields and woods,
They smiled not back again;
Then frosts with sacrilegious hand
Laid all their beauties low;
And now to view the once fair land,
With thoughtful steps I go.

Ye vales, ye hills, how sad your look,
How sudden your decay!
And thou, my gentle, murmuring brook,
How sad thy song to-day!
And O ye woods, majestic woods!
Where now your sweet refrain?
O, of your sweet, deep solitudes
No vestige now remains.

Of all I view your loneliness,
My heart grows lonely too,
And thinks of friends whose fond caress
Once caused soul-joys to flow;
Of all that band of other years
But one or two I see!
The rest—hack, hack ye bitter tears—
Are lost to earth and me.

Man! take thou up a fallen leaf;
A message 'tis to thee!
Read, read and learn thy life is brief,
There learn of thy decay;
Thou'rt falling down, that fleshy load
Will soon be laid below;
Yes, man, that long and dreary road
Must soon be thine to go.

A little sleep must nature take,
But spring will come again,
And with reviving song will wake
To light and life the plain;
So man must sleep, so man must wake—
Must rise with Him to reign,
And once in that blest paradise,
We shall not fall again.

THE PAINTER'S WIDOW.

BY ANNE T. WILBUR.

THERE was a pile of furniture beside the threshold, and the town-crier was, in a loud voice, calling for purchasers. A few passers-by stopped; but scarcely had they cast their eyes on the articles exposed for sale, than they went on their way. The very beggars passed without turning on them a covetous glance. The crier, weary of his vain efforts, ceased, and, shaking his head, said to a little man in spectacles who was standing beside him:

"You will not pay your expenses, Master Caverdona; I am afraid there is no one in Rome so poor as to purchase the rags of the widow of Pellegrino. All there is here will not bring you three ducats."

"And the wretch owes me twelve!" exclaimed the little old man, striking the ground with his cane. "Twelve ducats, Jacobo, as sure as I am a Christian! More, perhaps; for I had confidence in her husband; I furnished him with oils, pencils and colors without end. Who would have thought he would have died without paying me! I am too good, too confiding. You see that this unhappy dauber has left me, by way of security, rags, a woman and four children. I can sell neither the woman nor the children, and the rags, you say, are not worth three ducats. Ah! the poor people who have anything of their own are very unfortunate, Jacobo; everybody cheats them, taxes them, pillages them."

The town-crier looked behind him.

"Don't speak so loud," said he, in a low tone; "the widow is there with her little ones, and you know how soft-hearted she is; she would take what you say for a reproach. After all, Master Caverdona, it was not Pellegrino's fault that the fever carried him off."

"No, but it was his fault that he took twelve ducats' worth of merchandize of me."

"He would have paid you if he had lived."

"I believe it."

"Of what do you complain, then?"

"How?—of what do I complain?" exclaimed the exasperated old man; "that he did not leave enough to pay his debts. That is the way with you common people. It would seem as if the grave-digger gave a quittance of all obligations to those whom he buries. Learn that one should not borrow when one may die insolvent."

The crier shrugged his shoulders.

"The honesty of the poor does not always depend upon themselves," said he, "it depends also on Providence. They can pay only with their labor; and when God deprives them of health, he is responsible, and not they. Who knows, Master Caverdona, whether your twelve ducats will not go towards purchasing for you a place in paradise?"

The little old man assumed a scandalized air.

"Do not jest on sacred things, Jacobo," said he sharply; "and occupy yourself in summoning customers, rather than in making remarks."

Jacobo obeyed with a smile, while Caverdona approached the movables scattered on the pavement, to estimate anew what he might receive for them. Whether the poor painter's widow had heard nothing of what had been said, or was not affected by it, she had not changed her expression or attitude. Seated on the ground, not far from the threshold, she held in her arms two children of nearly the same age, who were playing with the dishevelled tresses of her hair, a third was rolling at her feet, and the last singing and weaving a few blades of straw attached to its cradle.

The countenance of the widow was tranquil; neither tears in her eyes, nor sighs on her lips! It was more a sorrowful resignation than complaint, and more dangerous than despair; this gloomy self-abandonment which makes one pass through life as if condemned to the scaffold, without anxiety, without precaution, almost coldly, because the result is inevitable and sure. Meanwhile a few persons had collected around the pitiful furniture of which the crier had announced the sale.

Imitation rules the world of men as attraction that of things; it is the only law. New passers-by succeeded, and stopped because the others had stopped; where there was no one a little while ago, a crowd soon gathered. No one bought, but every one looked without knowing why. Each seemed less curious at what he saw than at what excited the curiosity of others. Two gentlemen who were passing, found themselves arrested by the constantly increasing throng.

"What is the matter?" asked the elder, with that air of sullen hauteur which distinguishes an Englishman, on the continent.

"If it was in our good city of Paris, my lord," replied the other, in that coquettish and familiar tone which distinguishes the French in the four quarters of the globe, "I should reply to you that it was a porter's wife beating her husband, or a cat with its ears cut off."

"It is less than that, Signor Frenchman," smilingly observed the Jew with the weasel profile, who had heard the two gentlemen.

"What is it then?"

"The poor furniture of a painter who died a few days since, which Master Caverdona is going to sell."

"Who is this Master Caverdona?"

"A merchant, my gentlemen, who will furnish you with colors at the lowest prices."

"Do you take us for painters?" interrupted the Englishman, with a peevish air.

"In fact, the Jew is too familiar," added the Frenchman, lightly. "Learn, sirrah, that you speak to Lord Pembroke and to M. de Vivonne."

The face of the Jew brightened.

"Lord Pembroke!" said he; "is he not the rich amateur in pictures?"

"Precisely."

"Ah! my lord, how apropos is our encounter! I have in my shop the works of all the Spanish and Italian painters."

The Englishman looked at him.

"What is your name?"

"Israel."

"Ah, ah, I have indeed heard of it. It is said that you are a crafty fox, who buys at the weight of copper and sells again at the weight of gold; no matter. Have you Poussins?"

"Three, my lord."

"Crespis?"

"Several."

"And Dominichinos?"

"At discretion."

"Your address?"

The Jew gave it to him. While Lord Pembroke was writing it, the auction re-commenced, and a cradle was set up for sale. No price was offered for it; the Frenchman observed it.

"Master Caverdona will have difficulty in recovering his debt," said the Jew.

"Is it much?"

"Twelve ducats, sir."

"And has the widow been unable to raise them?"

"Yes."

"Has she no friends?"

"They were so poor!" observed Israel.

"Twelve ducats!" repeated M. de Vivonne. "Do you understand, my lord, how people can live when they are obliged to resort to such a step as this for twelve ducats?"

"The common people have no wants," observed my lord, philosophically.

"They are very fortunate! As for me, I spend three hundred thousand francs per year and want everything! I am obliged to cut down my trees, sell my lands, and I never have two hundred louis left me."

"Ah! who can live now, sir? I who speak to you, have drawn on my income in advance six thousand guineas."

"Nobility is not independent, my lord; it must keep accounts like a plebeian; it is humiliating! If I was rich I would throw to this unfortunate woman her twelve ducats; but play has ruined me."

"As buying pictures has me. Would you believe that I am at this moment proposing to a broker in Rotterdam, fifty thousand crowns for the Seven Sacraments of Poussin, and he refuses? I shall be forced to raise it to eighty thousand and perhaps more."

The Jew heard all, fully resolved to profit by the Englishman's taste for painting; but a few paces off, another person was also listening to the conversation of the two foreigners. This was a middle-aged man, dressed in black, and who was remarkable for nothing but the vivacity of his glance. He had smiled as he heard the complaints of the two gentlemen on the poverty of the nobility, and had cast upon them a look of bitter irony, to which they had paid no heed. At this moment the crier offered for sale a smoky picture.

"Has he pictures also?" asked Lord Pembroke, laughing.

"Some sign of a merchant of macaroni which has been left with the painter," observed M. de Vivonne.

"At six paoli!" cried the seller.

"It will not bring them," said Israel.

There was silence.

"I will give three ducats," suddenly said the man dressed in black.

A rumor arose in the crowd.

"Three ducats!" repeated the astonished Jew.

"Who is that man?" asked my lord.

"It is Master Stella, sir."

"The painter?"

"Yes, and one of our finest connoisseurs."

"Can this picture have any merit?"

"It is a chef-d'œuvre, perhaps," said M. de Vivonne, with indifference; "who knows? A Caraccio or a Titian."

"Belonging to a mere dauber?"

"Why not? Has not a Corregio been found lately serving as a sign to a baton-manufacturer?"

"Three ducats!" resumed the crier; "will no one bid more?"

"I will give four ducats!" cried the Jew.

"Eight ducats!" resumed Stella.

"Ten ducats!"

"Twelve ducats!"

There was a pause; Israel asked to be allowed to examine the picture more closely.

"It is useless!" hastily interrupted the man in black; "I will give twenty ducats!"

Until then, my Lord Pembroke had observed all without speaking. He at last advanced, and, with that tone of calm and cold superiority which fortune gives, said briefly:

"Fifty ducats!"

The painter turned towards him.

"The picture is not worth them, my lord," observed he.

The Englishman looked at him sidewise, and smiled proudly.

"It is well, my dear sir," said he, drawing himself up; "one has not a collection worth a hundred thousand pounds sterling without knowing a little about paintings. You doubtless have your reasons, Master Stella, for bidding on the picture?"

"I have, my lord."

"Well! I also have mine."

And, turning towards the crier:

"A hundred ducats," said he, "and let that end the matter!"

The crowd seemed to wonder. All eyes were turned towards Lord Pembroke; the poor widow, overcome with joy, thought herself in a dream; and Master Caverdona wiped his spectacles, laughing. The crier, after having asked three times if no one would offer higher, declared that the picture belonged to my lord. Master Stella had followed all with his eye; he let the Englishman pay the hundred ducats.

"You did not expect to be outbid, master?" said the latter looking at him with a bantering air.

"Pardou-mé, my lord, I did hope so," replied Stella.

"How so?"

"I had heard your conversation with this gentleman; I knew that, too poor to give twelve ducats to the widow of Pellegrino, you were rich enough to pay eighty thousand pounds for a Poussin; I wished to profit by your taste to make you relieve a misfortune; I succeeded in persuading you to a good action by giving it the appearance of a good bargain. When I proposed three ducats, I was sure you would offer more."

"So this painting—"

"Is not worth the six paoli at which it was offered."

M. de Vivonne laughed.

"Impossible!" exclaimed the Englishman; "if that were so, Master Stella should be accountable to me—"

"For the hundred ducats?—willingly. In case my lord had not bid upon this picture, I should have purchased it, not in order to possess a master-piece, but to have one good memory the more in my heart. If my lord regrets that he has been surprised into an alms, and if he cannot resolve to dispose of a hundred ducats in favor of an unfortunate woman, he may transfer this pleasure to me."

"Softly!" exclaimed Vivonne; "if he relinquishes it, I will take it. This is a lesson, is it not, Master Stella? You have wished to prove that we people of quality have the caprice of art without comprehending it, and that, prodigal in satisfying our manias, we are miserly in fulfilling our duties."

"Alas! sir," said Stella, "it is not only you that are thus, but all men. Our tastes often become vices. We do not love master-pieces in painting, that others may enjoy them, but to possess them by stealth, to heap them up as misers do their treasures. Our love of art is not, as it should be, a reflection of the love of humanity, it is a folly which flatters us. Painters or amateurs, we prefer, for the most part, a smoky picture to a face smiling with happiness. The sons of Adam are selfish, and their selfishness makes them cruel."

"You preach well, master," said M. de Vivonne, with slight constraint; "thanks for the homily; and in order to prove to you that it has taken effect, take this for your protégé."

He presented to the painter a purse, which the latter received.

"And I, I will keep the picture," said Lord Pembroke, seriously.

"Do better, my lord," said Stella. "Give it a place in your collection. Every time you pass it, it will remind you of a family consoled; this remembrance will be worth more than a Raphael."
